

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

THIRTEENTH CONGRESS.—FIRST SESSION.

BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, MAY 24, 1818.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.*

MONDAY, May 24, 1818.

Conformably to the act passed the 27th of February last, entitled "An act to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress," the Senate assembled in their Chamber at the Capitol.

PRESENT.

NICHOLAS GILMAN, from New Hampshire.
JOSEPH B. VARNUM, from Massachusetts.
SAMUEL W. DANA, from Connecticut.
WILLIAM HUNTER and JEREMIAH B. HOWELL, from Rhode Island.
JONATHAN ROBINSON, from Vermont.
JOHN LAMBERT, from New Jersey.
MICHAEL LEIB, from Pennsylvania.
OUTERBRIDGE HORSEY, from Delaware.
JAMES TURNER, from North Carolina.
JOHN TAYLOR, from South Carolina.
JOSEPH ANDERSON, and GEORGE W. CAMPBELL, from Tennessee.

THOMAS WORTHINGTON, from Ohio.

JAMES BROWN, from Louisiana.

JESSE BLEDSOE, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March last; WILLIAM B. BULLOCK, appointed a Senator by the Executive of the State of Georgia, in place of William H. Crawford, resigned; DUDLEY CHACE, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Vermont, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March last; CHARLES CUTTA, appointed a Senator by the Executive of the State of New Hampshire, to fill the vacancy in the representation in the Senate from that State, during the present recess of the Legislature of the said State; DAVID DAGGETT, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Connecticut, in place of Chauncey Goodrich, resigned; JEREMIAH MORROW, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Ohio, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March last; DAVID STONE, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March last; and CHARLES TAIT, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Georgia, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March last, respectively, produced their credentials; which were read; and the oath prescribed by law was administered to them, and they took their seats in the Senate.

The oath was also administered to JOHN GAILLARD and ABNER LACOCK, their credentials having been read and filed during the last session.

Address of the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT exhibited a certificate of his having taken the oath of office prescribed by law; which was read; and he addressed the Senate as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Our fellow-citizens, in the free exercise of their constitutional authority, having been pleased to honor the person addressing you, with this distinguished station, have inferred from him an indispensable obligation to meet their just expectations. To attain this desirable object, and to preside over this honorable body in conformity to their magnanimity and dignity, which at all times have been conspicuous, will be his primary pursuit. Whilst the constitution has invested him with Legislative and Executive powers, in cases only that are casual, to the decisions of these it has attached a great responsibility; in anticipating which, and his other duties, he has the pleasing prospect of reposing on your liberality and candor. But if, in this high and influential branch of the Government, such unanimity should prevail, as to decide for themselves every question of policy, the example will still increase their lustre, and add to his happiness.

It is a subject of cordial congratulation, that the liberties of the people, in so great a degree, rest on that wisdom and fortitude which mark the characters of the exalted personage who fills the Supreme Executive, of the dignified members who constitute the National Legislature, and of the eminent officers who direct the Ministerial departments—public virtues, emulated by few Governments, need no encomiums. Fidelity and integrity, unsubdued by the severest ordeals, and presaging to public calamities a favorable issue, will be ever held in high estimation; whilst a Government, scrupulously faithful to its trust, and measures which merit the highest applause, have a just claim to the public support.

The present epoch is momentous, and leads to observations which would not occur on ordinary occasions.

Our country is again involved in a sanguinary conflict, the issue of which, in the estimation of the enemy, is to determine whether the republican system, adopted by the people, is imbecile and transient, or whether it has force and duration worthy of the enterprise. That it can never fail whilst they are true to their interest, is beyond doubt. And is it not equally so, that they will never desert the Government of their choice, or attach themselves to a foreign domination, from which, under the benign smiles of Divine Providence, they have lately, by their own valor, emancipated themselves? Can they need arguments to convince them, that, in proportion to the purity of Republican Governments, have ever been the reproaches and efforts for overthrowing them, by imperious Sovereigns who once ruled them?

"To divide and to conquer" have long been the objects of the enemy. He has presumed on his own arts, and on impotency in our system of Government; but, in both instances, he will be convinced of his error. The people and constituted authorities of the several States, those great pillars of our confederate system, numerous as they are, and inevitably discordant in some of their interests, have evinced, in various ways, a firm determination to support it. The interior frontier States, where the territorial war commenced and continues, assailed by innumerable difficulties, have surmounted them; and, by their unanimity and Spartan valor, are establishing for themselves immortal honor. Through the extensive wilds of our military operations, some of these, as in all wars, have been successful, and others unfortunate. But to whatever causes the latter may be traced, they never can be imputed to those heroic officers or privates of the army or of the militia, who have bravely combated the enemy; and of whom, some have been crowned with laurels, others have submitted to irresistible misfortunes, and many have nobly fallen, enshrined with glory. The Atlantic States have repelled, with magnanimity, maritime invasions; and have also given proofs of their patriotic ardor, by conquests on the ocean. Their enterprises and victories have been sources of national triumph and renown. Are not our officers and mariners, in naval combats, unrivalled by fame? Have they not presented infallible sureties for signaling themselves on great occasions? How vain then is the hope of divisions or conquest? Does the enemy expect, by burning defenceless towns and villages, to promote his views? Such conduct may entail on the nation which sanctions it eternal infamy, but can never subdue the elevated souls of our brave fellow-citizens, or even depress the sublime minds of our innocent fair, the ornaments of our country, who, amidst the unmerited distresses inflicted on them and their tender offspring by a merciless foe, will soar above sympathy, and claim the just tribute of universal admiration and applause.

Whilst the Executive in the full exercise of its authority, is left to test the sincerity of pacific overtures, it is a happy circumstance that the United States, at all times desirous of an honorable peace, and superintended by an officer whose capacious mind embraces, and whose patriotic fortitude will pursue, every interest of his country, thus meet with ardor an indispensable war. Is not their power a pledge that they can, and their sacred honor that they will, with intrepidity, maintain the conflict? They demand justice; and can they relinquish it without a surrender of their sovereignty?

Great Britain is in collision with her best customers, and once her commercial friends, who had viewed peace as a mutual blessing; and who, by their moderation, had preserved it, until necessity has pointed to a different line of conduct. They had annually sent to her their productions and specie to a vast amount; had thus employed her mechanics, purchased her manufactures, extended her commerce, and become a great source of her national wealth. Hence, her zealous and persevering opposition to their commercial restraints, representing, in high strains, their great injury to this country; but preserving silence on a most important point, their destructive effects on her own manufactures and commerce.

The United States are now her enemy; and is it not easy to foresee, that, if the war should continue, the Canadas will be rendered independent of her; and, as friends or allies to the United States, will no longer be instrumental in exciting an unrelenting and savage warfare against our extensive and defenceless borders? To such inhuman acts, in former times, were the Canadians urged by France in her Albion wars; and by our colonial aid Great Britain obtained jurisdiction over them. She in turn has abused this power, and has justified the United States in their efforts to divest her of it. And is not their energy adequate to the object? Will not this be evident by a view of their effective National and State Governments? of the unconquered minds and formidable numbers of their citizens? of their martial spirit? of their innate attachment to their rights and liberties? and of their inflexible determination to preserve them? But, if any one still doubts, will he not recollect, that, at the commencement of our Revolutionary war, which terminated against her, the united colonies had not a third of their present population; nor arms or military stores for a single campaign; nor an efficient arrangement for warfare; nor specie in their treasuries; nor funds for emitting a paper currency; nor a national Government; nor (excepting two instances) State Governments; nor the knowledge either of military or of naval tactics? Will he not also remember that Great Britain was then in the zenith of her power; that neighboring nations trembled at her nod; that the colonies were under her control; that her crown officers opposed every means for resisting her; excited amongst the colonial Governments (over which they presided) unfounded jealousies of each other, and embarrassed every measure for their union; that she was loaded with less than a fifth of her present national debt; that she was then at peace with all the world; and that she is now at war with a greater part of Europe, as well as with the United States? If Great Britain herself reflects on these things, will she not relinquish her vain attempts to awe the citizens of the United States, by exaggerated statements of her military and naval power, or by delusive views of their unprepared state for a war, of the great expense of it, and of the difficulties they are to encounter in defence of all that is valuable to man? If, in lieu of fruitless artifices, she will make rational and equitable arrangements, which the Government of the United States have been always ready to meet, can there be a doubt that the two nations will be speedily restored to their wonted friendship and commerce?

Your fellow-citizen, with sensations which can more easily be conceived than expressed, perceives that there are in the Government many of his former friends and compatriots, with whom he has often co-operated in the perilous concerns of his country; and, with unfeigned pleasure, he will meet the other public functionaries, whose acknowledged abilities and public services in like manner claim his high consideration and respect. With a sacred regard to the rights of every Department and officer of Government, and with a respectful deference to their political principles and opinions, he has frankly declared his own; for, to have concealed them at a crisis like this, might have savored too much of a deficiency of candor.

And may that Omnipotent Being, who, with infinite wisdom and justice, superintends the destinies of nations, confirm the heroic patriotism which has glowed in the breasts of the national rulers, and convince the enemy that, whilst a disposition to peace, on equitable and honorable terms, will ever prevail in their public councils, one spirit, animated by the love of country, will inspire every Department of the National Government.

WASHINGTON, May 24, 1818.

On motion by Mr. ANDERSON, the Secretary was directed to notify the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and ready to proceed to business.

A committee was appointed on the part of the Senate, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled and ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make to them.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from JAMES LLOYD, notifying the resignation of his seat in the Senate.

On motion of Mr. LEIB,

Resolved, That Mountjoy Bayly, Doorkeeper and Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate, be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ one assistant and two horses, for the purpose of performing such services as are usually required by the Doorkeeper of the Senate; which expense shall be paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. ANDERSON submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress during the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives is assembled, and have elected HENRY CLAY, Esquire, one of the Representatives for the State of Kentucky, their Speaker, and are ready to proceed to business. They concur in the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them; and have appointed a committee on their part.

TUESDAY, May 25.

Mr. ANDERSON reported, from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, and that the President informed the committee that he would make a communication to the two Houses this day at twelve o'clock.

President's Message.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senateand of the House of Representatives:

At an early day after the close of the last session of Congress, an offer was formally communicated from His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, of his mediation, as the common friend of the United States and Great Britain, for the purpose of facilitating a peace between them. The high character of the Emperor Alexander being a satisfactory pledge for the sincerity and impartiality of his offer, it was immediately accepted; and, as further proof of the disposition on the part of the United States to meet their adversary in honorable experiments for terminating the war, it was determined to avoid intermediate delays, incident to the distance of the parties, by a definitive provision for the contemplated negotiation. Three of our eminent citizens were accordingly commissioned, with the requisite powers to conclude a Treaty of Peace with persons clothed with like powers on the part of Great Britain. They are authorized also to enter into such conventional regulations of the commerce between the two countries, as may be mutually advantageous. The two Envoys who were in the United States at the time of their appointment, have proceeded to join their colleague already at St. Petersburg.

The Envoys have received another commission, authorizing them to conclude with Russia a Treaty of Commerce, with a view to strengthen the amicable relations and improve the beneficial intercourse between the two countries.

The issue of this friendly interposition of the Russian Emperor, and this pacific manifestation on the part of the United States, time only can decide. That the sentiments of Great Britain towards that Sover-sign will have produced an acceptance of his offered mediation must be presumed. That no adequate motives exist to prefer a continuance of war with the United States, to the terms on which they are willing to close it, is certain. The British Cabinet also must be sensible that, with respect to the important question of impressment, on which the war so essentially turns, a search for, or seizure of, British persons or property on board neutral vessels on the high seas is not a belligerent right derived from the law of nations; and it is obvious that no visit or search, or use of force for any purpose, on board the vessels of one independent power, on the high seas, can, in war or peace, be sanctioned by the laws or authority of another power. It is equally obvious, that, for the purpose of preserving to each State its seafaring members, by excluding them from the vessels of the other, the mode heretofore proposed by the United States, and now enacted by them as an article of municipal policy, cannot for a moment be compared with the mode practised by Great Britain with a conviction of its title to preference; inasmuch as the latter leaves the discrimination between the mariners of the two nations to officers exposed by unavoidable bias, as well as by a defect of evidence, to a wrong decision; under circumstances precluding, for the most part, the enforcement of controlling penalties, and where a wrong decision, besides the irreparable violation of the sacred rights of persons, might frustrate the plans and profits of entire voyages: whereas, the mode assumed by the United States, guards, with studied fairness and efficacy, against errors in such cases, and avoids the effect of casual errors on the safety of navigation, and the success of mercantile expeditions.

If the reasonableness of expectations, drawn from these considerations, could guaranty their fulfilment, a just peace would not be distant. But, it becomes the wisdom of the National Legislature to keep in mind the true policy, or rather the indispensable obligation, of adapting its measures to the supposition, that the only course to that happy event, is in the vigorous employment of the resources of war. And, painful as the reflection is, this duty is particularly enforced by the spirit and manner in which the war continues to be waged by the enemy, who, uninfluenced by the unvaried examples of humanity set them, are adding to the savage fury of it, on one frontier, a system of plunder, and conflagration on the other, equally forbidden by respect for national character, and by the established rules of civilized warfare.

As an encouragement to persevering and invigorated exertions to bring the contest to a happy result, I have the satisfaction of being able to appeal to the auspicious progress of our arms, both by land and on the water.

In continuation of the brilliant achievements of our infant Navy, a signal triumph has been gained by Captain Lawrence and his companions in the Hornet sloop of war, which destroyed a British sloop of war, with a celerity so unexampled, and with a slaughter of the enemy so disproportionate to the loss in the Hornet, as to claim for the conquerors the highest praise, and the full recompense provided by Congress in preceding cases. Our public ships of war in general, as well as the private armed vessels, have continued also their activity and success against the commerce of the enemy, and, by their vigilance and address, have greatly frustrated the efforts of the hostile squadrons distributed along our coasts, to intercept them in returning into port, and resuming their cruises.

The augmentation of our Naval force, as authorized at the last session of Congress, is in progress. On the Lakes our superiority is near at hand, where it is not already established.

The events of the campaign, so far as they are known to us, furnish matter of congratulation, and show that, under a wise organization and efficient direction, the Army is destined to a glory not less brilliant than that which already encircles the Navy. The attack and capture of York is, in that quarter, a presage of future and greater victories; while, on the western frontier, the issue of the late siege of Fort Meigs leaves us nothing to regret but a single act of inconsiderate valor.

The provisions last made for filling the ranks, and enlarging the staff of the Army, have had the best effects. It will be for the consideration of Congress, whether other provisions, depending on their authority, may not still further improve the Military Establishment and the means of defence.

The sudden death of the distinguished citizen who represented the United States in France,* without any special arrangements by him for such a contingency, has left us without the expected sequel to his last communications: nor has the French Government taken any measures for bringing the depending negotiations to a conclusion, through its representative in the United States. This failure adds to delays before so unreasonably spun out. A successor to our deceased Minister has been appointed, and is ready to proceed on his mission: the course which he will pursue in fulfilling it, is that prescribed by a steady regard to the true interests of the United States, which equally avoids an abandonment of their just demands, and a connection of their fortunes with the systems of other powers.

The receipts in the Treasury, from the 1st of October to the 31st day of March last, including the sums received on account of Treasury notes, and of the loans authorized by the acts of the last and preceding sessions of Congress, have amounted to fifteen millions four hundred and twelve thousand dollars. The expenditures during the same period amounted to fifteen millions nine hundred and twenty thousand dollars, and left in the Treasury, on the 1st of April, the sum of one million eight hundred and fifty-seven thousand dollars. The loan of sixteen millions of dollars, authorized by the act of the 8th of February last, has been contracted for. Of that sum more than a million of dollars had been paid into the Treasury, prior to the 1st of April, and formed a part of the receipts as above stated. The remainder of that loan, amounting to near fifteen millions of dollars, with the sum of five millions of dollars authorized to be issued in Treasury notes, and the estimated receipts from the customs and the sales of public lands, amounting to nine millions three hundred thousand dollars, and making in the whole twenty-nine millions three hundred thousand dollars to be received during the last nine months of the present year, will be necessary to meet the expenditures already authorized, and the engagements contracted in relation to the public debt. These engagements amount during that period to ten millions five hundred thousand dollars, which, with near one million for the civil, miscellaneous, and diplomatic expenses, both foreign and domestic, and seventeen millions eight hundred thousand dollars for the military and naval expenditures, including the ships of war building and to be built, will leave a sum in the Treasury at the end of the present year equal to that on the first of April last. A part of this sum may be considered as a resource for defraying any extraordinary expenses already authorized by law, beyond the sums above estimated; and a further resource for any emergency may be found in the sum of one million of dollars, the loan of which to the United States has been authorized by the State of Pennsylvania, but which has not yet been brought into effect.

This view of our finances, whilst it shows that due provision has been made for the expenses of the current year, shows, at the same time, by the limited amount of the actual revenue, and the dependence on loans, the necessity of providing more adequately for the future supplies of the Treasury. This can be best done by a well-digested system of internal revenue, in aid of existing sources; which will have the effect, both of abridging the amount of necessary loans, and on that account, as well as by placing the public credit on a more satisfactory basis, of improving the terms on which loans may be obtained. The loan of sixteen millions was not contracted for at a less interest than about seven and a half per cent., and, although other causes may have had an agency, it cannot be doubted that, with the advantage of a more extended and less precarious revenue, a lower rate of interest might have sufficed. A longer postponement of this advantage could not fail to have a still greater influence on future loans.

In recommending to the National Legislature this resort to additional taxes, I feel great satisfaction in the assurance, that our constituents, who have already displayed so much zeal and firmness in the cause of their country, will cheerfully give any other proof of their patriotism which it calls for. Happily, no people, with local and transitory exceptions, never to be wholly avoided, are more able than the people of the United States to spare for the public wants a portion of their private means, whether regard be had to the ordinary profits of industry, or the ordinary price of subsistence in our country, compared with those in any other. And in no case could stronger reasons be felt for yielding the requisite contributions. By rendering the public resources certain, and commensurate to the public exigencies, the constituted authorities will be able to prosecute the war the more rapidly to its proper issue; every hostile hope, founded on a calculated failure of our resources, will be cut off; and by adding to the evidence of bravery and skill, in combats on the ocean and the land, an alacrity in supplying the treasure necessary to give them their fullest effect, and demonstrating to the world the public energy which our political institutions combine, with the personal liberty distinguishing them, the best security will be provided against future enterprises on the rights or the peace of the nation.

The contest in which the United States are engaged, appeals for its support to every motive that can animate an uncorrupted and enlightened people; to the love of country; to the pride of liberty; to an emulation of the glorious founders of their independence, by a successful vindication of its violated attributes; to the gratitude and sympathy which demand security from the most degrading wrongs of a class of citizens, who have proved themselves so worthy the protection of their country, by their heroic zeal in its defence; and, finally, to the sacred obligation of transmitting entire, to future generations, that precious patrimony of national rights and independence which is held in trust by the present, from the goodness of Divine Providence.

Being aware of the inconveniences to which a protracted session, at this season, would be liable, I limit the present communication to objects of primary importance. In special messages which may ensue, regard will be had to the same consideration.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, May 25, 1818.

The Message was read, and five hundred copies ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

THURSDAY, May 27.

OBADIAH GREENMAN, from the State of New York, and SAMUEL SMITH, from the State of Maryland, severally took their seats in the Senate.

ROBERT HENRY GOLDSBOROUGH, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Maryland, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March last, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

A Message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House concur in the resolution of the Senate, of the 25th instant, for the appointment of Chaplains, and have appointed the Reverend JESSE LEE Chaplain on their part.

Whereupon, the Senate proceeded to the appointment of a Chaplain on their part; and, on the ballots being counted, it appeared that the Reverend JOHN BRECKENRIDGE had a majority, and was elected.

FRIDAY, May 28.

RICHARD BRENT, from the State of Virginia, and JOHN CONDIOT, from the State of New Jersey, severally took their seats in the Senate.

CHRISTOPHER GORE, appointed a Senator by the Executive of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in place of James Lloyd, resigned; and RUFUS KING, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of New York, for the term of six years, commencing with the fourth day of March last, severally produced their credentials, were qualified, and they took their seats in the Senate.

FRIDAY, June 4.

The credentials of CHRISTOPHER GORE, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in place of James Lloyd, resigned, were read.

MONDAY, June 7.

WILLIAM B. GILES, from the State of Virginia, who arrived the 5th instant, took his seat in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT communicated the credentials of WILLIAM H. WELLS, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Delaware, in place of James A. Bayard, resigned; which were read.

THURSDAY, June 10.

WILLIAM H. WELLS, from the State of Delaware, attended, was qualified, and took his seat.

TUESDAY, June 15.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Governor of the State of New Hampshire, stating that the Legislature of that State had elected JEREMIAH MASON a Senator, for the term of six years, commencing with the fourth day of March last; and the letter was read.

MONDAY, June 21.

JEREMIAH MASON, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire, for the term of six years, commencing with the fourth day of March last, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

FRIDAY, June 25.

Encouragement of Privateering.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the select committee on the petition of Joshua Barney, and others, which is as follows:

"That the object of the petition is to obtain, in favor of himself and others, the relinquishment of the claims of the United States to certain descriptions of enemy's property, captured and brought into the ports of the United States by certain private armed vessels. That the claims of the United States and the petitioner depend upon the provisions of existing laws, and present fair questions for judicial cognizance; these questions are in fact now depending before the proper judicial tribunals, with whose proceedings and decisions the committee deems it inexpedient at this time to interfere, and therefore recommends that the further consideration of the petition be postponed till the first Monday in December next."

And, on the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative—yeas 14, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bullock, Campbell, Daggett, German, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Leib, Mason, and Wells.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bledsoe, Brown, Chace, Condict, Fromentin, Gaillard, Giles, Howell, Lacock, Morrow, Robinson, Stone, Tait, Taylor, Turner, and Varnum.

On motion, by Mr. TAYLOR, the petition was committed to a select committee, further to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. GILES, TAYLOR, and ANDERSON, were appointed the committee.

MONDAY, June 28.

GEORGE M. BIBB, from the State of Kentucky, attended.

Massachusetts Memorial against the War.

Mr. GORE presented the remonstrance of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, declaring their opinion on the alleged causes of the existing war, and the pretences for its continuance; that it was improper, impolitic, and unjust; and stating the grounds on which they rest that opinion.

Further declaring their opinion on the admission of new States formed from lands beyond the territorial limits of the United States, and that many of the measures of the Government have been contrary to the expectations they formed in acceding to the constitution; that these measures have nearly annihilated their commerce, and have imposed on them unequal burdens, while they have deprived Massachusetts of her proportional weight in the Union; and praying that our invading armies may be forthwith recalled within our own territories, and that every effort may be speedily directed to the attainment of peace; and the remonstrance was read.

TUESDAY, June 29.

Mr. SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to reward the officers and crew of the sloop of war Hornet," reported it with amendments; which, on motion, were considered as in Committee of the Whole, and agreed to; and the President reported the bill to the House accordingly, and it was ordered to be read a third time as amended.

THURSDAY, July 1.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to relinquish the claims of the United States to certain goods, wares, and merchandise, captured by private armed vessels; and, the bill having been amended, the President reported it to the Senate accordingly.

On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 15, as follows:

By unanimous consent, the bill was read a third time, and passed.

MONDAY, August 2.

Resolved, That Messrs. VARNUM and GAILLARD be a committee on the part of the Senate, jointly with such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that, unless he may have any further communications to make to the two Houses of Congress, they are ready to adjourn.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives have appointed a committee on their part, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the intended recess of Congress.

Mr. VARNUM, from the committee, reported that they had waited on the President of the United States, who informed them that he had no further communications to make to the two Houses of Congress.

Whereupon, the VICE PRESIDENT, agreeably to the resolution of the two Houses, adjourned the Senate to the first Monday in December next.

CONFIDENTIAL EXECUTIVE PROCEEDINGS.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

MONDAY May 31.

Nomination of Ministers to treat for Peace with Great Britain under the mediation of Russia.

The following is an extract of a Message this day received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

Commissions having been granted during the recess of the Senate, to the following persons, I now nominate them to the same offices respectively annexed to their names: Albert Gallatin, John Q. Adams, and James A. Bayard, to be jointly and severally Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary, to negotiate and sign a Treaty of Peace with Great Britain, under the mediation of the Emperor of Russia; to negotiate and sign a Treaty of Commerce with Great Britain; and the said John Quincy Adams, Albert Gallatin, and James A. Bayard, to be jointly and severally Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary, to negotiate and sign a Treaty of Commerce with Russia.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, May 29, 1813.

The Message was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

NOTE.—A few other nominations of minor importance were contained in the Message.

WEDNESDAY, June 2.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Message of the President of the United States of the 3d of May, nominating Albert Gallatin and others to offices; and

Mr. King submitted the following resolutions for consideration, which were read:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate copies of the communications from the Emperor of Russia, offering his mediation to bring about a peace between the United States and Great Britain, together with copies of the answers to such communications, and noticing the dates at which the same were respectively received and answered.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of the commissions granted to Albert Gallatin, John Q. Adams, and James A. Bayard, to negotiate Treaties of Peace and Commerce with Great Britain, and a Treaty of Commerce with Russia.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether Albert Gallatin, commissioned as one of the Envoys to treat of peace and commerce with Great Britain, and of commerce with Russia, retains the office of Secretary of the Department of the Treasury; and, in case of his so retaining the same, to inform the Senate under what authority, and by whom, the powers and duties of the head of the Treasury Department are discharged during the absence of Albert Gallatin from the United States.

THURSDAY, June 3.

The Senate proceeded to consider the first resolution submitted yesterday, by Mr. King; and, on the question, "Will the Senate agree thereto?" it was determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Daggett, Dana, German, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Leib, and Smith.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bledsoe, Brent, Brown, Bullock, Campbell, Chace, Condict, Cutts, Gaillard, Lacock, Morrow, Robinson, Stone, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, and Worthington.

The Senate proceeded to consider the second resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. King; and, on the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the third resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. King; and, on the question, "Will the Senate agree thereto?" it was determined in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay the said resolution before the President of the United States.

MONDAY, June 7.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with their resolution, of the 3d instant, the Senate are informed that the office of the Secretary of the Treasury is not vacated, and that, in the absence of Albert Gallatin, commissioned as one of the Envoys to treat with Great Britain and Russia, the duties of that office are discharged by William Jones, Secretary of the Navy, authorized therefor according to the provisions of the act of Congress, entitled "An act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments," passed May 8, 1792.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, June 3, 1813.

Confidential Executive Proceedings.

WEDNESDAY, June 9.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the nomination of Albert Gallatin.

A motion was made by Mr. ANDERSON to refer the said nomination to the consideration of a select committee, together with the Message of the 7th of June; and the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, June 10.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the nomination of Albert Gallatin, together with the motion to refer the consideration thereof to a select committee, as also the Message of the President of the United States, received the 7th June, to inquire and report thereon.

On the question to agree to the motion for reference, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bledsoe, Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Leib, Smith, Stone, and Wells.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brent, Bullock, Campbell, Chace, Condict, Cutta, Lacock, Morrow, Robinson, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, and Worthington.

Resolved, That the nomination of Albert Gallatin, together with the Message of the President of the United States received the 7th instant, relative to the said nomination, be referred to Messrs. ANDERSON, KING, GILES, BROWN, and BLEDSOE, to inquire and report thereon.

MONDAY, June 14.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee appointed on the 10th instant, on the nomination of Albert Gallatin, reported:

"That, in obedience to the resolution authorizing the committee to inquire and report thereon, he had addressed a letter to the President of the United States, enclosing a copy of the resolution under which the committee were appointed; that he afterwards called on the President of the United States, who informed him that he did not consider the authority given to the committee, by the resolution, such as to authorize them to call on him in their official character; but that, if they were especially instructed to call on him he would freely receive them and appoint a time for that purpose."

And Mr. ANDERSON submitted the following resolutions for consideration, which were read:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate, the powers and duties of the Secretary of the Department of the Treasury, and of those of an Envoy Extraordinary to a foreign power, are so incompatible, that they ought not to be, and remain, united in the same person.

Resolved, That the committee to whom was referred the nomination of Albert Gallatin, (Secretary of the Department of Treasury,) as an Envoy Extraordinary to treat of peace and commerce with Great Britain, and of commerce with Russia, be instructed to communicate the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States, and respectfully to confer with him upon the matter thereof.

WEDNESDAY, June 16.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions submitted by Mr. ANDERSON, on the 14th instant; and, on the question to agree to the first resolution, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bledsoe, Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Leib, Smith, Stone, and Wells.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brent, Bullock, Campbell, Chace, Condict, Howell, Lacock, Morrow, Robinson, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, and Worthington.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate, the powers and the duties of the Secretary of the Department of the Treasury, and those of an Envoy Extraordinary to a foreign power, are so incompatible, that they ought not to be and remain united in the same person.

On the question to agree to the second resolution, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bledsoe, Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Leib, Smith, Stone, and Wells.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brent, Bullock, Campbell, Chace, Condict, Howell, Lacock, Morrow, Robinson, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, and Worthington.

Resolved, That the committee to whom was referred the nomination of Albert Gallatin, Secretary of the Department of the Treasury, as an Envoy Extraordinary to treat of peace and commerce with Great Britain, and of commerce with Russia, be instructed to communicate the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States, and respectfully to confer with him upon the matter thereof.

MONDAY, July 19.

Whereupon, the nominations of Albert Gallatin John Q. Adams, and James A. Bayard, agreeably to the Message of the President of the United States of the 81st of May last, were resumed.

On the question, "Will the Senate advise and consent to the appointment of Albert Gallatin?" it was determined in the negative—yeas 17, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Bledsoe, Brent, Brown, Bullock, Campbell, Chace, Condict, Howell, Lacock, Morrow, Robinson, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, and Worthington.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anderson, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Leib, Mason, Smith, and Stone.

On motion by Mr. WORTHINGTON, to postpone the nominations of John Q. Adams and James A. Bayard until to-morrow, it was determined in the negative.

On motion by Mr. BULLOCK, that the nominations of John Q. Adams and James A. Bayard be postponed until to-morrow, it was determined in the negative—yeas 16, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Brent, Bullock, Campbell, Chace, Condict, Gaillard, Howell, Lacock, Morrow, Robinson, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, and Worthington.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bledsoe, Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, German, Giles, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Leib, Mason, Smith, and Stone.

On the question, "Will the Senate advise and consent to the appointment of John Q. Adams?" it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 29, nays 4, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bledsoe, Brent, Brown, Bullock, Chace, Condict, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, Giles, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Lambert, Leib, Mason, Morrow, Robinson, Smith, Stone, Tait, Taylor, Turner, and Worthington.

NAYS.—Messrs. Dana, German, Lacock, and Varnum.

On the question, "Will the Senate advise and consent to the appointment of James A. Bayard?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Bledsoe, Brent, Brown, Bullock, Chace, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, Giles, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Lambert, Leib, Mason, Smith, Stone, Tait, Taylor, Turner, and Worthington.

NAYS.—Messrs. Dana, German, Lacock, Morrow, Robinson, and Varnum.

Resolved, That the Senate do advise and consent to the appointments of John Q. Adams and James A. Bayard, agreeably to their nominations, respectively; and that they do not advise and consent to the appointment of Albert Gallatin.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay the foregoing resolution before the President of the United States.

SATURDAY, July 31.

On motion, by Mr. DANA, that on application of any member of the Senate, an extract be furnished from the Executive record comprehending the Messages of the President of the United States, in relation to the nomination of Jonathan Russell, to be Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to Sweden, and the proceedings of the Senate thereon, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 15, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Hunter, King, Lambert, Leib, Turner, and Wells.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brent, Bullock, Campbell, Howell, Lacock, Morrow, Stone, Tait, Taylor, Varnum, and Worthington.

MONDAY, August 2.

On motion, by Mr. LEIB,

Ordered, That the Secretary cause to be printed, for the use of the Senate, an extract from the Executive Journal, comprehending the several Messages from the President of the United States, with the documents and the proceedings of the Senate on the nomination of Jonathan Russell to be Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to Sweden.

MONDAY, May 31.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

The Swedish Government having repeatedly manifested a desire to exchange a public Minister with the United States, and having lately appointed one with that view, and other considerations occurring to render it advisable at this period to make a corresponding appointment, I nominate Jonathan Russell, of Rhode Island, to be Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to Sweden.

JAMES MADISON.

MAY 29, 1818.

The Message was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

TUESDAY, June 1.

The Senate took into consideration the Message from the President of the United States of yesterday, nominating Jonathan Russell to office; and, on motion by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, the further consideration thereof was postponed.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH submitted the following motion for consideration; which was read:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate when, and by whom, the first intelligence was officially communicated to the Department of State, of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, and at what time the first official information of the repeal of these decrees was given to the American Chargé des Affaires at Paris.

WEDNESDAY, June 2.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the nomination of Jonathan Russell, together with the motion submitted yesterday by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH; and, on motion by Mr. KING, the motion was amended and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether any communication has been received from Jonathan Russell, admitting or denying the declaration of the Duke of Bassano to Mr. Barlow, that he had informed his predecessor of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees at the date of that decree.

Ordered, That the resolution, together with the nomination of Jonathan Russell, be referred to Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, Mr. ANDERSON, and Mr. KING, to consider and report thereon.

MONDAY, June 7.

Nomination of Jonathan Russell.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 2d instant, the nomination of Jonathan Russell, reported :

That in pursuance of the order of the Senate, the committee met the Secretary of State by appointment at the office of the Department of State, when they were informed by the Secretary, that there was no official denial or admission of Mr. Jonathan Russell, that the allegation of the Duke of Bassano to Mr. Barlow, referred to, was true; but that he (the Secretary) had a private letter from Mr. Russell subsequent to the allegation of the Duke of Bassano, in which he understood that allegation to be unequivocally denied.

And, on motion, it was ordered that the further consideration of said nomination be postponed.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH submitted the following motion for consideration, which was read :

Resolved, That it is inexpedient at this time to send a Minister Plenipotentiary to Sweden.

MONDAY, JUNE 14.

The President declines conferring with a Committee of the Senate.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES :

To the Senate of the United States :

I have received from the committee appointed by the resolution of the Senate of the 14th day of June, a copy of that resolution, which authorizes the committee to confer with the President on the subject of the nomination made by him of a Minister Plenipotentiary to Sweden.

Conceiving it to be my duty to decline the proposed conference with the committee, and it being uncertain when it may be convenient to explain to the committee, and through them to the Senate, the grounds of my so doing, I think it proper to address the explanation directly to the Senate. Without entering into a general review of the relations in which the constitution has placed the several departments of the Government to each other, it will suffice to remark, that the Executive and Senate, in the cases of appointments to office and of treaties, are to be considered independent and co-ordinate with each other. If they agree, the appointments or treaties are made. If the Senate disagree, they fail. If the Senate wish information previous to their final decision, the practice, keeping in view the constitutional relation of the Senate and Executive, has been, either to request the Executive to furnish it, or refer the subject to a committee of their body to communicate, either formally or informally, with the head of the proper department. The appointment of a committee of the Senate to confer immediately with the Executive himself, appears to lose sight of the co-ordinate relation between the Executive and the Senate, which the constitution has established, and which ought therefore to be maintained.

The relation between the Senate and House of Representatives, in whom legislative power is concurrently vested, is sufficiently analogous to illustrate that between the Executive and Senate in making appointments and treaties. The two Houses are in like manner independent of and co-ordinate with each other; and the invariable practice of each in appointing committees of conference and consultation is to commission them to confer, not with the co-ordinate body itself, but with a committee of that body: and although both branches of the Legislature may be too numerous to hold conveniently a conference with committees, were they to be appointed by either to confer with the entire body of the other, it may be fairly presumed, that if the whole number of either branch were not too large for the purpose, the objection to such a conference, being against the principle, as derogatory from the co-ordinate relations of the two Houses, would retain all its force.

I add only that I am entirely persuaded of the purity of the intentions of the Senate, in the course they have pursued on this occasion, and with which my view of the subject makes it my duty not to accord: and that they will be cheerfully furnished with all the suitable information in possession of the Executive, in any mode deemed consistent with the principles of the constitution, and the settled practice under it.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, July 6, 1818.

FRIDAY, July 9.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the nomination of Jonathan Russell, of Rhode Island, to be Minister Plenipotentiary to Sweden, together with the motion of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, under consideration yesterday, thereon; and, on the question to agree to the motion, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 22, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Bledsoe, Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Loeck, Lambert, Leib, Mason, Stone, and Wells.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brent, Bullock, Campbell, Chace, Condict, Howell, Morrow, Robinson, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, and Worthington.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient, at this time, to send a Minister Plenipotentiary to Sweden.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States.

TUESDAY, July 20.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES :

[CONFIDENTIAL.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States :

There being sufficient ground to infer that it is the purpose of the enemy to combine with the blockade of our ports special licenses to neutral vessels, or to British vessels in neutral disguises, whereby they may draw from our country the precise kind and quantity of exports essential to their wants, whilst its general commerce remains obstructed; keeping in view, also, the insidious discrimination between the different ports of the United States; and as such a system, if not counteracted, will have the effect of diminishing very materially the pressure of the war on the enemy, and encouraging a perseverance in it, at the same time that it will leave the general commerce of the United States under all the pressure the enemy can impose, thus subjecting the whole to British regulation, in subserviency to British monopoly; I recommend to the consideration of Congress the expediency of an immediate and effectual prohibition of exports, limited to a convenient day in their next session, and removable in the mean time in the event of a cessation of the blockade of our ports.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, July 20, 1818.

The Message was read, and referred to the committee who have under consideration so much of the Message of the President of the United States as concerns our foreign relations, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

From Ohio—John Alexander, James Caldwell, James Kilbourn, and John McLean.

From Louisiana—Thomas B. Robertson.

A large majority having been thus ascertained to be present, on motion of Mr. FINDLEY, the House proceeded to the choice of a SPEAKER by ballot.

Mr. LEWIS, Mr. ROBERTS, and Mr. McKIM, the tellers named by the clerk, having counted the ballots, Mr. LEWIS reported that the votes were as follows:

HENRY CLAY	-	-	-	-	89
TIMOTHY PITKIN	-	-	-	-	54
Scattering	-	-	-	-	5

It was accordingly declared that Mr. CLAY was duly elected, and he was conducted by the tellers to the Chair, from which, after having been sworn, he addressed the House in the following words:

GENTLEMEN: In returning to the station in which I am replaced by a continuance of your favor, whilst I am sensible of the honor which I have received, I am sensible also of my inability to fulfil the expectations justly raised by so elevated a distinction; but, gentlemen, the experience I have had, limited as it is, has satisfied me that, in the maintenance of the order of the House, less depends upon the presiding officer than upon the sense of the necessity of decorum being generally diffused throughout the body. Then only will a deliberative assembly be well governed, and its business agreeably transacted, when each member, identifying the reputation of the body to which he belongs in his own, shall make the preservation of its order an affair of personal and individual concern, and shall render to the Chair a candid, liberal, and unbiased support. Under the hope and persuasion that you participate with me in these sentiments, I shall proceed to administer the duties you have been pleased to assign me.

The members were then sworn in by States.

JONATHAN JENNINGS having also appeared, and produced his credentials as the Delegate from the Indiana Territory, the oath was administered to him.

The House then proceeded to the choice of a Clerk; when PATRICK MAGRUDER was declared to be chosen, he having 111 votes.

On motion of Mr. FINDLAY, Thomas Claxton was reappointed Doorkeeper to the House, Thomas Dunn Sergeant-at-Arms, and Benjamin Burch Assistant Doorkeeper.

Mr. DAWSON and Mr. WINTER were appointed a committee, on the part of this House, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make to them.

TUESDAY, May 25.

Several other members, to wit: from Vermont, WILLIAM STRONG; from New York, ALEXANDER BOYD and WILLIAM S. SMITH; from Delaware, THOMAS COOPER; from Virginia, JOHN G. JACKSON; and from North Carolina, MESHACK FRANKLIN, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

Mr. DAWSON, from the joint committee appointed yesterday to wait on the President of the United States, and to inform him that a quorum of the two Houses was assembled, and ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make to them, reported that the committee had performed that service, and that the President answered that he would make a communication to the two Houses to-day at twelve o'clock.

A Message was then received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Message was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

[For this Message, see Senate proceedings of this date, ante p. 5.]

WEDNESDAY, May 26.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, DANIEL DEWEY; from New York, NATHANIEL HOWELL; from New Jersey, JAMES SCHUREMAN; and from Maryland, ALEXANDER C. HANSON, and NICHOLAS R. MOORE, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

The House then proceeded to ballot for a Chaplain, and, upon examining the ballot, it appeared that the Reverend JESSE LEE was duly elected.

Reference of the Message.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, it was Resolved, That so much of the Message as relates to Foreign Affairs, be referred to a select committee.

After the adoption of these resolves,

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) rose and adverted to that part of the Message which alludes to the inhumanity of the enemy, expressed his abhorrence of the enormities committed by them, as well in the massacre of our citizens on the Western frontier, as the conflagration of our little towns on the maritime border. The latter outrage had not been pretended to be denied, but had been apologized for (by whom he did not say) on the pretence that our people had first fired on one of their flags. Although he believed the allegation false, he was glad that it was thought necessary to make any apology for it. The facts, however, in both cases, ought to be inquired into and distinctly ascertained. If found to be as public report had stated them, they called for the indignation of all Christendom, and they ought to be embodied in an authentic document, which might perpetuate them on the page of history. These were substantially the remarks with which Mr. CLAY prefaced the following resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the spirit and manner in which the war has been waged by the enemy, be referred to a select committee.

The resolution was adopted without opposition or division.

THURSDAY, May 27.

Another member, to wit, from Pennsylvania, JOHN M. HYNEMAN, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

FRIDAY, May 28.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, ABIEL WOOD; from Pennsylvania, JOHN REA and JOHN WILSON; from Virginia, DANIEL SHEFFREY; from South Carolina, WM. LOWNDES, from Georgia, BOLLING HALL, and from Kentucky, STEPHEN ORMSBY, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

After the reception of sundry petitions, the House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, May 31.

Several other members, to wit: from Maryland, CHARLES GOLDBOROUGH; from North Carolina, JOHN CULPEPER; and from South Carolina, LANGDON CHEVES, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

FRIDAY, JUNE 4.

Two other members, to wit: from New York, SAMUEL M. HOPKINS; and from Delaware,

Vol. V.—2

HENRY M. RIDGELY, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

MONDAY, June 7.

SHADRAK BOND appeared, was qualified, and took his seat, as the Delegate from the Illinois Territory.

TUESDAY, June 8.

Two other members, to wit: from Pennsylvania, HUGH GLASGOW; and from Ohio, REZIN BEALL, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

THURSDAY, June 10.

Mr. HEMPSTEAD appeared, was qualified, and took his seat as the Delegate from the Missouri Territory.

The Ways and Means.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made the following report:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the establishment of a well-digested system of internal revenue, have had the same under consideration. They deem it unnecessary to say any thing as to the necessity of providing additional revenue at a time when the general rate of expenditure has been so much increased by measures necessarily connected with a state of war. A reference to the reports from the Treasury Department and from the Committee of Ways and Means, during the last and preceding years, will show that a provision for additional revenue can no longer be delayed without a violation of all those principles held sacred in every country where the value and importance of national credit have been justly estimated. They have reviewed the system heretofore presented, and taking into consideration its having been sanctioned in its principles by a vote of the House of Representatives, have determined to recommend its adoption, with some modification, in preference to commencing a new system at a period when neither the principles or details could receive that mature consideration on which alone they could venture to recommend its adoption. The bills heretofore reported were founded on estimates which assumed for a basis the providing a revenue sufficient to meet the expenses of the Peace Establishment, the interest on the old debt, and on such new loans as have been or may hereafter be authorized. These several items for the year 1814, are estimated as follows: The expenses of the Peace Establishment $7,000,000

The interest on the public debt—
On the old funded	2,100,000
On six per cent. stock of 1812, including temporary loans received in part of the loan of $11,000,000, which will remain unpaid in 1814	500,000
On six per cent. stock of 1813	1,090,000
On Treasury Notes, which will be reimbursable in 1814, say on $5,900,000 at 5 2-5 per cent.	270,000
On the loan for 1814—interest payable within that year	440,000

4. A bill establishing the office of Commissioner of the Revenue.
5. A bill laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise.
6. A bill laying duties on carriages for the conveyance of persons.
7. A bill laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors.
8. A bill laying duties on sales at auction of foreign merchandise and of ships and vessels.
9. A bill laying duties on sugars refined within the United States.
10. A bill laying duties on bank notes and on notes of hand, and foreign bills of exchange of certain descriptions.
11. A bill making further provision for the collection of internal duties.
12. A bill laying an additional duty on foreign tonnage.

The several bills above recited were read twice, and referred to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for Monday.

French Decrees.

Mr. WEBSTER rose, as he said, to call the attention of the House to a subject of considerable importance—a task which he had hoped would have fallen into the hands of some other gentleman better qualified than himself to undertake it. He then read the resolutions which will be found below. In offering these resolutions, it was not his intention, he said, to enter into any discussion or argument, or to advance any proposition whatever, on which gentlemen could adopt different views or take different sides. He would merely remark, by way of explanation, what would be remembered by all, that the subjects to which these resolutions referred, were intimately connected with the cause of the present war. The revocation of the Orders in Council of Great Britain was the main point on which the war turned, and it had been demanded for the reason that the French decrees had ceased to exist. This then was the point at issue. Mr. W. remarked on what he termed the contradictory evidence on this head : the letter of Mr. Champagny on one hand asserting the revocation ; the speech of the Emperor to the free cities on the other denying it ; the decisions of the French Admiralty Courts on one hand, and opposite decisions of the same courts on the other. The whole matter, in short, was involved in doubt. But, on the declaration of war, and not until then, a decree appeared repealing the French decrees ; a decree, which, if issued, had laid dormant, mere brutum fulmen, until after the war commenced, and then only made its appearance. In March last, it would also be recollected, the President had communicated to Congress, immediately before its adjournment, certain correspondence between our Government and its Minister in France, the prominent feature of which correspondence was, that, in an interview between our Minister and the French Secretary for Foreign Affairs, which took place about the 1st of May, 1812, it was stated by the latter that the decree in question had been put into the hands of our Minister in France, and transmitted to the French Minister in the United States, at the time at which it bore date. To shed light on this transaction, Mr. W. said, it was, that he moved these resolves, in the discharge of what he deemed a duty to his constituents and his country. The declaration of the French Minister had a great bearing on the reputation of the country—on the reputation of those persons who, in their official characters, represented the dignity of the nation. To place their conduct in its proper light, he presented to the consideration of the House the following resolutions :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, unless the public interest should in his opinion forbid such communication, when, by whom, and in what manner, the first intelligence was given to this Government of the decree of the Government of France, bearing date on the 28th April, 1811, and purporting to be a definitive repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether Mr. Russell, the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at the Court of France, has ever admitted or denied to this Government the correctness of the declaration of the Duke of Bassano to Mr. Barlow, the late Minister of the United States at that Court, as stated in Mr. Barlow's letter of the 12th May, 1812, to the Secretary of State, "that the said decree of April 28, 1811, has been communicated to his (Mr. Barlow's) predecessor there ;" and to lay before the House any correspondence with Mr. Russell, relative to that subject, which it may not be improper to communicate ; and also any correspondence between Mr. Barlow and Mr. Russell, on that subject, which may be in possession of the Department of State.

[H. OF R.]

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether the Minister of France, near the United States, ever informed this Government of the existence of the said decree of the 28th April, 1811, and to lay before the House any correspondence that may have taken place with the said Minister relative thereto, which the President may not think improper to be communicated.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House any other information which may be in his possession, and which he may not deem it injurious to the public interest to disclose, relative to the said decree of the 28th April, 1811, and tending to show at what time, by whom, and in what manner, the said decree was first made known to this Government, or to any of its representatives or agents.

Resolved, That the President be requested, in case the fact be that the first information of the existence of said decree of the 28th April, 1811, ever received by this Government, or any of its ministers or agents, was that communicated in May, 1812, by the Duke of Bassano to Mr. Barlow, and by him to his Government, as mentioned in his letter to the Secretary of State, of May 12, 1812, and the accompanying papers, to inform this House whether the Government of the United States has ever required from that of France any explanation of the reasons of that decree being concealed from this Government and its Ministers for so long a time after its date; and if such explanation has been asked by this Government, and has been omitted to be given by that of France, whether this Government has made any remonstrance, or expressed any dissatisfaction to the Government of France, at such concealment.

Mr. GROSVENOR having required the yeas and nays on the question of proceeding now to consider the resolutions, they were found to be— for consideration 182, against it 28.*

FRIDAY, June 11.

French Decrees.

The House proceeded to the consideration of several resolutions proposed by Mr. WEBSTER a day or two ago, the first of which was read in the following words:

“Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, unless the public interest should, in his opinion, forbid such communication, when, by whom, and in what manner, the first intelligence was given to this Government of the decree of the Government of France, bearing date on the 28th of April, 1811, and purporting to be a definitive repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan.”

Mr. CALHOUN said he did not rise to oppose the passage of this resolution on account of its object; but he objected to the novelty of the form of the resolution. The resolution went further than merely asking for information; it also asks, when and by whom the information in question was received. Such form and particularity was unprecedented in such cases. He rose to ask the precise object of the gentleman in giving this form to his motion. What use was intended to be made of the information called for?

Mr. WEBSTER said, with respect to the use to be made of the information to be obtained, it would depend on what that information should be. With respect to the form of the resolution, it had been offered in this form because it was on a subject on which he wished for particular information, of that nature which was designated by its terms.

Mr. CALHOUN said he could not but think that the gentleman from New Hampshire had rather eluded than answered his inquiries. I asked, said Mr. C., the reason of the novelty of the form. The gentleman says his object is particular information. If information only be wanted, I am willing to join gentlemen in asking for every information they may wish. But I object to the novelty of the form; to the use of so particular terms. Mr. C. submitted to the good judgment of gentlemen the propriety of varying the language of the resolve.

Mr. GROSVENOR said, without entering into the merits of the resolve, he would state the impressions of his mind as to the form of it. The gentleman from South Carolina had admitted that suspicion had attached to this Government as to the decree in question. [Mr. CALHOUN said he did not admit the fact; but had said that this matter had been so handled as that it might have created suspicion.] A general resolution had been adopted at the close of the last session calling for information on this subject, when the President had transmitted to the House the repealing decree, without affording the information in respect to it which was sought by these resolves, the object of which was, to sweep away entirely the charge which had been made against the Government; to give the Executive a proper opportunity for transmitting to the House information on this subject, which would completely exculpate him. The particularity of the resolutions objected to by the gentleman, was essential to their object, as describing what information was desired. If such information as was desired was in the Office of State, it required a particular call to elicit it, as the general resolution adopted at the end of the last session had not brought it forth.

Mr. WEBSTER said he had not been aware that there was any particular form of calls for information. He should rather have supposed that the form would be governed by a general regard to the purpose in view; that questions would be therein asked bearing on the points in relation to which information was wished for. He asked the gentleman whether there was not apparent on the public records the necessity of calling on the Executive, if at all, for information through whom this decree had been first received. The French Minister had declared that the decree had been transmitted through two channels. Was not the inquiry, then, material through which, if either, it had been received? Mr. W. said he would not go the whole length which the gentleman from South Carolina had gone, in saying that suspicion had attached to the Government on this head. He would say for his part he entertained none. The particularity of the call arose from the nature of the information wished; and if there was novelty in the form, it was because a similar case had never arisen.

* These resolutions gave rise to the principal debate of the session, and the answers to them were expected to inculcate the Government for concealing a knowledge of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees until after the declaration of war, and thereby bringing on the war with Great Britain; but the answers were different from what had been expected, and gave an advantage to the administration. The fact was, the French decree was ante-dated.

Mr. CALHOUN said he was glad the gentleman had at last come to the point. The gentleman from New Hampshire, adverting to the correspondence of Mr. Barlow, says that the French decree had been alleged to have been transmitted through two sources to our Government. The first of these resolves inquires through whom and in what manner this decree had been communicated. The second and third resolutions embrace the object avowed by the gentleman, viz: an inquiry whether the decree in question had been received through either of the two channels designated by the Duke of Bassano. Why, then, after being thus precise in two separate resolutions, was the President, in addition to these specific inquiries, called upon to inform the House through whom and in what manner the decree had been received by him? Was not this language (wholly unnecessary with the object which the gentleman avowed) calculated to bring up a third idea, not avowed by the mover, that the decree might have been received through some other channel than either of those through which the Duke of Bassano had declared to Mr. Barlow that he had forwarded it? If inquiry was meant only as to the two modes of communication indicated in the correspondence, the terms of the first resolve were unnecessary as well as indecorous; if otherwise, there were no facts on which to rest suspicion or ground inquiry.

Mr. C. concluded by moving to strike out the resolution the words "by whom and in what manner."

Mr. McKEE rose for the purpose of proposing an amendment which, he said, would supersede the one proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina. His object was to strike out the whole of the resolutions, and in lieu thereof insert a resolution, which he read, calling upon the President generally for information on this head. He said he was persuaded there was no gentleman in the House desirous to detain from the public eye any information which he had any reason to believe calculated at all to enlighten the public mind, or mature the opinions of gentlemen of the House in relation to our concerns with foreign nations. But there certainly was something due to the Chief Magistrate of the nation. It was impossible for any man to read the resolutions without perceiving that they might be construed injuriously to the Executive. Why not ask for the information desired in respectful terms? Was the House likely to arrive at its object in this way sooner than by a decorous and respectful course? He saw no propriety in the particular terms of the resolution, especially when the information desired might be as easily obtained by pursuing a different course. He was as anxious as the gentleman who moved the resolutions to lay before the nation every particle of information in relation to the decree dated the 28th of April, 1811. So far as he was informed, the conduct of France in relation to that matter, was as he had frequently believed it to be, insincere, base, and abominable. He wished that every man in the nation might see and detect it.

Mr. SHERFFEY said the honorable member from Kentucky might as well vote against the inquiry altogether, as substitute the motion which he had read. It was, no doubt, well known to that gentleman, that a resolution, in the very terms perhaps which he had read, had been adopted at the last session, the result of which we have seen. The same answer might be expected to the resolve read by the gentleman, if it was adopted in preference to those now under consideration.

Mr. McKEE said he had no knowledge of the adoption, at the last session, of a resolution similar to that which he had moved. If such a one could be shown on the Journals, he would withdraw his motion.

Mr. SHERFFEY then quoted the Journal of the 1st of March last, containing a resolution, moved by Mr. GOLDBOROUGH, calling for a authenticated copy of the decree, purporting to be a revocation of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, and also for information as to the time and manner of its communication, &c.

I believe it will be found, continued Mr. S., that this motion, then adopted, substantially embraces the requisition contained in the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky. That resolution required a copy of the decree in question, together with information of the time and manner of its communication, and also any correspondence or facts related thereto. I ask the gentleman whether he recollects the result of this inquiry? Did we get any information as to the time and manner of promulgating that decree? We had communicated to us, without any explanation or declaration on the part of the Executive, several extracts of letters from Mr. Barlow to the Secretary of State, in one of which he expressly said, that the Duke of Bassano did state that the repealing decree had been communicated to our Government through two channels, at as early a date as May, 1811. What follows? Either the assertion of the Duke of Bassano is true or it is not true. Whether it be or be not, is a matter highly important to this nation, to the people, to their Representatives, to whom is committed the administration and superintendence of their affairs; not only so far as the constitution has commit ted a legislative duty to this House, but also so far as it is its duty to see that the powers confided to other departments of the Government are honestly and fairly executed. If the President in 1811 was possessed of this decree, as has been asserted by the French Minister, I hesitate not to pronounce, under the high responsibility of my situation as a member of the Grand Inquest of the Nation, that the conduct of the President deserves not only the scrutiny but the reprehension of the nation; for such information would show that the nation has been involved in war without the least necessity. It is manifest that if this decree was known to our Government in 1811, and had been known to the people, and used in the manner it ought to have been, the Orders in Council, the great cause of the war, would have been done away; and if they had, would any man say that we should have been plunged into the disastrous and ruinous war in which we are now engaged? It is undeniable, if the Orders in Council had been repealed, that we should not have been engaged in the present war. I conceive that the resolutions ought to be specific, to remain as they are. If we want any information at all, it is that designated in the words moved to be expunged by the gentleman from South Carolina. It may turn out, and I hope it will, that the French assertion in this respect was, as French assertions generally are, false, and to have been only an attempt further to inveigle us. I hope that will turn out to be the case; in some degree I am confident such will prove to be the fact. Although I do not agree with the President of the United States in his present policy, charity and my own opinion of his personal character forbid me from believing that the President could have had this decree in his possession for more than two years, and that merely to preserve the consistency of his proclamation of November, 1810, he should have suppressed it. I will not believe it; I will, until it shall prove to be otherwise, believe the French assertion to be false.

Mr. FISK rose but to say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Virginia. I could wish, said Mr. F., when questions of a public nature are brought before the House, with the express view of giving information, that the statements on which they are founded might be correct. I deny entirely the conclusion just drawn, that if the Executive was in possession of this information, and had communicated it, it would have prevented the war. Is it not known to the nation that the British Minister, Mr. Foster, after quibbling for months, was at length brought by Mr. Monroe to a definite answer, that if the French decrees were repealed, the Orders in Council would not be revoked? And, are we now to be told, if that decree of repeal had been produced, it would have prevented the war? I presume it will be found that the decree was not in possession of our Government; but, if it had been, its promulgation would not have prevented the war. Mr. F. said he had only risen to express this idea, and to state his surprise to hear every attempt made on every occasion to shield the British Government from blame, and to impute it to our own Government.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had hoped that there would have been no division of opinion on this subject—that there would have been no objection to such a modification of this resolution as had been proposed by him. He would state the circumstance which he thought ought to govern gentlemen in paying some little deference to the feelings and wishes of those on this side of the House. What were the facts on which the resolutions were grounded? A few days before the end of the last session of Congress, on motion of a gentleman from Maryland, a resolution was adopted calling on the President for certain information relative to our relations with France. The President, on the next day but one, that is, on the last day of the session, made a communication, which, among other things, stated a conversation which had taken place between Mr. Barlow, our late Minister to France, and the Duke of Bassano, relative to the repeal of the French decrees. Mr. Barlow expressed his surprise when the decree of 28th April, 1811, was produced, that it had been so long concealed. The Duke of Bassano replied, that it had been communicated to our Minister in France,* and the French Minister in this country, at the time it was issued. It is fair to acknowledge that that order must have been ante-dated, or concealed by the French Government, or communicated to the Executive, and by them concealed. Whatever form of inquiry gentlemen might think proper to adopt, by which to prove that the decree was ante-dated or concealed, Mr. C. was willing should be adopted. The House ought not, however, in the present stage of this business, to presume that the repealing decree had been communicated to the Executive and by him concealed. He would not attribute such motives to the gentleman from New Hampshire—he was too honorable to be actuated by them. No man who looks into his own heart and finds purity there, will be liable to misrepresent the motives of others. The resolution, as hastily read, would nevertheless convey the idea to which he had just alluded. He wished the gentleman from New Hampshire, then, would consent to expunge these words; and he asked it the more confidently, as the gentleman himself had shown that those words were mere surplusage, because the object which he professed to have in view was embraced in two distinct resolutions which follow the first. If, when the President should make a reply to the resolutions thus amended, there should be any circumstance leading to a suspicion of concealment, it would be competent to any gentleman to move an additional explanatory resolution; and Mr. C. distinctly pledged himself for one, should any ambiguity appear in the reply, that he would join gentlemen in voting for further inquiry. But he had the firmest belief that nothing was withheld that was necessary to be known, and that all would be satisfactorily cleared up.

* Mr. Jonathan Russell, the then Chargé d'Affaires.

Before he sat down he would advert to one thing. The gentleman from New Hampshire, in moving these resolves, said (according to the report of his speech in the National Intelligencer) to this effect: that the question at issue between the Governments of America and Great Britain, on which the declaration of war turned, was, whether the French decrees were or were not repealed. And the gentleman from Virginia had to-day spoken to the same effect. Mr. C. said he would not, on the present occasion, go to the trouble of dilating at large on that point; but he would observe that the gentleman had presumed to do for us in this case what would be considered very extraordinary to have been done in a suit at law. He, the defendant in the action, had drawn the declaration for the plaintiff, and pointed out the issue. This was as unfair in a political as it would be in a legal contest. Mr. C. said he had always distinctly contended for the right to consider the injuries done to us by each belligerent on their own ground. This had been his course, because a different one would have been as unworthy a nation, as it would have been unworthy of an individual. What! said he, shall we make the right of obtaining redress from England dependent on the justice of France? He, for his part, would take a higher, a different ground. He saw what had led the gentleman into error—he had mistaken the means of redress for the injury to be redressed. This country had, indeed, in its great efforts to preserve peace and neutrality, endeavored to get one of the belligerents to repeal its offensive edicts, in order to induce the other to do the same. Our Government (said Mr. C.) did descend one step in passing the act of 1810, under which France did (or, as the gentlemen over the way would say, pretended to) repeal her decrees of Berlin and Milan. Britain did refuse to proceed pari passu with France in this repeal. I will now place this question at rest forever; this fact shall hereafter forever be without contradiction. England did say to this country, even if France did repeal her decrees in relation to us she would not repeal her Orders in Council. This she did say by the solemn declaration of the Prince Regent, dated 21st April, 1812. No gentleman dare hereafter reiterate the statement that if France had bona fide repealed her decrees, as regards America, England would have followed her example. Most indubitably gentlemen who so highly appreciate British faith will not discredit the evidence I produce. By some unaccountable means they have heretofore contrived to throw a cloud over it, to keep it out of sight. A further evidence in proof of my assertion is, that when there was no longer a shade of doubt hanging over the repeal of the French decrees, that is to say, for thirty-five days after the official communication to the British Government, of the French decree, bearing date the 28th April, 1811—no repeal of the Orders in Council took place. What process was going on in Britain in that interval? During these days a most laborious inquiry was in progress in the House of Commons, into the effects, beneficial or otherwise, produced on the commercial interest of Britain by her Orders in Council of 1807 and 1809; during all which time the British Ministry not only approbated and supported them, but took higher ground in relation to them than they had ever done before. They entirely gave up the pretended retaliatory character of the Orders in Council; they were bound to give it up. Men of common sense could no longer have defended them on that ground. The question was, in terms, whether or not our commerce, that is neutral commerce, should be made subservient to British monopoly. And how, finally, were the Orders in Council repealed? After it had been made clear as the light of the sun in heaven, that they were injurious to British commerce. Will the gentleman from Virginia now say that England would have repealed her Orders in Council, as to us, if she had been convinced that France had in the same manner revoked or modified her decrees? The gentleman dare not say it. No, sir, he dare not, because I shall prove him guilty of falsity if he does. His known integrity and candor are too great to permit him to say it. He dare not say, then, that if the French decree of repeal had been known, the British orders would have been repealed and the war thus prevented.

[Mr. STOCKTON here spoke to order. He wished to know whether personal threats were admissible on the floor—whether any gentleman could be permitted to say that another dare not say any particular thing.]

The SPEAKER said he did not understand the gentleman as having used a personal threat.]

Mr. CALHOUN continued. He wished it to be distinctly understood, that he had no personal meaning in what he said. He merely had said that the gentleman dare not, as a man of veracity, assert a fact otherwise than that fact is. He was sorry the gentleman from New Jersey, much more than the gentleman from Virginia, himself, should misunderstand him. I will be more particular, said Mr. C. I assert that two and two make four; and I say no gentleman dare to contradict it. I say so on conviction of the certainty of the fact. Sir, although warm in my country's cause, nothing shall ever induce me unnecessarily to wound the feelings of any gentleman in this House, more especially of the gentleman from Virginia, with whom I have never been so unfortunate as to come in collision. I may be warm, sir; I have a right to be so. I was one of the advocates of the present war. I considered the interests and rights of the nation compromised in the question, and I was bound to vote for it. I am therefore mortified to see it placed on ground on which it ought not to stand. I am mortified to hear the misstatements which prevail on this subject. The cause of my country is that in whose behalf I am now warm, and ever hope to be so. It is a cause on the truth and justice of which I would stake my all—though on its ultimate success I cannot, for that is yet in the womb of time.

I have condescended sir, to view this question for a moment on the ground of the relative conduct of France and Great Britain. Not that I believe the Government ought to descend, in the pursuit of a magnanimous policy, to a scholastic view, which nation has done us the first or the greatest injury. Such considerations would never enter into the view of a statesman. The question is, how we can best redress the wrongs of the country. I have ever regretted that the injuries of the belligerents should for a moment have been viewed in their retaliatory character, notwithstanding the excellence of the motive—a love of peace, and a desire to maintain it. I would have taken a higher ground; and the Government, finding all their pacific efforts were in vain, were compelled at length to appeal to the last resort. An opposite view of this question appears to me ridiculous, if I dare mingle ridicule with a question of such seriousness. Is it not absurd to contend that we ought to suffer ourselves to be beaten to death, whilst engaged in abstract philosophic inquiries who gave us the first blow? In the whole of this contest of restrictions, I shall ever deem the conduct of France to have been improper. I stand here only as the assertor of American rights, the vindicator of the American cause. I will not presume that the President had received the decree in question and concealed it—and the only modification I ask of these resolutions is, to divest them of that imputation, which they appear to convey. Thus modified, I shall cheerfully vote for them, to afford to gentlemen in opposition the most liberal opportunity of obtaining all the information they can wish.

Mr. HANSON said the part of the resolution which the gentleman from South Carolina regarded as so exceptionable, conveying, as he supposed, an insinuation against the President highly disrespectful and unwarrantable, was the very part he most wished to retain. Those words expunged, the pith, the essence of the resolution was extracted, and nothing would remain to be acted on. It would be equivalent to a rejection of all the resolutions, because the first resolution was the pivot upon which the rest turned—take it away, the key-stone of the arch was removed and the whole fabric must necessarily fall.

Mr H. could not but express his surprise that any opposition should be made, by the friends of the Administration, to the resolutions under consideration; that it was indeed to have been expected that an early opportunity would be sought by the gentlemen themselves to remove from the public mind injurious and well-founded suspicions against the Executive, spread everywhere and daily acquiring strength; that it was to have been expected that such an opportunity would have been earnestly sought and eagerly embraced, to vindicate the honor of Administration, by refuting one of the most insulting and outrageous imputations of falsehood, fraud, and imposture, ever submitted to by one independent power from another. That it was to have been expected the guardians of the national honor would have displayed a quick and lively sensibility to whatever affected the character of the country; and that their own share of responsibility, a just sense of what was due to themselves, would have suggested to gentlemen on the other side the necessity of some exculpatory course, some voluntary proceeding, to wipe away the stain cast upon their characters by the presumptuous tool of a foreign despot. Should the resolutions be rejected, the public is bound to believe, the people inevitably will believe, either that the important document which we ask to be laid before the nation was suppressed, for the most corrupt purposes, or that, rather than risk the displeasure of France, by exculpating the Executive and itself, this House prefers to sanction, nay, recommend, a negative vote, a continued concealment of evidence, a suppression of a declaration exposing the "courtly insincerity," the duplicity, and falsehood, of France.

Mr. H. said that he wished to dismiss from the discussion all the rubbish and trumpery which might be raked together in the Department of State, and brought to bear upon this question; he wished to discard all extraneous matter with which it might be attempted to encumber the question, in order to direct the attention of the people from the true subject of inquiry. Let us, said he, simplify the question, and present it in a form calculated to meet the apprehension of every man, not having an unaccountable obliquity of vision, or tortured by a distressing density of intellect. And how stands the question? Simply and plainly thus: Shall the Chief Magistrate of this nation rest under the foul imputation of having done a deed at the bare mention of which honor blushes—the cheek of charity must mantle—a deed which, in a better age, would have brought a monarch to the block? Or will the National Legislature afford that Chief Magistrate an opportunity (which opportunity, to be sure, might have been taken) to acquit himself by his own mere denial of the charges, and thus inculcate his imperial accuser, who has officially promulgated, I trust, an unqualified untruth, vitally affecting the honor of Government? This plain proposition presented to the minds of gentlemen, could they doubt or hesitate in their decision? Forced, driven to the alternative of flying in the face of imperial ire, and the unavoidable degradation of submitting to an allegation of treachery to this people by their rulers, it was but reasonable to expect a prompt decision in favor of the call for information. As much as gentlemen might excel in the art of "making the worse appear the better reason," (and we had abundant proof that skilful sophists were on the floor,) it was not in the power of human ingenuity, sophistry itself could not vary the true, simple statement of the case. The resolutions rejected, or so altered as to defeat the fair purpose of their honorable mover, the call for particular information refused, and the inference was irresistible; the mind of man could not resist it—a verdict of guilty would be pronounced against Administration by the grand inquest of the nation. On the other hand, let the President confront his accuser, and officially deny the official declaration of the Duke of Bassano, and the national character would be in so much retrieved, the honor of Administration in so far viudicated. For himself, Mr. H. said he could not help thinking, as an American he could not help hoping, the French Minister would be convicted of a wanton, groundless official falsehood. Guilt rested somewhere, and he himself hoped it could be fastened on France.

As a party man, I am free to confess, said Mr. H., it will be the cause of no great agony of grief with me, to see the resolutions rejected; but love of country, the great and sole foundation of all public virtue, cheerfully yields the triumph which such a vote would assure to the minority. You, sir, are not now to be informed that thousands and hundreds of thousands of the free and enlightened people of this Republic, judging from the mysterious acts of Administration, the constant and (in my judgment) abominable practice of suppressing information, and a curious coincidence in our measures and those of a foreign power, are firmly persuaded, if not riveted in the opinion, that the destinies of this nation are directed by a distant hand. They know that France, ever since her regicidal era, when the mild and amiable Louis was butchered, has arrogated and haughtily exercised the right of superseding, by a code of her own, all the sacred and recognized principles of the laws of nations; this France, that fawns over her prey, and courts whom she designs to destroy; whose annals of perfidy, usurpation, and blood, have blotted the history of man, and at last provoked the wrath of the Almighty, whose arm has been made bare to smite the monster identified with her crimes. This people think that France has plundered us of our property without one manly effort to recover or protect it; cramped us in our industry, without our daring to complain; at first assigned limits to our commerce, and finally forced us to unite in measures for its destruction—robbed us of our honor—chained us to the car of the conqueror—coerced us to shout hosannas to his fame, and fabricate apologies for his misfortunes—twisted a knot about our necks, which we are told the tyrant's sword alone can cut. Will you reject these resolutions, and thus confirm all that will be, can be, and ought to be thought and said touching French influence?

There exists, said Mr. H., another and a very important reason why the majority should proceed cautiously, evincing a delicacy of honor, a nice sensibility, on a question which is to decide upon their pretensions to whatever an honest party properly appreciates. In addition to the intimation by the imperial prime minister that the privations and miseries with which the country has been afflicted for the last year have been brought upon us by the concealment of a document which would have prevented the war, if communicated to Congress; that our smoking and bleeding frontier has been visited with the most awful calamities, through the treachery of our rulers; in addition to these considerations, upon a late and memorable occasion, the "invincible and super-eminent Napoleon" declared to his Conservative Senate of slaves, in pretty direct terms, that we were engaged in a common cause with him. These are his words:

"America has recurred to arms to cause the sovereignty of her flag to be respected. The wishes of the world accompany her in this glorious contest. If it terminates in obliging the enemy of the Continent to recognize the principle that the flag shall protect the merchandise and crew, and that neutrals ought not to submit to paper blockades, (all is conformable to the treaty of Utrecht,) America will meet the applause of the world."

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the language of the late assumed Autocrat of all the States of the Continent. The war is not to cease until England recognizes a new interpolation in the maritime code of nations; in other words, until the Napoleon code is adopted, which shall give to the neutral flag, a piece of striped bunting, backed by quaker cannon, the magical effect of preserving inviolate all that sails under it, of protecting whatever is covered by it. Yes, sir, this new point of international law the "invincible" and "generous conqueror," seated on his imperial throne, covered by a canopy I dare say not less splendid than that above your head, Mr. Speaker, surrounded by his scullion princes and mock grand dignitaries of the Empire, has promulgated for the government of nations—for our guidance—for the government of —The petty men

Who walk under his huge legs, and peep about
To find themselves dishonorable graves.

Mr. H. said, it appears, too, from the same laconic notice our loving friend has designed to take of this most enlightened nation of the world, that with the same solemnity, and on the same occasion, he has declared to the automata around him, "for this new principle the Americans fight," and for so fighting have gained the world's applause, a tyrant's praise, the friendship of a "out-purse of the Empire and the rule." Yes, the great Napoleon has written, has spoken, has promulgated it to the nations of the world, that we fight Great Britain for such a principle; all is conformable to the treaty of Utrecht!—while a curious similarity of sentiment is to be found between the late Message of the President and the speech of the Emperor, upon the point, that "the flag shall cover the merchandise and crew"—that free ships shall make free goods.

Is it true or is it false, said Mr. H., that we are fighting to support such pretensions? Such facts we are the panel to try, and, according to my ideas, the decision will be governed by the vote upon these resolutions. Again, is it true? We have the word of Napoleon for it, and "but yesterday his word would have stood against the world." Now, crippled and prostrate, surely there could be no great danger in bringing our Executive into collision with him, whose honor must be protected against an imputed act of malfeasance, presupposing the blackest turpitude. If it be false, boldly fling back the contumely, and hurl indignant defiance in the teeth of the unprincipled, perfidious tyrant. Hesitate, fear not to contradict and expose the man who has dared to assail the integrity and sacred honor of our Government. Mr. H. said it was not for those who might concur with him in opinion, to contradict and quarrel with Bonaparte about the charge of a criminal and impeachable nature against the President, but it was a duty which had especially devolved upon those whose honor and love of country are particularly implicated. He therefore conjured the majority, as they valued their own fame and their country's glory, to surcease, by one consentaneous impulse, all further opposition to the resolutions on the table. A deaf ear may be turned to this entreaty, but the day will not be long coming when they will bitterly regret it.

THURSDAY, June 17, 1813.

French Decrees.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions moved by Mr. WEBSTER, calling for particular information on the subject of the documents purporting to be a repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan.

Mr. FARROW proceeded and remarked that the honorable member from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFER) observed, that this Government had been wickedly involved in war with England. Mr. F. contended, that as war had been declared by the constitutional authority, that it did not now become the duty of the thirteenth Congress to inquire into the policy of the war; that, as to his part, he was not sent here for that purpose. But, as he understood, this session was called to provide ways and means for carrying on the war. Suppose, upon an inquiry, that it should be found that it was not the policy of this country to go to war. Congress cannot make peace; one nation can make war, but it requires two to make peace. Therefore, to go into the inquiry would be a nugatory act, and an unnecessary waste of time. He, therefore, moved that the consideration of the resolutions before the House be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. OAKLEY.—Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Carolina, in proposing this amendment, professed, and no doubt with great sincerity, a willingness to afford all the information which is desired on the subjects embraced by these resolutions; but he seemed to think that the terms of the resolution, which he wishes to amend, are too particular to comport with the respect due from this House to the Chief Magistrate—as they appear to afford the ground of an inference, that to a call for information in a more general shape, he might be disposed to make an unsatisfactory or evasive answer. The gentleman seemed also to think, that the objects intended to be obtained by the words which he proposes to strike out, are substantially included in the second and third resolutions; and he further objects, that although all the information in the possession of the Government, as to the time at which the first intelligence of the decree of the French Government, of the 28th of April, 1811, was received, may properly be demanded by this House—still it would be unprecedented and improper to inquire as to the manner in which such intelligence was obtained, or the agents through whom it was communicated; or, at all events, that these things ought to be the subject of a distinct and future inquiry, if the answer of the Executive to the resolution in its general form should render such an inquiry important.

I am unable, sir, to discern in what point of view this resolution can be considered as disrespectful to the Executive. If particular information is required, particular inquiries must necessarily be made. It will be recollected by the House, that the resolution adopted near the close of the last session, on the motion of the honorable gentleman from Maryland behind me, (Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH,) and in reply to which the House received the information now in their possession, relative to the French decree in question, was in a more general form than that now under consideration. It is to be presumed that the Executive, in answer to that resolution, gave to the House all the facts which he considered as coming properly within its scope and meaning; and yet it must be perceived that his answer is wholly unsatisfactory, and that the necessity for the present resolution has grown out of the defective information then given to the House. It is proper, therefore, that this call should be precise in its terms, and that the attention of the Executive should be particularly directed to the points on which information is deemed important.

Nor, sir, can I agree with the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, that the second and third resolutions are calculated to produce the effect intended by the words which he proposes to strike out of the first. The object of the second resolution is to ascertain whether Mr. Russell has ever admitted or denied to his Government the truth of the declaration of the Duke of Bassano to Mr. Barlow. It will be acknowledged, that to a complete vindication of the character of the Administration, an explicit denial by Mr. Russell of the truth of that declaration is absolutely essential. And, sir, as to the third resolution, it is equally important that it should be explicitly known, whether the Minister of France has ever made any communication to this Government on the subject of that decree. But it will be perceived, that the terms of the first resolution may be fully complied with by the Executive, without explicitly saying to this House whether such a denial on the one hand, or such a communication on the other, has ever been made. Facts, so important as these, ought not to rest on matter of inference from any general answer of the Executive, but they ought to be established by a direct and positive declaration.

To understand correctly the nature and importance of the subject now under discussion, it is requisite to bring into view the state of our relations with France and Great Britain, at the date of the decree of the 28th of April, 1811. I am not about to enter at large into the subject of the French decrees, and the British Orders in Council. It is not important here to do so; and, if it were, a due respect for the talents of eminent gentlemen who have gone before me, would deter me from travelling over ground so thoroughly explored. It would be more than vain in me to hope to present any new views of a subject so completely exhausted. It is sufficient for my purpose to state such facts respecting these decrees and orders, and the policy pursued by our Government in relation to them, as I have understood to be generally admitted.

The blockade of May, 1806, established by the British Government, although in the first instance considered by the present Secretary of State as a conciliatory measure, was afterwards alleged by France, and then by our own Administration, to be hostile to our neutral rights, and a direct violation of the laws of nations. France, claiming a right to retaliate, promulgated in October following the Berlin decree. To this succeeded, on the same alleged ground of retaliation, the Orders in Council, and to these the decree of Milan. Each of the belligerent powers thus rested the justification of its hostile edicts on the previous alleged injustice and wrongs of the other. Our Administration, though denying in terms the existence of this right of retaliation, yet in its acts and its correspondence seemed to recognize it. It labored hard to convince each belligerent, that each was the original aggressor, and, by a long course of humiliating solicitation and entreaty, it endeavored to induce each to take the lead in rescinding the edicts of which we complained. At length, by the act of Congress of the 1st of May, 1810, it was provided that whenever either France or England should so revoke her decrees or orders, that they should cease to violate the neutral rights of the United States, the President should by proclamation declare the fact, and that from thenceforth the act of non-intercourse should cease to operate against the power thus revoking; and that if, within three months after such proclamation, the other power did not also revoke, the provisions of that act should be enforced against it. In this state of things a declaration was made by the French Minister of Foreign Affairs to the American Minister at Paris, on the 5th of August, 1810, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan were revoked, and would cease to have effect on the 1st of November following. The President of the United States considering this declaration as amounting to a repeal of these decrees, within the meaning of the act of the 1st of May, and implicitly confiding that that declaration would be fulfilled in good faith by the French Government, on the 2d day of November, 1810, published his proclamation announcing the fact that these decrees were repealed. A demand was made on the British Government to follow the example thus set by France. On the part of that Government it was contended that the declaration of the French Minister was not such a formal act as ought to be required by the United States, and that the French decrees ought to be revoked in a manner as authentic as that in which they were promulgated. That even if there were no objections to that declaration on that ground, if it was to be considered a repeal at all, it was clearly a repeal depending on a condition precedent to be performed by the United States, and that such a conditional revocation did not come within the meaning of the act of Congress. She therefore refused to revoke the Orders in Council, and the provisions of the non-intercourse act were revived against her by the act of the 2d of March, 1811.

On the 21st of April, 1812, by a declaration of the British Government, it was provided, that "if at any time thereafter, the Berlin and Milan decrees should, by some authentic act of the French Government, publicly promulgated, be absolutely and unconditionally repealed, then and from thenceforth the Orders in Council should be wholly and absolutely revoked." Mr. Barlow, then the Minister of the United States at Paris, having received this declaration, addressed a note to the Duke of Bassano, dated the first of May, 1812, in which is the following passage: "It is much to be desired that the French Government would now make and publish an authentic act, declaring the Berlin and Milan decrees, as relative to the United States, to have ceased in November, 1810; declaring that they have not been applied in any instance since that time, and that they shall not be so applied in future." By the letter of the 12th of May, 1812, from Mr. Barlow to the Secretary of State, we are informed, that in a conversation with the Duke of Bassano on the subject of that note, there appeared a "singular reluctance" on the part of the French Minister to answer it. In that conversation, we for the first time hear of the decrees of the French Government of the 28th of April, 1811. "When, in the conversation above alluded to," says Mr. Barlow, "the Duke first produced to me the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, I made no comment on the strange manner in which it had been so long concealed from me, and probably from you. I only asked him if that decree had been published. He said no; but, he declared, it had been communicated to my predecessor here, and likewise sent to Mr. Surrurier, with orders to communicate it to you." On the 20th of May, 1812, this decree was for the first time made known to the British Government. On the 18th of June war was declared by the United States. On the 28d of the same month the Orders in Council were repealed. On the 4th of November last, the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811, was first laid before Congress; and on the 8d of March last, the letter of Mr. Barlow to the Secretary of State, of the 12th of May, 1812, containing the declaration of the Duke of Bassano relative to that decree, was drawn from the Executive by the resolution adopted by this House on the motion of my friend from Maryland.

I have thus, sir, endeavored to give a concise, and I flatter myself, a correct statement of facts connected with the decrees and orders of France and Great Britain, and with the measures adopted by the United States in relation to them. From this statement, we shall not be at a loss to discover the import of the declaration of the Duke of Bassano, and the nature and extent of the charge which that declaration fixes on the honor of this country, and the men who administer its Government. Great Britain professed always, without doubt, until her declaration of the 21st of April, 1812, her readiness to proceed "pari passu" with France in a revocation of her edicts against neutral commerce. She called repeatedly for authentic evidence of the alleged repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees. The decree of the 28th of April, 1811, constituted that evidence. On the supposition that that decree was made at the time it bears date, then has it been concealed, either by the French Government or our own, or by both, in concert, for the purpose of preventing the repeal of the Orders in Council, and thus cheating and betraying Congress and this people into the ruinous war under which we are now suffering. The declaration of the Duke of Bassano fixes this charge exclusively on the American Government. It is a serious charge, and well merits an examination of the grounds on which it rests.

Mr. GROSVENOR addressed the Chair as follows: Mr. Speaker, I cannot suffer the question to be taken without offering to the House my reasons for supporting the resolution. In doing this, sir, I, like the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, may become warm; yet as I can never admit that such warmth furnishes any license to him for personal attack, or improper language, so I shall claim no such license for myself, by condescending to imitate his example.

At the close of the last session, upon the motion of the honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. GOLDBOROUGH,) a resolution was adopted in the ordinary and general form—to be laid before the House the French decree, purporting to be a repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, referred to in his Message of the 4th of November last, together with such information as he may possess concerning the time and manner of promulgating the same," &c., &c.

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause

This is the material part of the resolution. What was the reply to this resolution? A simple communication of the degrading accusation of the French Minister, and that only. Not one word of denial or of comment; not a murmur of resentment at the foul stigma which the Duke of Bassano had attempted to fix on the honor of the Executive and the character of the country. All information that the President "might possess relative to the time and manner of promulgating" the decree was refused or evaded; and thereby the blot on our national honor was rendered tenfold deeper and blacker.

Would these honorable gentlemen have us repeat an experiment which issued in such consequences? Would they again adopt a course which would again disappoint us and disgrace our country? No, sir, if this information ought to be obtained, this is the only form, the only manner to obtain it. We must tell the Executive without ambiguity and with precision, and and yet with every respect compatible with our duty, our objects, and our requests. If these resolutions pass, they must be met with satisfactory information, or with a refusal to communicate. The reply will rest with the President, and upon him be the responsibility for the form and substance of that reply.

Having disposed of the form of these resolutions, I will now proceed to their substance.

An instrument purporting to be a French decree, modifying or repealing the French Berlin and Milan decrees, so far as they violated our neutral rights, was communicated by the Duke of Bassano to Mr. Barlow, our Minister in France, on the 10th of May, 1812. This decree bears date the 24th of April, 1811. It had been concealed for more than one year from the time of its date. Mr. Barlow, conscious that the publication of the decree, at its date, would have saved this country from many evils, and astonished at its concealment, demanded of the Duke of Bassano whether it had ever been published. The Duke replied, that it had been communicated to our Minister in France, and sent on to Mr. Serrurier, to be communicated to our Government. If the Duke of Bassano stated the fact correctly, then our Government was guilty of concealing the decree. If he stated a falsehood, then his own Government is guilty of the concealment, with the full addition of duplicity and falsehood. Certainly, the charge of the French Minister implicated the honor and the honesty of the Executive of this country. It struck a blow at the integrity and honor of the Government. Yet the Executive has never publicly denied the foul accusation. It is to arrive at the truth in relation to this dark and alarming transaction, to acquit the innocent, and to hang the guilty up a detestable spectacle to the Universe, that these resolutions are offered. Let me ask the House, let me ask the nation, is not the object laudable—is not the duty important and imperious?

I have said, if the French repealing decree had been made known to the Congress, to the American people, and to England, in the Spring of 1811, it would have prevented the present disastrous war. Permit me now to prove it. From the date of the President's proclamation down to the very declaration of war, our Government took the ground that the French decrees were in truth repealed, by the letter of the Duc de Cadore, on the 5th of August preceding; and upon this basis demanded the revocation of the British Orders in Council. Britain, denying, that Cadore's letter was any repeal or modification, demanded the instrument of repeal issued by the Emperor, as the only ground on which she would revoke her orders. Neither the French nor the American Government pretended that any such instrument was in existence; but the latter Government, deceived by the arts of the arch juggler, assumed the fact, and founded thereon hostile proceedings against England. If the decree had been published it would have been impossible that the vile deception could longer have been cherished by either Government, and Congress would have been forced by very shame to have retraced their steps, to have rescinded the proclamation, to have repealed the law of March, and to have placed the country on the same ground which she occupied in May, 1810. A war with England could not then have followed; unless, indeed, the Administration had been prepared openly to abandon all those principles of "national honor, national independence, national justice," and national policy, which they had adopted in the session of 1808.

Yes, sir, even though the British orders had remained unrepealed and unmodified, the publication of that decree would have cut the "Gordian knot," released this country from the toils of the tyrant, and have averted, perhaps for ever, this unnatural war. But suppose in this I am mistaken, yet have we not every reason to believe that if the French repealing decree had been known to England, she would have modified her Orders in Council, and continued peace would have been the consequence? Surely it is preposterous to pretend, if those orders had been revoked, that yet war would have been declared. The very reverse is proved by all the acts of our Government. In the Message of the President, at the commencement of the war-session of Congress, the "Orders in Council" are the burden of the complaint—impressment is not even mentioned. In all the correspondence between the two Governments, which preceded the war, the "Orders in Council" constitute the great topic of discussion.

In the correspondence which commenced between Mr. Foster and Mr. Monroe, on the 30th of May, 1812, and continued almost daily, down to the very declaration of war, the repeal of the Orders in Council was the only subject of discussion—and that alone was demanded, as a sine qua non to a restoration of a friendly intercourse. Impressment, though always a subject of difference between the two nations, had never been by our Government for a moment considered as a sufficient cause of war. Hence, in the arrangement with the British Minister, Erskine, not a word is said, not a stipulation made on that subject. Hence, in all the correspondence which immediately preceded the war, the subject of impressment is rarely if ever mentioned; and hence, in this House and the Senate, the act declaring war passed upon the sole but delusive ground that France had modified or repealed her decrees, and that England had refused to revoke or modify her Orders. Let me appeal to the members of this House who voted for the war. Would they have dared to have done that deed upon the subject of impressment alone? I am sure they would not—I speak not from personal knowledge—I speak from all that preceded, that accompanied, and that followed that dreadful measure. The subject of impressment was never swelled into that hideous form it now wears; it never became "a dog of war," until when the Orders in Council were revoked, and an armistice demanded by England, it was dragged forward to repel the demand and to justify the Administration for "wading deeper and deeper in blood." But let gentlemen on this floor answer what they will of this, I am certain the people of this country would never have joined in the quixotic expedition. The cant of "free trade and sailors' rights," heard only in the woods of the West where no trade exists, and no sailors are to be found, could not have drowned the voice of commerce, of agriculture, of justice, and of peace. Let gentlemen on this floor answer what they may, I tell them they could not, they durst not have plunged this nation into war if the British Orders in Council had been repealed or modified. But those orders would have been repealed or modified if the French decree had not been concealed.

On this subject no doubt can exist. And never was I more astonished than when I yesterday heard the honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) deny this position. Upon what grounds does he place this denial? First upon the letters of Mr. Foster to Mr. Monroe, which preceded the war. Sir, that correspondence I have perused, and a more singular, equivocal, weak, and indistinct correspondence I have never seen. It is undeniable, that in some paragraphs of Foster's letters, abstracted from the residue, something like the position of the honorable gentleman may be found. But even these, abstracted from the rest, are declared by Mr. Monroe himself to be equivocal. The whole correspondence clearly proves that Mr. Foster never intended to declare, and never did definitely declare, that if an authentic instrument repealing the French decrees, so far as they violated the neutral commerce of America, should be produced, England would not revoke her orders in a similar manner. On the contrary, he throughout disputed even the partial repeal of the French decrees; and says the question whether England would revoke as to America, was premature, and could be discussed to no purpose until America should produce an authentic instrument of repeal.

And now, let me appeal to this House and to the people of America—if this decree was communicated to Mr. Russell in April, 1811, and by him suppressed, he merits and shall receive the everlasting execrations of his country. If either by Mr. Russell or the Minister Serrurier, it was communicated to Mr. Monroe, and by him concealed from the Executive, is there a niche in the temple of infamy sufficiently infamous for him? But if, by any means, the decree came to the knowledge of the President; and if he, either through a paltry fear of proving his proclamation false, or from any other motive, buried it in darkness, and thereby delivered that country, which, by every bond human and divine, he was bound to protect, over to all the miseries of an unnecessary and bloody war, what maledictions can suit his conduct; what new and horrible punishment is commensurate with the bloody crime? Sir, the President is old, and the reproaches of man may concern and move him but little. But he must soon appear at the bar of Immortal Justice. If he has done this deed, how will he stand appalled before the accusing spirits of youth “untimely slain in battle?” How will his soul recoil from those bloody ravages, that wide devastation, that mass of human misery, which his own guilty conduct shall have produced?

Shall I be asked, if I believe the Executive has done this guilty deed? I answer frankly and sincerely, no. However poorly I may think of the political character and conduct of the Executive, I do not believe him capable of a crime of such complicated wickedness; combining all the blackest attributes of official turpitude, murder, and treason. But, sir, my belief or disbelief has nothing to do with the subject. It is not to satisfy myself alone, that I press this call—I have a more exalted motive. I stand on higher ground. The honor, the purity of my native country, is shrouded in darkness. Sir, national honor is a plant of peculiar growth; it can live and flourish only in the broad blaze of day; cover it with clouds and darkness, it withers and dies. The honor of my country cannot long survive amid the dark and pestilential vapors which hang around it. To disperse those clouds and vapors, to restore it to the genial beams of day, that America, Europe, and the world, may again behold it bright and unsullied; to frown contempt on the bloody despot who has striven to stain and destroy it—these are the objects—these I fondly hope will be the effects of this measure.

Has this House considered the black and hideous aspect which this subject now presents to the American people? Has it reflected that, at this moment, the foul accusation stands before this people and the world, uncontradicted, unexamined, unresented? If it is suffered thus to remain in mystery, its truth will soon be considered as established, and the stain on the American character so deeply fixed, as to defy every effort to wash it away.

Sir, examine for a moment the circumstances of this dark affair. I have said that, from the date of the letter of the Duke of Cadore, from August 5th, 1810, down to the 20th of May, 1812, the British Government invariably refused to give credit to that letter, as a repeal or modification of the French decrees. That Government declared the letter false and jesuitical, and invariably demanded some authentic instrument of repeal, issued by the French Government itself. For such an instrument, our Ministers in France had importuned the Emperor, always without success, until, on the 10th of May, 1812, Mr. Barlow prevailed, and the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, was produced.

And here permit me to read a short extract from the letter of Mr. Barlow to Mr. Monroe, bearing date the 12th May, 1812. In this letter is contained an account of the ignominious attack upon the honor of the Executive:

“When, in the conversation above alluded to, the Duke first produced to me the decree of the 28th April, 1811, I made no comment on the strange manner in which it had been so long concealed from me, and probably from you. I only asked him if that decree had been published—he said no, but declared that it had been communicated to my predecessor, here, and likewise sent to Mr. Serrurier, with orders to communicate it to you. I assured him that it was not among the archives of this legation; that I never before heard of it,” &c.

Had the vile accusation been promptly contradicted, no doubt would, or could have remained, as to the truth or falsehood of the charge. But by a strange fatality, every act of the Executive and of his Ministers and agents, has tended strongly to confirm its truth. Did Mr. Barlow contradict it? No; he simply declared, that he “never before had heard” of the decree. Has Mr. Russell, the “predecessor” of Mr. Barlow, ever publicly denied it? No; he has been well contented that his honor should remain stigmatized by the black accusation.

FRIDAY, JUNE 18.

French Decrees.

The House resumed the consideration of Mr. WEBSTER'S resolutions respecting the French repealing decree.

Mr. GRUNDY rose, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, knowing that Congress had been convened at this time for the express purpose of providing an adequate revenue for the prosecution of the war in which our country is engaged, I did believe that a discussion not immediately connected with this subject should have been avoided; but, as the Committee of Ways and Means are not yet prepared to act on the bills reported by them, that time may not be entirely lost which is given to the examination of points which have been introduced into this debate.

The motion before us is to postpone indefinitely the consideration of the resolutions on your table; in other words, to reject them; to this I am opposed. I shall vote for them, and if modified in an inconsiderable degree, shall do so with pleasure. In doing this I shall be governed by reasons entirely different from those which have been assigned by gentlemen who have preceded me. I shall vote for them to do away the effect which has been produced, and may again be produced, by the misrepresentations of the friends of that fast-anchored isle, which, according to the opinions of some gentlemen, has done us no essential injury; I shall vote for them, that the friends of that nation which is styled by some the bulwark of our holy religion, may not mislead any portion of the American people. I shall vote for them that the advocates of that nation which is said to be fighting the battles of the world may not have it in their power to weaken the arm of this Government in its present contest with a foreign power. These, sir, are the reasons on which I act, and not because I believe their adoption necessary to vindicate the honor of the Government or the character of those who administer it. The reputation of this Administration stands on a basis too solid to be shaken by any statement which the Duke of Bassano has or can make; and had not these new guardians of the Executive honor (Messrs. WEBSTER, OAKLEY, and GROSVENOR) been more sensitive than its old friends, no measure of this kind would have been deemed necessary. As this however is the first effort in their new vocation, so far as depends on my exertions, they shall be indulged and gratified. I have already said, that I shall vote with gentlemen on the other side of the House for reasons very different from their own. Were I at liberty to speak of motives, I would undertake to show that in these we differ no less than we have already in the reasons avowed. It has been alleged by those who have advocated these resolutions, that if an authentic document containing the decree of the French Government, bearing date the 28th day of April, 1811, and which so modifies the decrees of Berlin and Milan as to exempt the United States from their operations, had been furnished to the British Government before the declaration of war, that the Orders in Council would have been revoked, and thereby war would have been avoided. If I have mistaken the position which gentlemen have laid down as the basis on which their whole argument is founded, I beg now to be set right. [Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, stated that Mr. GRUNDY had not mistaken their meaning.] Mr. GRUNDY then proceeded—Then, sir, we are at issue: I deny the position laid down, and aver that the British Cabinet would not have repealed the Orders in Council, had a copy of the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811, been communicated previously to the declaration of war. I shall not follow the example which has been set by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) I shall not quote from memory the evidences on which I rely. I will not expose myself to that error into which others have fallen by trusting to their recollection, when referring to documents in their support. I have these documents before me, and will show from them that Great Britain required, as the condition on which she would revoke her Orders in Council, that the French decrees of Berlin and Milan should previously be rescinded, not as to the United States only, but as to all neutral nations. If this be done, gentlemen must be driven from that ground which they have occupied with so much ostentation; for it will be recollected, that the French decree merely withdraws from the United States the operation of the Berlin and Milan decrees, and leaves the decrees themselves in full force against all other neutrals. The Prince Regent, in his declaration of 21st of April, 1812, uses the following language when speaking of the Orders in Council:

[Here the documents referred to were read.]

Mr. Speaker, I feel humbled and abased that it has become my duty to quote the authority of the Prince Regent and the British Ministers, against the Representatives of my own country. I am mortified to hear doctrines advanced here in behalf of the British Cabinet which the British Ministers never avowed, and which they would not avow were they present and entitled to be heard on this floor. Sir, they would not dare to do so—their own words would confound them. I do hope, sir, that gentlemen who are still determined to persist in opposition, will take some other ground on which to rely; for it surely adds nothing to the honor of this country or to their individual credit to advance and advocate doctrines which the British Ministry would be ashamed to own.

Sir, unless I am altogether mistaken in the meaning of the plainest terms—unless the English language is entirely unintelligible to me—the point is sufficiently established, that the British Government would not have revoked the Orders in Council, had a copy of the French decree, modifying the Berlin and Milan decrees, been presented to them; and the gentlemen on the other side of the House must be constrained to abandon the ground they have relied on; and here this debate might close. For, although the French decree is made the pretext for the repeal of the Orders in Council, every man acquainted with the political state of the two countries must be satisfied that it was the suffering condition of the British manufacturers, united with the apprehension of an American war, which produced that change in British policy which did take place.

Sir, I felt some astonishment to hear the member from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) who had no seat in this House when war was declared, who was not even in this city at that time, state with so much confidence in what events the war would or would not have taken place. If the public documents are referred to it will be seen, that the impressment of our seamen was considered as a principal cause of the war. In the Executive Messages of that session, in the Reports of the Committee of Foreign Relations, it will be seen that the language of freemen was employed, the liberty of the citizen being deemed more valuable and precious than his property. I was one of those who voted for the war, and ought to be presumed to know something of the opinions and sentiments which prevailed at that time, and yet I feel no hesitation in saying, that no man can pronounce what would have been the course pursued, had the Orders in Council been revoked. I have heard many members say they would have voted for the war had the Orders in Council been previously abandoned—I have heard others say they would not; and yet the gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) affects to speak with great confidence and precision on this subject. There are two reasons why this honorable gentleman should have been less confident in his assertions. In the first place he was not present when the war was declared; in the second, he belonged to the opposition, and would not, on that account, have been so freely communicated with by those who supported it.

Sir, I wish gentlemen clearly and distinctly to answer me this question—Will they give up the principle of impressment? Will they suffer the petty officers of the British Navy to seize at their pleasure American citizens, force them into a foreign service, and compel them with stripes to fight the battles of the enemy, even against that country which gave them birth? If so, let it be known to the people—let it be proclaimed to this nation of freemen—and let the line of distinction be drawn between those who will and those who will not submit to this tyranny of “the mistress of the seas.” Gentlemen have indeed said that they will not fight for the question of impressment. But will they surrender it? Will they yield this point to the King of Great Britain? Will they say that the slaves of George the Third have a right to seize and drive into captivity the freemen of the American States? I demand an answer—yea or nay. There is no difficulty in understanding the question. The gentleman from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) in adverting to the correspondence between Mr. Monroe and Mr. Foster, affects great difficulty in understanding its meaning. I cannot see wherein this difficulty lies—the language is plain, void of ambiguity, conveying distinct ideas, in clear and unequivocal expressions. The same gentleman has the modesty to tell you that Mr. Monroe and Mr. Foster did not understand the meaning of the words actually and unconditionally. What, sir! your Secretary of State, who has visited, in the character of an American Minister, nearly half the Courts of Europe—he whose literary acquirements have done honor to this nation, not understand the meaning of the common English words actually and unconditionally? Mr. Foster, too, the accredited Minister of the “fast-anchored Isle,” sent by the British Government upwards of three thousand miles to negotiate upon delicate and difficult points, is charged with the like ignorance. Sir, the gentleman who introduced these resolutions, (Mr. WEBSTER,) if he has ever read his namesake’s spelling book, (and no doubt he has,) can readily expound them. Even a school-boy can tell you their meaning. I feel no great solicitude or tenderness about the reputation of the late British Minister, but surely he ought not to be subject to this imputation.

In one idea advanced by the opposition, I perfectly concur: if the Executive had received a copy of the French decree previous to the declaration of war, and had withheld it from the British Minister, I should say he deserved the execration of his country. The honorable gentleman who has manifested such critical skill in language might have drawn its character in terms of blackest import, and I would subscribe to it; but I know, with moral certainty, that the answer of the President will dissipate every idea of that kind—it will show, that, in the whole of this transaction, he has conducted with fairness and uprightness, and from a desire to prevent a conflict between this and any other nation. Yes, sir, he has acted in obedience to honorable feelings, to which many who implicate him are entire strangers.

Having answered all the observations of others which are deemed material, I will make a few inquiries of the honorable mover of these resolutions (Mr. WEBSTER.) He certainly best knows the objects intended, and I pray him to answer for himself, and not by proxy. Is it his object to make it appear that the Duke of Bassano has been guilty of falsehood? If that shall turn out to be the case, what then? Will he make it a ground of going to war against France? Great, indeed, are the insults and injuries which we have received from the French Government, and much noise has the Opposition made respecting them; but, sir, when my friend from Kentucky (Mr. McKEE) offered a proposition to declare war against France, did the gentlemen on the other side of this House vote for it? To the best of my recollection, three of them voted for the measure—a majority of votes in favor of the proposition were given by this side of the House. He will not, I apprehend, say that he will go to war with France on this account. Is it intended to predicate any legislative act on the information which may be received from the Executive? I can conceive of no legislative act which can grow out of it. What, then, do gentlemen mean? What can be the object of these resolutions? To make it appear that France has acted with bad faith, and yet neither go to war nor pass any legislative act in consequence of it? I can see but one thing which gentlemen can promise themselves to follow from this course of proceeding. They may hope by this to throw new difficulties in the way of the Administration, to draw off the attention of the people from the prosecution of the war, paralyze the national energies, and multiply the chances of getting new men into power. If this be the object, the gentleman may please himself with the idea of having labored for the good of his country; but sure I am that the country can derive no benefit from such a course, however great his labors may be.

French Decrees.

Mr. SHIPARD addressed the chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, after the very able manner in which the subject under consideration has been discussed, by my honorable friends on this side of the House, I cannot hope to do more than glean the trifles which they have left me.

The honorable gentlemen on my left are opposed to the resolutions before the House; and in order the more effectually to combat them, have introduced topics of discussion wholly extrinsic and foreign from the proper subject of debate. Sir, in my opinion, they have lost sight of the question, and unnecessarily drawn into dispute what they call the merits of the war, and the demerits of one of the great political parties of this country.

Why, sir, all this zealous opposition to the adoption of these resolutions? Do they fear that a disclosure of the truth may injure the reputation or feelings of the President? Do they fear, if the veil should be rent asunder, which has so long concealed this dark and mysterious transaction, that it would appear to us, the American people, and the world, that the Executive had been a traitor to the dearest interests of that people, whose mistaken partiality had invested him with the honorable badges of exalted office? If they do, sir, I pity their timidity, and blush for them; but I hope they have no such fears. I sincerely hope the Chief Magistrate of this great and once honorable nation, has not sunk to such an abominable depth of corruption, as to conceal a public document of such importance as the decree of revocation of the 28th of April, 1811. A document, had it been timely promulgated, would have promised to hush the bickerings and contentions between us and Great Britain, to prevent a bloody war, to have enlivened and invigorated our fainting commerce, and restored our long lost prosperity.

It really appears to me, sir, that the gentlemen pay your President a very ill compliment in opposing the resolutions; for, should they succeed in that opposition, some might say that he and his friends dreaded the unmantling the truth; that they feared to see it stripped naked.

Sir, I submit to the House, to the gentlemen themselves, upon reflection, the question, if there would not be good cause of suspicion, that there had been an improper concealment of this paper, should the resolutions be voted down?

I have ever entertained some vulgar notions, that a frank and prompt disclosure of that which was proper to be disclosed, was a sort of presumptive evidence of integrity. And that an honest man would not wait to have the truth drawn from him as from the felon under examination, but would volunteer what a moral and political obligation required him to make public. I have supposed a certain kind of mysterious shrinking from the light, in public officers, in relation to official conduct; a rolling up in shade and secrecy transactions which the public wishes loudly demanded to be explained, was no very fair earnest of future good faith and honest dealing; or any very satisfactory proof that what had been done must necessarily be agreeable to the public sense of what ought to have been done. I have supposed, sir, that the honest and faithful steward would rather court than shun an inquiry into his stewardship; and, fortified with conscious integrity, would, at all times, be ready to exhibit his accounts, and prove himself trustworthy; and more especially when suspicion had hovered over him and perched upon him. I should really think he would be unwilling to slumber away, year after year, with such a bird of prey devouring his reputation, but that he would instantly arouse himself, and with manly and heroic dignity drive her from her perch.

Sir, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) has admitted that there is guilt somewhere; either that the decree of 28th April, 1811, was concealed in the French Cabinet, or by our President, or that it was ante-dated.

Now, sir, whether the one or the other of the positions be true, no gentleman will venture to assert, is immaterial. I fear no contradiction when I make the assertion; for such a contradiction would be of so rare a nature that few, if any, gentlemen will be ambitious first to introduce it. It would be saying, at least, that it is a matter of indifference to the American people, whether their Chief Magistrate has been dabbling in the pollutions of French policy and French intrigue,—whether he has been ignorant of, or criminally concealed, a document, which, if it had been disclosed, would have saved him from suspicion, and the nation from the horrors of war.

It would be saying, sir, that we have no interest in knowing whether Mr. Russell, our late Chargé d'Affaires in France, performed his diplomatic duty with integrity or not; whether he sold his country for Imperial smiles, or guarded her interests with scrupulous vigilance.

It would be saying that it was a matter of indifference to us whether France was acting with good faith in her correspondence with our Government, or whether we were made the dupe of imposture. Sir, if it would be correct to say all these things, then I admit that the resolutions are idle, and we are spending our time in vain; but if they are not correct, then it must create some surprise, that gentlemen who love their country with such amazing and exclusive warmth of affection, who discover so much zeal for her honor, should oppose with a spirit bordering on frenzy, measures which it must be seen are calculated to favor her best interests, and heal her wounded honor.

French Decrees.

Sir, I consider it a duty we owe Mr. Russell, the Executive, and the nation, diligently to inquire into this matter, and, if possible, to fix the guilt and odium upon the right man.

If Mr. Russell is innocent let him be put to the test, and acquitted before the world. If the President is innocent, it would be the height of injustice to him not to give him an opportunity to brush off the suspicions that have gathered upon him. If either or both of these gentlemen are guilty, we wrong our country if we do not awake from its slumbers this monster of sin. If the Emperor of France is guilty, (and really I can never suppose him otherwise,) it becomes highly interesting that the world should know the fact; that they should know how much confidence is to be reposed in the Imperial decrees of our loving friend, this cut-throat Emperor.

Will the gentleman say there is no cause of suspicion against the President? Sir, I cannot divest myself of a belief that all is not right in the Cabinet in relation to this affair. And I have been led to believe this, from a variety of suspicious circumstances which have been thickening and gathering upon my mind since the proclamation of the President of November 2, 1810, which emphatically declared that the decrees of Berlin and Milan were repealed.

Was this proclamation true? No, sir, it was false, and from the date of that proclamation, until the promulgation of the long-slumbering, repealing decree, purporting to bear date April 28, 1811, the French Emperor particularly charged upon the President this falsehood. He, the Emperor, after the date of that proclamation, and after he must know of it, declared his decrees of Berlin and Milan to be a part of the laws of his Empire. Not only so, but the ocean from time to time was illuminated with the conflagration of our vessels, burned avowedly by the authority of the Emperor, and in pursuance of those decrees which our prophetic Chief Magistrate had declared to be repealed. Never was falsehood more evident! Mathematics cannot produce more certain demonstration.

Sir, I do not mean here to charge upon the President wilful and corrupt falsehood; but the least that can be said is, that he had been cheated, he was too proud to acknowledge it, and too much ensnared in the toils of his mighty friend to demand satisfaction.

Sir, I will not charge any misconduct upon our Administration without proof. I do not here mean to charge them with any thing artfully committed; but I do mean to be understood that the facts before the American people are strong evidence upon my mind, and I believe upon the minds of thousands, that there is much in our intercourse with France, which decisively demands of the Executive prompt and unambiguous explanation—that the honor of the nation, and the honor of the President, loudly demand it. I do mean to say that, unless this explanation is given, we have a right, indeed it is our duty, to withdraw our confidence from all concerned in the transactions. How, sir, can gentlemen hang their confidence upon the integrity of the Executive, if ultimately no reason shall be given for transactions which are irresistible presumptions to the candid mind, that the dearest interests of our country have been made subservient to the base intrigues, the ambition and malignant passions, of the greatest monster of depravity that ever waded to a throne through blood?

Sir, the President has been charged with falsehood by the Emperor of France; he or his Ministers have been charged with secreting—wickedly secreting—a very important document, in the disclosure of which the people of this country were deeply concerned; and if he has done so, the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY) admits “he ought to be held up to the execration of mankind,” and yet, say some gentlemen, it is a matter of total indifference to us to know whether these charges are true or false.

For one, I never can be reconciled to consider it as a matter of indifference; and I entreat gentlemen to give the President and Mr. Russell an opportunity to deny this foul charge, and, so denied, the nation must and will believe them.

Let them deny it, and brand the infamous falsehood upon the Duke of Bassano. And I do not hesitate to say, if the President and Mr. Russell will disavow the truth of the statement of that Duke to our Minister, Mr. Barlow, they will be believed; for one, I would believe them, in preference to all the mushroom Dukes and Emperors that have grown into power in that Government, whose least vices are falsehood, imposition, and fraud.

Sir, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) asserted, that “if the Orders in Council had been repealed, yet we should have had war. The impressment of our seamen was a sufficient cause, and for that would they have declared it.” Now, sir, much as I respect that gentleman’s talents and integrity, in this instance I must believe he is mistaken. For I will not believe that the Administration would have been given up to such fatal infatuation, such a bewildering, deadly mania, that they would have been so incurably mad as to have plunged this nation into a war on a point, in principle, the most inconsiderable in controversy, without making one more effort, at least, to an amicable adjustment of differences.

Mr. GASTON said that when he entered the House that morning, he had no expectation of taking a part in this debate. He was perfectly conscious of the disadvantages under which he must appear, in attempting, without the benefit of previous reflection, an examination of the argument contained in the extraordinary harangue of the gentleman from Tennessee; an harangue evidently studied and elaborate. But as the question had been called for; as no other gentleman seemed disposed to occupy the floor; and as part of that argument demanded notice, he felt it his duty to claim the attention of the Chair for a few minutes. However unequal the contest, yet in the cause of truth, and of the best interests of his country, he could not hesitate to engage in it. Provided those were advanced, he was little solicitous as to the light in which he might appear.

The gentleman had occupied no inconsiderable portion of the time of the House, with invectives against those who had discouraged loans and enlistments. To the part of the country, said Mr. G., which I have the honor to represent, such invectives are without the possibility of application. With us loans and enlistments have been considered as acts purely voluntary, in which every individual has been left free to pursue his inclinations. Indeed, in these days of distress, few of us have been able to lend, and the temptations to enlistment have not been strong enough to carry off many beside those whom all are willing to part with.

The gentleman has also indulged himself in insinuations, where more seemed meant than met the ear, of a disposition to take the part of Great Britain, and of prepossessions in favor of the enemy. These, he has indeed said, were not designed to apply to any gentleman occupying a seat on this floor. My experience, sir, has been too limited to enable me to ascertain whether I owe this exemption to the gentleman's sense of justice, or whether I am to consider it as a mere form of parliamentary decorum. In this state of doubt, as to the precise meaning of the gentleman, I will content myself with saying, that any charge of partiality to the cause of the enemy, as contrasted with that of my country, so far as regards me, would be utterly untrue. The bare supposition of it is intolerable. It will not be deemed egotism, I trust, to add, that baptized an American in the blood of a martyred father; bound to my native land by every moral and natural tie that can fasten on the heart of man; with not one motive of interest, of passion, or prejudice, to seduce the loyalty of my affections; never can I separate myself from the cause of my country, however that cause may have been betrayed by those to whose care it was confided.

Without commenting on the delicacy of the course which the gentleman has in this respect pursued, its art and address are sufficiently obvious. It reminds me of the mode of escape which naturalists inform us is observed by the cuttle-fish in time of peril. When his adversary is fast gaining upon him, and destruction seems inevitable, he muddies the water through which he glides, and finds safety in confusion. Thus it is with the gentleman from Tennessee. He would escape from this discussion; he would elude the inquiry, how far we owe this war to French imposition, by raising a tumult about British predilections and British arguments.

But the stratagem cannot take. No gentleman will suffer himself to be diverted from the investigation which these resolutions fairly suggest; and such inquiry, deliberately pursued, must terminate in the discovery of the necessary, though melancholy truth.

Mr. G. remarked, that whatever might be the issue of the resolutions, he cordially congratulated the nation that they had been introduced. It was due to the national honor, always involved in the honor of the national agents—and it was due to the best interests of the country, that the mystery which enveloped this subject should be dissipated.

A formal authentic decree of the Government of France, bearing date the 28th of April, 1811, and purporting to be an absolute retraction of the Berlin and Milan decrees, was exhibited by that Government to our representative Mr. Barlow, in May, 1812. On his expressing surprise at the decree, and its ancient date, the French Minister assured him that this decree had been communicated to his predecessor, Mr. Russell, and had been sent on to the French Ambassador at Washington, with orders to lay it before the President. This information from Mr. Barlow was given to this House at the close of its last session, in consequence of a call on the President for intelligence about our relations with France; and it came without any explanation, comment, or denial. On all hands it must be admitted, that a shameful fraud has been somewhere perpetrated. The reputation of the nation demanded that this fraud should be placed to the account of those who had committed it. Upon this imposture he, in his conscience, believed the war had turned. Nothing can be more important to the future safety of the people, than to learn how and whence this calamity had befallen them. Mr. G. declared himself, also, highly gratified with the liberal and manly course which had been pursued by the mover of these resolutions, and his honorable associates. The resolutions had not been introduced at an early day after the sessions because of the wish that an opportunity would be taken or made, by the Administration or its friends, to give the desired intelligence without a call from this side of the House. It was notorious that the public voice demanded a communication. A general curiosity pervaded the country to learn how it was that this decree of 28th April, 1811, had remained unknown here until after the declaration of war, and unknown in England until it was too late, by a repeal of the Orders in Council, to prevent a war. The public sensibility was alive in requiring full assurance that the charge of the fraudulent concealment of this decree—a charge which the French Minister of Foreign Affairs had advanced against our Government and its agents, was not true. Under these circumstances it had been hoped that the task of seeking this information would not be thrown on those who, although they would yield to none in regard for the honor of the nation, or for the honor of its Government, as such could not be presumed to feel a very intense interest in the personal reputation of those who administered its affairs. Mr. G. declared, that for one he had indulged this hope, and had openly expressed it to gentlemen attached to the Administration. It was not until time had shown that nothing would be done from that quarter, that the resolutions in question were presented. The same liberal motives which had delayed their introduction, governed in the course which had been afterwards pursued. Day after day was given before the motion was called up, that all who doubted might examine into its propriety. And when the attention of the House was at length claimed to this subject, all discussion was purposely forborne on the part of the mover and his associates, (under the presumption that a mere call for information would not be resisted,) until such discussion had been rendered unavoidable, by the invitation and defiance of its opponents. Such conduct on the part of a minority, Mr. G. believed, was not often witnessed. It evinced a magnanimity which he was proud to behold, and which augured well to themselves and their country.

A position, said Mr. G., has been taken by the friends of the proposed resolutions, which has given great dissatisfaction to the advocates of the Administration, and against which all the force of assertion and of argument has been directed. No proposition can be more completely established. It is supported by evidence little short of demonstration. The proposition is this, that had the French repealing decree of the 28th of April, 1811, been promulgated at the time of its date, or at any time before the fatal resolution had been taken, to plunge this once happy country into war, it would have averted this dire calamity. Gentlemen in vain attempt to put this question to rest, in vain forbid this position to be taken. It is taken, and it will be maintained with all the obstinacy of right in the face of the nation, and in defiance of every effort that can be used to expel us.

It is not my design to proceed step by step through all the documents which are supposed to be connected with this subject. Few employments can be more stale, flat, and unprofitable, either to the speaker or to the hearer. Indeed, sir, however it may be with others, I am weary of documents. They are so multiplied as to involve every object in obscurity, and to afford to every man, who knows how to wrest a sentence from its plain meaning, a text on which to preach a political sermon, according to his own fancy. I am sick of these documents, because their perusal too plainly shows, what is not unfrequent in private controversies, that we have been written into a war. But it is necessary to take a rapid comprehensive view of the state of our foreign relations, and of our course of policy in regard to them, for a few years before the date of this suppressed decree. This will enable us to ascertain the effect which its promulgation would have produced.

The Berlin and Milan decrees were permanent parts of a gigantic system, invented by Napoleon for the destruction of his adversary. The avowed object of this system was to establish a code of maritime laws, in support of which every commercial nation was to be arrayed in a confederacy, whereof he was to be the Protector, Legislator, and Judge. Of this code the elementary principles were, that the neutral flag should protect all that it covered; that arms and munitions of war should alone be deemed contraband; that fortified places could alone be blockaded; and that no blockade was effectual which was not also a siege. Great Britain was to be deemed an enemy of the human race, and cut off from human intercourse, until she acknowledged the new Napoleon code. The nation that declined to accede to this confederacy, was viewed as the ally of Britain, and subjected to the most rigorous and barbarous usages of war. Her ships were burnt on the ocean, and confiscated in port; her property plundered wherever found; her citizens made prisoners, and her territories invaded.

Britain refused to acknowledge this code; and, professing to retaliate on France the consequences of her own insolence, issued orders prohibiting neutral intercourse with a part of the French dominions so long as France enforced these monstrous decrees. These she proudly declared should last while the decrees lasted. In the revocation of them she would proceed step by step with the repeal of the decrees. It is foreign from my present purpose to inquire how far the retaliatory plea had any foundation; or if founded, whether it went in justification or mitigation only, of the attack on neutral rights. What was the ground taken by our Government? On this point there cannot be mistake. The celebrated report of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, of November, 1808, unquestionably approved by the Executive, and by both branches of the Legislature, for on it was founded the law of non-intercourse with France and Britain, shows it fully. France and Britain were viewed as equal aggressors on our rights. The wrongs of both must be resented, and equally resented, or the wrongs of neither. Any measure of hostility against one, either through the medium of commercial or of actual warfare, not levelled also at the other, was pronounced to be submission. I do not say that the ground taken was correct. On the contrary, I am convinced that it was false in fact, and erroneous in principle. But it was the ground deliberately taken by the concurrent voice of every branch of the Government, solemnly proclaimed to the world as the true American ground, and which, in theory at least, has never yet been abandoned. The act of May, 1810, was an explicit reassertion of the principles of the report of 1808. It refused to resent immediately the wrongs of either belligerent, but pledged the faith of the Legislature, (an idle, rash, unconstitutional pledge!) to become the enemy of that one which should persist in injustice, after the other should have returned from the evil of her ways. If either should cease from the violation of our neutral rights, and, on three months' notice of the fact, her rival enemy should refuse to imitate the praiseworthy example, then by an interdiction of all trade with her ports, or in her productions, the obstinate foe was to be punished. This law afforded a fit opportunity for French juggling. The famous letter of the 5th of August, 1810, of the Duke of Cadore, purported to be founded upon it. This letter announced a revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees, which were to cease to have effect on the first day of November following, upon one or the other of two conditions—the renunciation by Great Britain of her maritime doctrines, “her principles of blockade;” or an enforcement by America against Britain of the interdiction of intercourse.

This equivocal promise was pronounced by our Executive an actual repeal of the obnoxious decrees; and Britain was demanded upon the fact of such repeal, to comply with her engagement, to revoke her orders alleged to be retaliatory. This demand was resisted upon the ground that the latter, instead of repealing, re-affirmed the decrees, the sole objects of which were to compel Britain to renounce her maritime rights, or neutral nations to withhold communication from her. Facts were asserted, and brought forth on each side, in support of the respective constructions given to this Delphic letter. At this time, and during this conflict of expositions in the interpretation of the French Puzzle—a conflict which had it not been followed by consequences the most serious, would have been indeed ludicrous—let us suppose that the appealing decree of April 28, 1811, had made its appearance, as by its date it ought to have done. It must have entirely changed the state of affairs. It must have silenced the controversy as to the construction of the infamous Cadore letter, while it established what was then the fact. It must have forever severed the fatal alliance which the President's proclamation had made between the law of May, 1810, and this pretended repeal of the decrees on the 2d of November. And, sir, whether it had been followed by a corresponding revocation of the British orders or not, it would, in all human probability, have prevented this calamitous war. Would it have been followed by a corresponding revocation of British orders? It is not given to man to pronounce with certainty upon any event which has not happened; but, if it be possible to arrive at truth by inferring, from what did take place, what would have taken place, had the same causes been brought into earlier operation, there is no reason to doubt but that such a revocation would then have followed. This decree of the 28th of April, 1811, however insulting to the American Government in giving it the lie in the face of the world; and however, in other respects, the detestable reverse of what ought to have been desired, was a formal and absolute abrogation of the obnoxious edicts as regarded the United States. Under the hand of the Emperor, and with all the solemnities of a fundamental law of his Empire, it announced: “The decrees of Berlin and Milan are definitively, and to date from the first day of November last, considered as not having existed in regard to American vessels.” Could there be any motive of interest, any suggestion of pride, to prevent Great Britain from thereupon declaring that, as these decrees were definitively withdrawn from American vessels, so, also, were her Orders in Council? So far from it, every inducement must have operated with her to adopt this course. She would find in the edict of the 28th of April a complete victory over the American Government as to the controversy whether France had therefore repealed these decrees. It would have afforded to her one of the most desirable opportunities to contrast her good faith with French perfidy. If she regarded her honor, it would have urged to the measure; if she valued American trade, she would not fail to embrace the certain means of its restoration; if she cared for the friendship of America, she had it completely in her power to dissolve the bands which tied her to France. The President was bound, by the act of March, 1811, on which the French decree of the 28th April professed to be founded, to restore intercourse with Great Britain on the revocation of her orders; and no man was ignorant, much less the British Court, that a restoration of that intercourse must, and would have been followed by the resentment of the tyrant of France. And, do we not know that, as soon as this decree was made known to the British Government, it did occasion a corresponding revocation of the Orders in Council? I say, as soon, for, notwithstanding the objection that an interval of thirty days elapsed between the communication of this decree and the revocation of the orders, yet my estimable friend (Mr. Grosvenor) has explained this circumstance to the conviction of scepticism itself; the Prince Regent was, in fact, without a Ministry. By the constitution of that country, the monarch cannot act but through the intervention of his Ministers. As he is irresponsible to the law, for “he can do no wrong,” he is at liberty to act only through those who are answerable for what is wrong. The first moment when a Cabinet could be had to deliberate on the French decree of April, 1811, produced the revoking order of the 28d of June of last year—an order which the President has himself declared is susceptible of explanations that render it satisfactory.

Since, then, a knowledge of this decree, in May, 1812, was immediately followed by a satisfactory revocation of the obnoxious orders, why are we to believe that a knowledge of it in May, 1811, would not have produced the same consequence? The gentleman from Tennessee undertakes to inform us, and for this purpose has commented with as much fidelity as is usual with most scholiasts on the Prince Regent's declaration on what he calls Lord

Castlereagh's despatch, and on the correspondence of Mr. Monroe with the British Minister, Mr. Foster. These, in his judgment, clearly show that this would not have happened. I cannot, if I would, follow the gentleman through all these comments. My lungs already admonish me that I have spoken long, and there is yet a view of the subject which must not be overlooked. Permit me, however, to say that, whatever impression the circumstances referred to were then calculated to make, and with the lights then alone appearing, they fall infinitely short now of supporting the inference which the gentleman attempts to draw from them. The Prince Regent's declaration affords us not the slightest aid in the inquiry. It speaks only of a full and unconditional repeal of the decrees being followed by a full and unconditional revocation of the Orders. It intimates nothing as to the effect which would be produced on the orders by a repeal of the decrees, as it regarded one neutral only. And this was the explicit language of my friend from New York, notwithstanding the statement given of it by the gentleman from Tennessee. It is one of the proudest triumphs of Truth, that, to combat her with success, she must not be met upon her own ground. Is it strange that the declaration of the Regent is silent on this point? No, sir; it was to be presumed that the new maritime code of Napoleon would be adhered to or relinquished. If adhered to, the orders were to continue; if relinquished, they were to cease. The dispute between the United States and Great Britain was, as to the fact of the repeal or no repeal of the French decrees, and not whether the repeal was limited to America alone, or extended to all neutrals.

Sir, it is premature to pronounce an opinion before the desired information is given us. But as other gentlemen have not hesitated to declare theirs, and as forbearance on my part might be misinterpreted, I have no hesitation in expressing my belief, that the assertion of the Duke of Bassano is false. I do not think that the Executive could have been guilty of an act so detestably wicked as the wilful concealment of a document so all important to his country. And although I know nothing of Mr. Russell, our former Minister to France, I will not believe him guilty (without far better evidence) of such foul treason against the nation which he represented. I feel assured, that the result of the inquiry will prove, that the guilt, and the meanness, and the falsehood of this transaction, have their origin in the Cabinet of Napoleon—that laboratory of frauds and calumnies. But while these are my hopes, and this my belief, I will not conceal my apprehensions. From the silence which has hitherto been observed by the Executive, when the occasion permitted and even required notice of the accusation—from the palliating tone in which the insolent decree has been spoken of as rather "exceptionable in its time and manner," I fear that the honor of the Government and the interests of the nation have not been vindicated by repelling the insult, or by demanding an explanation of the complicated perfidy of France. If from a cautious timid policy, or from any other cause, this course has been neglected, and it is the object of the last resolution to ascertain the fact, this House, I trust, springing immediately from the people, and animated by the feelings which pervade the nation, will not hesitate to evince their sensibility to its wrongs and indignities—their scorn of calumny, and detestation of treachery, even though they proceed from an Imperial source or are allied with hypocritical professions of "love for Americans."

Mr. HANSON rose in reply to Mr. GRUNDY.—He said he would again ask the attention of the House as long as his strength would enable him to keep the floor, whilst he set forth those views which directed his mind upon the present inquiry. He equally regretted, that gentlemen should have dipped so deeply into the documents connected with this very plain and simple question under discussion, and the necessity he was under of replying, in a particular manner, to the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY.) The assertion made by that gentleman, the sentiments he uttered, and the monstrous doctrines he advanced, rendered such a reply unavoidable, if indeed he could ever be disposed to avoid doing his duty. Desirous as he had been from the beginning, to confine the discussion within its proper metes and bounds, with the hope of having presented to the people a simple, plain proposition, he would not have suffered himself to be led into a tedious investigation, but that it seemed altogether fitting for him to reply to the member from Tennessee.

The gentleman charges the minority with being the cause of the war, said Mr. H. Did he mean to say, that they had been laughed or ridiculed into the measure? This was paying a left-handed compliment indeed to the understanding and high political attributes of the men that rule the country, as well as to his own sense and judgment. The truth was, they had waded so far, it was better to go on than turn back. They had so completely committed themselves in their bullying system—their policy of addressing themselves to the fears of England—that, according to their own misconceived notions of consistency and honor, they were obliged to go on, all retreat being cut off—no avenue being left open for escape. Mr. H. here spoke of a self-created committee of Congressmen who called on the President and required him to send the House a Message recommending war. He said the first demand was unsuccessful, but the second succeeded; when he was given to understand that his re-election depended upon his recommending war at once. Mr. H. inveighed in strong terms against such a state of things, when a Presidential election was made to depend upon a recommendation of war.

There was no way of terminating this war, if the House, who held the purse strings of the nation, would grant the supplies to carry it on. The House owed all its importance and authority to the power of the purse. They alone held the purse strings of the nation. To this feature of the constitution they should cling as the floating plank on the ocean—as the rock of their salvation. It was in the power of the House to terminate this bloody and disastrous contest with a nation willing to be at peace with us; and that man was indeed morally guilty of treason, who would furnish the means of ruining his country under the impressions entertained by the minority of this war. With the conviction written on his mind in strong and indelible characters, Mr. H. would feel like a traitor, if he aided in supplying the means to bring the Republic to a premature but inevitable fate if the war was continued another year, of which there could be no doubt, as far as the actions and the hearty wishes of the dominant party and their leaders were a criterion to judge by.

Mr. H. said that nothing but the spirit, perseverance, and patience, of the Federal party, had saved the nation so long from falling into the fangs of France. They cleaved closer and closer to the country as her danger increased. But for their unconquerable attachment to liberty, their ardent and unintermitting exertions to save the nation from the greatest of all sublunary miseries, years ago we should have fallen into the snare set for us by the fell destroyer of nations. By a slow but sure process, said he, has the existing state of intense suffering, alarm, discontent, and danger, been brought upon this people. As direct and as constant as the vane upon the steeple points to the quarter whence the wind blows, shifts with every adverse breeze, as faithfully as the needle designates the North, have the measures of the present incumbent of the palace and his predecessor and preceptor pointed to this war. True, they had occasionally varied and shifted their measures in matter of form as circumstances required—now relaxing, now bracing and invigorating their system—but the political barometer never deceived us. The State vane always showed whether the wind set from Mount Monticello or Gallia's shore, which the weatherwise considered as one and the same thing, in regard to the effect upon the political season. Yes, sir, said he, as regularly as the compass and the heavens conducted the great mariner Cook around the globe, and the breeze propelled his bark along, have the predominating minds of the ruling party, driven on by headstrong passion, have the master magicians behind the scenes, so beautifully dizzened to amuse the eye and divert the judgment, conducted this deluded people, like the alluring night lamp, into swamps, through briars, thickets, and quagmires. But to foretell a year ago the disastrous events that have passed in review before us, in almost "one long unbroken funeral train," betrayed a distempered imagination. A peculiar proclivity to error was perceived in all our speculations, and a treasonable excitement of false alarm was charged against those who foresaw and were bold enough to foretell abortion and disgrace in all the transcendent schemes of glory, conquest, and aggrandizement, engendered in the disordered brains of their authors. Indeed, whoever had the hardihood to venture a prediction of miscarriage, was assailed with the ready argument of minions and pensioners; the cry of tory was thrown into his face like a bowl of cold water. The lamp post, the guillotine, or the gallows, was a punishment scarcely ignominious enough for the man who dare oppose this most righteous, honorable, and profitable war!

Mr. H. said, when the Duke of Cadore's letter was first published in this country, not one man in a hundred supposed for a moment, that the President would take that letter as coming within the meaning of the law of May, 1810, because its express proviso was palpably inadmissible, being a condition precedent, and not a condition subsequent. He likewise asserted, upon authority which he deemed altogether good, that the President himself, when he first received the Duke's letter, pronounced it "jeruitical," and expressed himself in terms authorizing the belief, that he would not accept of it as coming within the terms of the law of May, 1810. However, notwithstanding this, and the undeniable evidence upon the face of the letter itself, to the amazement of all discerning honest men, Mr. H. well recollected to his own utter astonishment, on the 2d of November, 1810, the President did issue his proclamation declaring the fact of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, on the first of the same month and year—that is, that they were repealed the day before, according to the provisions of our law of non-intercourse. Now was drawn the strong line of demarkation between the two great parties in this country. Each took his decided stand, and bottomed its support or opposition to Government upon the truth or falsehood of this proclamation. We, the minority, contended, that there had been a positive violation of a plain law to favor France and embroil us with England—that a palpable juggle had been practised to induce a state of insurmountable repulsion in our relations with one belligerent, as a manifestation of our partiality to the other, and finally, with the view to connect our destinies to those of France. You, the majority, contended, that the President had only discharged a ministerial duty, doing nothing more than the law required of him, and in doing which he had no discretion to exercise. To say nothing of the spirit of prophecy with which it was solemnly proclaimed to-day, that the decrees were bona fide and in "fact" repealed yesterday, I ask what was the fact? how has it turned out in evidence? Were we, the minority, as roundly asserted, in the wrong; or were you, the majority, ab initio, in the wrong, and have you continued in the wrong ever since? What says the evidence in the case? On the 28th of April, 1811, the Emperor promulgates his decree, ante-dated or not, it is immaterial, which commences thus:—"Seeing by the report of our Minister, &c., that the United States have passed a law of resistance, &c., we, Napoleon, &c., do decree, &c." What law of resistance? The March law of 1811, which superseded the false proclamation, and made that proclamation the only evidence of the repeal in the courts of law. So that Administration sought to entrench themselves behind the assumption of the fact, that the decrees were repealed in November, 1810, and that the law of March, 1811, "the law of resistance to England," was a consequence of that repeal; while, on the other hand, our good friend, Bonaparte, officially declares, and produces the very repealing decree itself to remove all doubt, that the repeal was a consequence of the law of resistance. To aggravate the wrong and insult, he solemnly declares, through his Minister of State, that the repealing decree had been communicated to Mr. Russell and Mr. Serrurier about the time of its date, in order that it might be laid before this Government. It is this collateral fact of communication that these resolutions are meant, perhaps in vain, to establish. Were we right and you wrong? The evidence is before the world, and the best and only witness to the fact, the Emperor himself, by publishing his decree, proves the rectitude of our course and the fallacy of all your positions. It proves the proclamation to have been false, the law of March to have been unjust, as predicated (to use the fashionable phrase) upon a falsehood; and it proves that every step since taken towards this war was in our own wrong, contrary to truth, justice and honor—it proves that the war has no other foundation to rest on than an undeniable authenticated falsehood. The war, therefore, deserves and can be distinguished truly by no other appellation than an unnecessary, unjust, and unrighteous war, for opposing which we are moral traitors! All the gentleman's reasoning, (Mr. Grundy,) therefore, drawn from Monroe's and Mr. Foster's correspondence, is of no avail, and merits no reply.

To strengthen my positions, I will introduce another piece of testimony, from a witness altogether unexceptionable, the late Secretary of State,* than whom none, save the President himself, stood higher in the estimation of the dominant party, and whose honor was guarded with a punctilious delicacy, amounting almost to adoration, as manifested by the dismissal of Mr. Jackson. What says this witness? I am afraid, by undertaking to repeat his testimony, I shall weaken and adulterate his precise and energetic language, and will therefore give his own words:

"It is within the recollection of the American people, that the members of Congress, during the last session, were much embarrassed as to the course most proper to be taken with respect to our foreign relations, and that their embarrassments proceeded principally from the defect in the communications to them as to the views of the Emperor of the French. To supply this defect was the great desideratum. At a critical period of their perplexities, the arrival at Norfolk of an Envoy Extraordinary from France was announced. Immediately thereon all their proceedings touching our foreign relations were suspended. Their measures, as avowed by themselves and as expected by the nation, were then to be shaped according to the information that might be received from Mr. Serrurier, especially as he necessarily must have left France long after the all-important first day of November. Upon his arrival at Washington, and immediately after he had been accredited, knowing, as I did, the impatience of Congress and of my countrymen, I lost no time in having with him a conference. This conference I concluded by stating that I would take the liberty of addressing to him a note propounding the several questions that I had just had the honor of putting to him in conversation, and that thus by his answer I should be enabled to lay before the President, with the utmost precision, his communications to me. I accordingly immediately prepared the following draught of a letter, and considering the President's sanction a matter of course, I had it, in due official form, copied by the appropriate clerk. But waiting on the President with it, and after having reported to him verbally the result of the conference, I was, to my astonishment, told by him that it would not be expedient to send to Mr. Serrurier any such note. His deportment, throughout this interview, evinced a high degree of disquietude, which occasionally betrayed him into fretful expressions. Having in view nothing but the dignity of the Government, and the prosperity of my country, and, overlooking his peevishness, I entreated him, but in a manner the most delicate, not to withhold from Congress any information that might be useful to them at so momentous a juncture."

To give its full and proper force to Mr. Smith's evidence, a short notice of some interesting and important circumstances attending the introduction and final adoption of the March law of 1811 will be necessary. The gentleman who was Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations at that time, is now a member of this House, and is in his seat. I say, then, as well as I remember, (correct me if I am wrong,) he introduced the law of March, 1811, just as Mr. Serrurier's arrival was announced. As soon as the Minister's arrival in Washington was known, he withdrew his bill, as understood at the time, to proceed wittingly, and to allow time to ascertain from the new Minister fresh from France, whether the decrees of Berlin and Milan were actually repealed, as assumed and proclaimed by the Executive. The inference would be drawn by the public, if, after allowing due time to learn the result of the conferences between the Secretary of State, the bill was again reported, that the result of such conference was favorable, and removed all doubt of the truth of the proclamation. If not again reported, the conclusion would necessarily be drawn, that the information extracted from Mr. Serrurier, was unfavorable. What was the result? Recur to the testimony given by Mr. Smith, and all doubt is removed. In this state of things what did the Committee of Foreign Relations? The Chairman again introduced the law of resistance against England, bottomed upon the asserted repeal of the decrees and the President's proclamation, which itself rested upon what is now established to be a juggle of France—an undeniable untruth. The nation of course did infer that Mr. Surruier had fully satisfied the Administration of the repeal of the decrees. There were those, to be sure, (Mr. H. was among the number,) who never for a moment changed their opinion, but the many continued under the delusion until Mr. Smith's disclosures burst upon the nation, aroused general indignation, and struck with amazement and horror every man whose mind was open to conviction. Nevertheless, the Administration proceeded with a steady step to their point of destination, and finally plunged the country into this most ruinous, calamitous war, which has filled the nation with grief and mourning, and brought us to the verge, if not the gulf, of national bankruptcy. They rushed on blindfolded till they were so far advanced as not to have the power of preventing this people from being sucked into the vortex, which had well nigh swallowed up the liberties of the world, and but for the memorable and glorious events which have opened a new era to the nations of the earth, would have sealed the doom of this rising empire.

Mr. MONTGOMERY rose, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I have risen to give a concise view of the reasons which have determined me to vote against the resolutions under consideration. Whenever I am made to believe, that information sought for by gentlemen, is necessary in order to form a correct opinion as to the course to be pursued in respect to any matter proper to be acted on by this House, I will heartily join in calling for it; and on the present occasion, if I could be convinced that the information sought for would prove that the war against Great Britain was unjust, that we are seeking to wrest from her something to which by the principles of national law she is justly entitled, I would join in the call, and would take such measures as would show that we now abandoned our pretensions and desired peace. But, sir, I cannot take this view of the subject.

I have reflected on these resolutions with a view of discovering whether the information sought for could form the basis of any useful act on the part of this House, or of this Government, and the conclusion of my mind is that it would not; I am therefore resolved to oppose them. I take the object of the mover to have been either to procure the information to serve as the basis of some act in this House in relation to some of our functionaries, the Government or Emperor of France, or the present war with England. Let us then examine them in reference to the first of these objects: if it is intended merely to afford the ground of censure and invective against some one or more of our functionaries, it can produce no good effect, no public benefit could be expected to result; besides, there would be a species of unfairness in the course, as the facts and arguments in defence, on the part of the accused, could not be fully developed. If any misconduct sufficient to ground an impeachment has been transacted, let gentlemen make the charge and proceed by way of impeachment; the subject will then be fully investigated, the accused can be heard.

Let us examine the subject with reference to the Government of France, and I believe it will be seen that no probable good can result. If it is merely to afford the foundation of philippics against the Emperor of France, I object to it, because I would view it as a waste of time, without so much as the consolation of believing that any thing we could say would produce a single instant of disagreeable feeling; and certainly it cannot be intended to pave the way for a declaration of war against that nation, when we have a negotiation pending, to finish which we have but recently sent a Minister.

Let us next examine the information sought for with a view to see whether the justice of the present war is dependent upon it: I hold that it is in no point of view dependent upon the withholding of timely information of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees. This will lead me to take a short retrospect of the conduct of Great Britain and France about the time of the date of the Orders in Council, and the Berlin and Milan decrees, for the purpose of showing the true character of the difference between those nations and this; in doing which, it will not be necessary to ascertain which first aggressed upon our rights, or from which we receive the greatest quantum of injury; it will be enough that each has given us just cause of war. It will be recollected that France and Great Britain, after having carried on the present war several years previous to the year 1806-'7, with all the rancor which the human mind is susceptible of—each struggling for the destruction of the other—found their efforts unavailing by the ordinary course of warfare. France, inflated with and wielding a power on the Continent rarely witnessed, had been unable to conquer Great Britain by the direct operations of war: Great Britain, powerful on the ocean beyond all example, had been unable to bring France to terms by the ordinary course of war upon her ships, colonies, and commerce. In this state of things, they seem to have determined respectively that every thing should yield to their views of mutual destruction and self-aggrandizement; that those principles of natural reason, which ought to govern all nations, and which, under the name of national law, had been acknowledged by all civilized nations, should be no longer regarded: they commenced a system of depredation, of plundering of the commerce of all peaceful nations, each alleging that the course taken was founded in just retaliation. Under this state of things, what was the American Government bound to do? I answer, that at most, barely to demand reparation from both; and upon refusal, she might rightfully declare war against one or both, according to our view of political expediency. We were under no moral obligation to procure a repeal of the Berlin or Milan decrees, as a condition precedent to our having a just cause of war against Great Britain for captures under her Orders in Council; neither were we bound to procure a repeal of the Orders in Council as a condition precedent to a just war against France for captures under the Berlin and Milan decrees. Each had violated our perfect rights, and we had a right to select our enemy. As well might it be contended, that a man is bound to adjust the priority of injury between two highwaymen who have at distinct times robbed him, before he shall proceed to enforce the law and recover his property, as to insist that we could have no just cause of war against France or Great Britain, without procuring a repeal of the Orders in Council, or Berlin and Milan decrees.

The American Government it will be recollected endeavored to procure justice, to procure the repeal of these lawless interdictions of neutral commerce by negotiation, and failed. It was then deemed expedient to adopt some counter restriction, with the view and with the hope that it would dispose one or both of the belligerents to act justly. It was highly important to succeed in obtaining justice from even one, as that would have left us to contend single-handed against the other. With this view we resorted to embargo, non-intercourse, and non-importation laws, connected with negotiation. We were bandied about from Paris to Washington, and from Washington to London, to no purpose but to prove the perfidy of the belligerents, for several years. Here let me ask, whether we are bound perpetually to pursue this course? I think most certainly not. We had a perfect right to cease to endeavor to procure the repeal of either of the belligerent restrictions, and assert our right to the peaceful navigation of the ocean. We did so, and war was declared against Great Britain. I think it but a fair conclusion, from what I have advanced, that the war was just at the time of declaring it, as it stood connected with the Orders in Council. But a view of the war as connected with other causes will go to establish still more firmly the conclusion, and strengthen the arguments before advanced.

We were entitled to compensation for spoliations upon our commerce; and a renunciation on the part of Great Britain of the doctrine of her right to impress seamen from on board American ships; and an abandonment of the practice. As I have heard no person contend that there were not causes for war, according to the principles of national law, it will be unnecessary to stop to prove them so; it will only be proper to remark somewhat on their nature. With respect to the first, I will barely remark, that one of the strongest possible guarantees against the repetition of national injuries, is the exacting complete reparation for the past wrongs. With respect to the second, it is in every point of view important: the very end of the institution of Government is violated in respect to our seafaring men, if we neglect or refuse to protect them to the utmost of our power. A second argument is drawn from the very injurious effect the practice would have upon our commerce; it would be in the power of the British Government in this way to supplant us in every market. A third argument to show its importance, is drawn from the inestimable value of personal liberty. A fourth reason for making a firm stand in opposition to it, is, that it is of a permanent nature; it is not one of those rights which Great Britain sets up as a belligerent right, depending upon the present war; but one which she claims to exercise through all time.

From the foregoing view, the conclusion is much strengthened, that we had good cause of war; and that political expediency required it should be declared is, to my mind, also strongly evinced.

Further, sir, I am opposed to these resolutions, because they seem to imply that we had no cause of war except for spoliations under the Orders in Council, or that we were willing to abandon the other causes. If these resolutions pass, it might be inferred, and would, I have no doubt, by our enemy, that we now thought we had not sufficient cause of war, without resorting to injuries under the Orders in Council; that we now repented the course we have taken. I am opposed to such policy; nothing can be gained by it, and much may be lost. We have taken a course, it is not unjust, and interest and honor requires we should pursue it firmly, and if possible bring it to a successful end.

Again, sir, I am opposed to these resolutions, because I believe they are ill-timed, and may have an unhappy effect on our negotiations now pending with Great Britain. It appears to me entirely probable, that if the British Ministry are informed of our being about to review the causes which have been alleged for the war, that she will be indisposed to concede anything until she knows the result; this may produce delay, and defeat the negotiation entirely. We ought not to expect reparation, if we but seem to doubt our claim.

It is contended on the part of those that support the resolutions, that the British Government were not notified of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees in proper time; and that the war would have been prevented by a timely notice of the repeal, by producing the repeal of the Orders in Council. It is impossible to know certainly that a repeal of the Orders in Council would not have preceded our declaration of war, if the repeal had been promptly communicated; but, to my mind, there seems to be little ground for the inference, that they certainly would have been repealed, taking into view the terms of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, or rather the modification, and the kind of repeal which was required by the British Government. Mr. Foster, the British Minister, in his letter to Mr. Monroe, our Secretary of State, dated July 3d, 1811, says "That, whenever France should have effectually repealed her Berlin and Milan decrees, and should have restored neutral commerce to the condition in which it stood previously to the promulgation of those decrees, we should immediately repeal our Orders in Council." This is the language of the authorized agent of the British Government; and, from this declaration, we were required not only to procure from France such a modification as would restore our own commerce as a neutral to its wonted footing, but a complete repeal, restoring the commerce of all neutral nations to the footing upon which it rested before the issuing of the Berlin and Milan decrees. The repeal or rather modification of the Berlin and Milan decrees of the 28th of April, 1811, only respected American commerce, leaving the commerce of all other neutrals to their operation. Hence it is evident, that the Orders in Council could not be expected to be repealed upon the production of an instrument merely modifying those decrees to favor the Americans: and this would seem at least a tolerable apology for not giving the British Government early information of the existence of such instrument. It was not such a writing as they required. And, by the way, I think their requisition so insulting and so unreasonable, that no further attempt ought to have been made; it was not enough that we would obtain from France a partial repeal or modification so as to secure our rights, but we were required to engage in the very chivalrous business of being the advocate and champion of all neutral nations, in order to procure the exercise of our rights.

But, sir, I do not believe the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees was the true cause of the rescinding the Orders in Council. The Prince Regent, in the instrument repealing the Orders in Council, expresses his opinion that the French repealing decree was not such as had been required; from which, believing as I do, that he was not disposed to yield to the United States or any other nation any thing through mere courtesy, I infer that some other reason or cause induced the repeal. More than a month elapsed between the notification of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, before the Orders in Council were repealed. Another reason to show it improbable that the one was really the cause of the other:—it will be recollected, that great complaints existed in the great manufacturing towns of Great Britain on account of the operation of the Orders in Council; that a lengthy investigation was had in the House of Commons to ascertain their effects upon their own commerce and manufactures. Now, sir, I believe that the result of this inquiry was, that their own restrictions were recoiling upon themselves; that their own manufactures, one of the main pillars of their opulence and power, was about to be sapped, and the nation vitally injured; and this I believe was the real cause of the repeal of the Orders in Council. The modification of the Berlin and Milan decrees happily presented an apology, and rescued them from the open shame of being obliged to abandon their own measures without a plausible reason.

It has been contended by some of those who support these resolutions, that, if the Orders in Council had been repealed, we would not have gone to war on account of the doctrine and practice of impressment; and they infer this from our Government failing to press the subject of impressment for some time in the course of the last attempts at adjustment by negotiation. To this I answer, that it is impossible to know what course our Government would have taken; but it is very clear to me, that this nation would have shown an astonishing indifference to its honor and interest to have abandoned the ground which it had taken, and ably maintained by argument, in relation to this point. But I conceive there is a very satisfactory reason why the American Government did not continually press this point; this was a matter in which Britain stood alone: it did not depend upon the war; it was important to adjust with one of the warring powers the differences connected with the war, with a view to placing one of them more directly and exclusively in the wrong. This I take to be the true reason why the point of impressment was not so constantly pressed, and not that our Government viewed it as inconsiderable in its nature.

Mr. TELFAIR expressed his regret at the range that this question had taken, though an apprehension of the reality had been excited by the introduction of the resolutions before the House. He arose not to follow the example of gentlemen, but to exhibit it in a point of view in which, to his surprise, it had not yet been presented. Sir, the question of the policy, the justice, or necessity of a declaration of war, is not the one now before the nation—it is idle to spend time in debating it—the special and important objects of this session will not sanction the discussion of it. It has not only been discussed in its proper place, but was renewed at the last session, and the causes most ably developed. May I be excused, sir, in expressing an apprehension that the consciousness of defeat at that time has induced the opposition to renew their charge at this session, goaded on as they are by recent mortification, and cheered by the enchantments of existing hope. But, sir, is there no termination to a question of this sort? Is every effort of the Government in prosecuting the war to be clogged by details of the causes which produced it? What, Mr. Speaker, is the acknowledged definition of war? It is the combined energies of one nation brought forcibly into action against the united exertions of another, legitimately authorized by either. Who, sir, under our constitution, is authorized to declare war? Not, as in England, a capricious or ambitious monarch; but the Congress of the United States—a body taken from the people, and liable again to remain among them—emphatically, sir, the people themselves. Surely, then, when the nation is legitimately declared to be in a state of war, when, in the language of the definition, the people are called upon to unite in resisting foreign dominion—when the enemy is knocking at your very doors, it is the duty not only of the minor officers of this country to stand forth in its cause, but it is more imperiously the duty of every branch of that power which had declared it to prosecute it with vigor, to the intent that an honorable and permanent peace may be secured. The declaration of war, when legitimately made, is like every other truth demonstrated to the human mind, which is ever after received as an undeniable proposition whence to deduce other consequences, until refuted by additional developments of the same faculty which established it. But the same authority under our constitution which declared the war is not adequate to a restoration of peace. Hence, the want of complete analogy; hence, when the Congress have declared the nation in a state of war, its judgment is final as to itself—to prosecute it is within its competency; but legislation for a peace is by this act transferred to the treaty-making power. But, sir, further, this is defensive war; for that nation which has committed the first aggression upon some primary or essential right of another, has commenced the act of war, and that other which reacts under a declaration, whether by retaliation or otherwise, is on the defensive. Yes, sir, such a nation is on the defensive, even though an attack upon the enemy in his own quarters be made, in order to secure you from future harm. And will gentlemen pretend to say that Great Britain has not committed glaring outrages upon the primary and essential rights of this nation; that she has not levelled a deadly blow at its very independence? That she has not essayed to bring us back to a state of colonization? Was not the requisition to pass all of our vessels through her ports, there to pay a tax or duty, in the form of license, such an outrage? Was not the extensive blockade of the ports of Europe, without an adequate force, under which our vessels were rifled, such a violation of the fundamental principles of national law as to justify this nation in resistance? Was not, I ask, sir, the horrid usurpation of impressing American seamen, of consigning them to the most cruel of bondage, that under which they might be compelled to serve as instruments in heaping insult and injury upon their own nation, upon their countrymen, their brethren, an encroachment of the most daring kind—a violation of a primary and essential right of this nation, such as called for many reaction on our part?

French Decree.

Gentlemen, in the course of debate, have revived the insulting, and I had hoped obsolete charge of French influence. It is not, sir, in my nature to enter a defence, which would be as degrading to me, as derogatory to the Chief Magistrate of this nation, whose enlightened and liberalized mind early rose superior to that unhallowed selfishness of soul which grasps at the trappings of aristocracy, and with conscious littleness shrinks from the sacred principles of Republicanism, because it affords no artificial props to ephemeral greatness. The private as well as public virtues of this man so effectually shield him from the shafts of unjust insinuations as to need no vindication. I speak, sir, with freedom, because I am conscious that those who know me will not believe me capable of flattery. As I should depise more than I can express the Administration susceptible of such an influence, in like manner is my abhorrence of such a charge made upon any other than the most irresistible evidence.

Sir, the gentlemen who repeat this charge should recur to the source whence so degrading an imputation first emanated. He who first proclaimed the existence of French influence in this country was proven an abhorred and cruel traitor. Yes, sir, the first tongue which dared to utter such an insinuation was that of the ever accursed Arnold—let gentlemen then pause, and weigh well the motive of such a charge. But let me not, hence, be supposed to accuse every one who repeats it of nurturing the same execrable spirit—no, sir, I dare not wrong myself by uttering so unwarranted an accusation against honorable members; yet I would expect of gentlemen to refer to those sentiments of honor which are their boast before they repeat so foul a charge derived from so infamous a source.

I am now, Mr. Speaker, brought to the special reasons which will induce my negative to these resolutions. It has been admitted by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SHEFFER,) or the mover of these resolutions, (Mr. WEBSTER,) I cannot distinctly recollect which, and if I err in the reference, I assert the fact myself, that the resolution introduced at the close of the last session, and answered by the President, embraced all the matter in general terms, contained in those now before the House, so far as is consistent with the relative characters of the Executive and Legislative branches. It was in these words:

“Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to be caused to be laid before this House the French decree purporting to be a repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, referred to in his Message of the 4th of November last, together with such information as he may possess concerning the time and manner of promulgating the same; and also any correspondence or information touching the relations of the United States with France, in the office of the Department of State, not heretofore communicated, which, in the opinion of the President, it is not incompatible with the public interest to communicate.”

This House, then, sir, had made a special call upon the Executive as to the time and manner of the promulgation of this decree; they made a general call as to all correspondences and other information touching the relations between this Government and that of France, with the usual exception of such matters as the public interest forbade him to communicate. This resolution having been answered by the President, enclosing the documents desired, what, I ask, sir, was the fair and reasonable presumption? Certainly that the President had done his duty; that he had communicated all the information in the Department of State not within the express reservation or exception contained in the resolution itself; and this belief, no doubt, upon the receipt of the President's answer, existed in every mind, until the assertion of the Duke of Bassano, not repeated in his note to Mr. Barlow, destroyed in some minds this fair presumption. This presumption, which in the discussion of a contested election, the day before yesterday, was urged with so much pertinacity and success by the gentlemen on the other side of the House, the advocates of these resolutions seem now to have abandoned or forgotten. A sheriff in that instance had been required by the law to administer an oath to the clerks of election, but no certificate of such oath appearing on the returns, the petitioning member avers that it was not administered; but, sir, such regard had the gentleman for the reputation of this officer, that this presumption was sufficient to repel the assertion of a respectable individual, formerly a member of this House, and at that time petitioning to be admitted in lieu of the sitting member. This presumption in favor of the officer, I believed with them to be founded in sound principle, and its influence was visible on the vote of this House—a principle whose influence cherishes, not only the character of the honest officer of the Government, but pervades every class of the community—for every man is presumed innocent until proven to be guilty. But, forsooth, this principle in every other situation so sacred, when applied to the Chief Magistrate of the United States, is rejected—to him it furnishes no protection. A being whose character has been portrayed with a pencil dipped in acrimony; a being whom the opposition have described as the mere creature of Bonaparte, the prime agent of the destroyer of Europe, is to absolve, by a mere ipse dixit, this fair and most reasonable presumption. Upon the declaration of such an individual in the conversation with our Minister, that the decree had been communicated to the predecessor of Mr. Barlow, the presumption that the President had done his duty, had communicated every thing relative to its promulgation which the interest of the country did not forbid, suddenly vanishes—an effect which the assertion of the most respectable freeman of his country would not produce under like circumstances, if uttered against the most insignificant officer of the Government. This enchantment, indeed, looks like French influence; and, sir, we have strong reason to apprehend that the morality of this new standard of veracity—this same Duke of Bassano—will supersede the doctrines of that good pious soul the Prince Regent, the bulwark of our religion.

Mr. PEARSON addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I rise to address you under circumstances not the most favorable to myself; nor can I indulge the expectation of obtaining the patient attention of the House at this late hour of the day, and after a discussion, on the part of some gentlemen at least, so able and so interesting. But, sir, impelled by a sense of positive duty to myself, and to those good men who have placed me here as their representative, I cannot for a moment hesitate to forego all considerations of personal convenience, to do that which every gentleman of the minority, in the habit of speaking, ought to do, protest against the abominable, the slavish doctrine advanced, and repel the charges and insinuations made by the member from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY.) It is not, however, my purpose solely to notice the remarks of the member from Tennessee; nor shall I pursue other gentlemen through all their windings and turnings, in the wild, wide range they have taken in this debate. The proposition before us, demands some attention. It is plain, simple, and distinct; it is an inquiry for "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," in relation to a subject deemed vitally interesting to us as a people—involving the reputation of our Administration and its agents, or that being and his agents, who tells us he loves us, and we are doomed to call our ally. To gentlemen situated as the honorable member from Kentucky, (Mr. McKEE,) who was ignorant of the call made on the Executive last session on this subject, and the result of that call—to some gentlemen who have just taken their seats in the House for the first time, the resolutions under consideration may appear unnecessarily definite and inquisitorial. They might well imagine, that a general resolution, in ordinary form, would bring forth all the information now desired. The reasonableness of this opinion proves, incontestably, the propriety and necessity of the course now proposed. A general call, such as that proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, was made near the close of the last session of Congress. The terms of that resolution were sufficiently broad and comprehensive to authorize the expectation, that the information sought for would be obtained. What was the fact? In the night, and at the last hour of the session, a confidential Message was received from the President containing those garbled extracts which have excited so much suspicion and indignation, which evidently left a tale behind, which it is our purpose and our duty to unfold. It is a fact also, not unworthy of remembrance, that in reply to a call of the Senate on this same subject, the like extracts were given under the injunction of secrecy. Is it not a theme for curious speculation, to know what high and weighty considerations of State rendered necessary a pledge of secrecy on the part of both branches of the Legislature, as the condition on which those precious extracts should be made known to them; and what sudden change of policy should have absolved the members of this House from the pledge of secrecy, which for several weeks had been imposed on the Senate? What was the real motive for keeping those papers from the public eye is to me unknown; and I trust, other considerations, than the mere convenience of the galleries, authorized their public disclosure.

French Decrees.

Mr. Speaker: In a Government like this, where not only freedom, but publicity of debate is guarantied by the charter of our rights; where the people have the right to know, not only what is done, but how and by whom, all transactions enveloped in mystery, or clothed with secrecy, naturally excite suspicion, and not unfrequently alarm. This will continue inseparable from our nature, whilst a vestige of liberty remains. It is that characteristic of freemen which distinguishes them from the slaves and sycophants of power. Here let me tell gentlemen, whatever may be their opinions, however honest and unbounded may be their confidence, there does exist no slight impression among many of our best and wisest men, that all is not right in the relations of this country with the Government of France—that “something is rotten in the state of Denmark.” Whether this impression be well or illy founded, is not for me to say; but when we reflect, that amid this massy pile of documents, with which your tables are breaking and your shelves are groaning, so few pages are to be found in relation to our complicated concerns with France, scarcely one entire letter to be seen, and no where to be heard a bold, dignified and spirited tone of remonstrance against the monstrous wrongs and galling insults of the tyrant who rules that devoted nation: when it is recollected, also, that there is a private chest, a box of arcana in the vaults of this House, whose contents, though almost moulding with age, have not yet seen the light; and of whose importance many gentlemen of this House can bear testimony, particularly the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) who but lately, whilst a member of the Senate, underwent a sort of ordeal for having impiously, or inadvertently, brought to the light one of those hidden offsprings of French intrigue, still too tender for exposure. When all these things crowd upon our recollection, and when it is evident, as has been shown by my honorable friend from Maryland, (Mr. HANSON,) from the written testimony of your late Secretary of State, (a man then high in your confidence,) and for a supposed insinuation against his veracity, the nation was nearly set into a flame, and the offender, a man in the character of a messenger of peace, banished like a culprit from our land; that the Executive of these United States did, after the arrival of the French Minister Serrurier, in the month of February, 1811, refuse to permit necessary and proper inquiries to be made of him, in relation to the pretended repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, and did permit the unfortunate law of 2d March, 1811, to be passed, (confirming the erroneous and fatal proclamation of the 2d November, 1810,) under the false supposition that the French decrees had been repealed, when almost every man doubted, and many of the most intelligent denied the fact, without allowing those inquiries to be made, which would have elicited the truth, dispelled our doubts, and saved the nation from the gulf into which it has fallen. With these and many other facts and circumstances (some of which perhaps I may have occasion to notice in the course of my remarks) fresh in the recollection of a free, a jealous, and enlightened people, is it, ought it to be a matter of surprise even with the most confident believers in Executive purity and infallibility, that such suspicions, such impressions as I have stated, do exist? No, sir, the wonder is they are not universal. I hesitate not to say, I never have considered the communications from the present and late Executive, on the subject of French affairs, sufficiently full, free, and entire—they have in general been characterized by a tameness of expression, easily mistaken for the language of apology. Indeed, our late Minister in France, (Barlow,) from his own showing, disdained not to become the apologist of France for acts of the most flagrant and wanton injustice, which the agents of that nation did not deign to palliate or excuse. Witness what he said in justification of our trading under French license. Witness his excuse for the seizure and judgment of confiscation of the brig Belisarius and cargo, by the Council of Prizes, in January or February, 1812, because this vessel and cargo were liable to the decree of Milan, of the 17th December, 1807. Witness the reasons he urges for the promulgation of the paper in question, purporting to be a repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, bearing date 28th April, 1811. He shrewdly conceived, after the appearance of the declaration of the Prince Regent of the 21st April, 1812, that a document might be exhibited, so carved and cut and ante-dated, as to satisfy the incredulous of his country, and still steer clear of producing a repeal of the Orders in Council. He did not ask it for his own satisfaction, or that of his Government. No, he was perfectly satisfied that the Berlin and Milan decrees had ceased to be applied to American vessels. And why?—because America did not permit her flag to be denationalized. In other words, because America had conformed to the principles of those decrees—she submitted to them, and claimed the benefit of exception, expressed in the decrees themselves. Yes, sir, here is the only true reason why our vessels are or have at any time been exempted from the full effect and operation of those decrees. It is an admission supported, to my understanding, by the most incontestable facts, that those decrees are not, and never have for a moment been repealed; that no exemption from their rigid operation, in our favor, was ever admitted till after the proclamation of the President was received in France. Even that proclamation did not arrest the progress of seizures and captures; it had the effect only of continuing our property in a state of sequestration, mortgaged as security for further resistance to Great Britain, which was accomplished by the law of March, 1811; and not until the knowledge of that law in France, was there a single case of an American vessel captured since the 1st of November, 1810, that had been released, or even had a trial. Strange, then, that gentlemen will still contend, as some have this day, that those decrees ceased to violate our neutral commerce on the 1st of November, 1810, and that there have been no cases of seizure, capture, and condemnation, under them, from that time to this. They might as well have said, there had been no burnings either. The truth is, there have been seizures, captures, and condemnations, almost uniformly during the whole period. I defy any gentleman to produce a single case where a decision has been made by the Council of Prizes, the regular tribunal for pronouncing the law, exempting American vessels from the operation of those decrees. On the contrary, there are cases of their express application—condemnations have been made of American vessels within the period alluded to, by the Council of Prizes—among other reasons for having violated those very decrees. I can here instance the ship Julian, and Hercules, and others, which have been furnished from the Department of State. The fact is this, sir: since we have taken up the business of resistance in conformity to the dictates of the Berlin and Milan decrees, the Emperor in his good pleasure, has, by his own special interposition, released many of our vessels which would have otherwise been condemned, and thus our submission to, has been transformed into a repeal of his decrees. But, sir, why labor this subject, already worn threadbare? The Emperor himself has proven that the famous letter of 5th August, 1810, did not warrant the assertion that his decrees were repealed, and thus does he give the lie to the proclamation of your President. Mr. Speaker, in addition to the important disclosure already stated on the authority of your late Secretary of State, permit me to refer to the same authority, for evidence of a most important fact of concealment, or withholding information, in relation to the views and intentions of the French Government; which, had it been disclosed, would or ought to have been all essential to the deliberations of this House, and ought of itself to have prevented the enactment of that unwarrantable and fatal law of March 2, 1811. The fact is this: That on the 22d of February, 1811, previous to the passage of the law of March, and whilst it was under consideration in the House of Representatives, the French Government did, formally and officially, through their Minister, Mr. Serrurier, make known their determination not to restore the property which had been seized and condemned in the ports of France.

It will be recollected, by the construction which the President himself gave to his own powers under the law of May, 1810, as expressed by the letters from the Department of State to the American Minister in France, of 5th June and July, 1810, that the restoration, or satisfactory assurances of indemnity for the immense amount of American property unjustly seized and condemned in France, was made an indispensable pre-requisite—the sine qua non, to the enforcement of the non-importation against England, and the contrary as to France. With this declaration before us, and before the world, was it just, was it fair, was it consistent, to withhold from the Legislature of this nation, the knowledge of the fact that the property of our citizens would not be restored—that this indispensable pre-requisite would not be complied with? Could we with a knowledge of this fact have passed the law of March, 1811? Would we have done a deed so pregnant with mischief, and which has brought forth the calamities we now endure?

Mr. Speaker, will it be said that the evidence of your late Secretary of State, has lost its conclusive authority with many of his former admirers? be it so; the facts, however, here stated, never have been denied, they are susceptible of proof, and you are pointed to the witness.

The statement receives additional confirmation to my mind, from having been told by a gentleman of unquestionable veracity, about the time of the present French Minister's arrival in this city, that the late Secretary of State informed him, that he intended to relieve Congress and the nation from the suspense and doubt which existed in relation to the repeal of the French decrees, by being very explicit and decisive with the new French Minister, on the subject—or words to this effect. Sir, the note he prepared was explicit and decisive; but it was explicitly and decisively refused to be sent by the higher authority. Well do I remember the history of those times, and although I never for a moment believed in the fair and bona fide repeal of the French decrees, I participated in the general satisfaction expressed on hearing of the arrival of the French Minister at Norfolk—believing the period was then at hand, when all doubt, all embarrassment on the question of the pretended repeal would be removed, and the real state of our relations with France made bare to the nation. The dubious, unfixed, and tardy course of the Committee of Foreign Relations at that period cannot be forgotten—even their labors were suspended for the event. Sir, the Minister arrived, but our fond expectations were blasted, not a word, not a whisper of intelligence reached this House; we were left still to grapple in the dark; the Committee of Foreign Relations hurried through the law of March 1811, the effects of which are now scourging this land. What our disappointment was on this occasion, can well be imagined; but what our indignation ought to have been, when made acquainted with the cause of this disappointment, cannot be expressed.

French Decrees.

One word more, sir, on this hated subject of French decrees. I have stated, at the time of issuing the President's proclamation, and passing the law of March, 1811, I did not believe in their repeal; and here I will take occasion to remark, that, independent of other evidence, the testimony of Mr. Jonathan Russell, then our agent in France, in his letters to the Department of State, during the winter of 1810-11; tended strongly to confirm this opinion; the facts he relates in relation to the seizure of the New Orleans Packet, the schooner Friendship, and others, and his reasoning on those facts, are not only conclusive as to the continued operation of those decrees, but that he knew they were not repealed. This gentleman, however, seems subsequently to have changed his opinions, and yielding perhaps to an impetus not to be resisted, labors to prove that we were not shuffed into the lead, where national honor and the law required us to follow. As this gentleman is one of the persons implicated in the subject of the present inquiry, let me say, whilst I remember it, that so far from having the terms of those resolutions narrowed, or the inquiry more limited, I would suggest to the honorable mover the propriety of adding an interrogatory to this effect—whether Mr. Russell has, by any public official communication, denied or admitted the charge made by the Duke of Bassano, that the decree of the 28th April, 1811, was communicated to him at or about the time of its date. No private or verbal declarations on the subject ought to satisfy us.

Mr. Speaker, whether the promulgation of the French repealing decree of April, 1811, at the time it bears date would have produced a repeal of the Orders in Council, is perhaps, at this time, a question not very essential to decide. It has, however, received much importance from this discussion. In reply to a remark from the honorable mover of the resolutions under consideration, and an opinion advanced by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SHEFFY,) the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) not content to permit the effect of the promulgation of the French repealing decree, at the time it bears date, to remain a matter of opinion and speculation, not content with merely controverting, by argument, the opinions which had been advanced, he, in a tempest of zeal, and in language peculiar, undertakes to prove, beyond the possibility of a doubt, to put the question forever at rest, and fix falsehood on him who "dares hereafter to say, if the French decree of repeal had been known, the British Orders would have been repealed, and the war thus prevented." Mr.

Speaker, I will not follow the example of the gentleman from South Carolina, by hazarding a positive assertion on a question susceptible of doubt, and depending on motives in other breasts, impossible for us to ascertain; but I dare to say, the gentleman has fallen far short of convincing me of the correctness of his position, or of putting the question at rest. So far, then, as depends on the evidence of opinion, founded on a knowledge of facts before us, I must dissent from the opinion so confidently expressed by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN.)

It is true, the declaration of the Prince Regent of the 21st April, 1812, and some of the letters of Mr. Foster, near the close of his correspondence with the Secretary of State, required the repeal on the part of France to be absolute and unconditional. It is equally true, that the last letter from Mr. Foster on this subject, (and that, too, after he had received the declaration of the Prince Regent,) declares the repeal of the French decrees as preliminary to a repeal of the Orders in Council, to be such as we had a right to require in our character of a neutral nation. It will also be recollected, that the question between this Government and Great Britain was, whether the decrees of France had been repealed at all, and not as to the extent of that repeal. The British Government denied the letter of the Duc de Cadore, of August 5th, to amount to a repeal, and required some authentic document of the fact. We contended that the letter of the 5th August, together with the late practices of France, in relation to us, were satisfactory evidence to entitle us to an abrogation of the British orders. Thus, all discussion, as to the partial suspension of the French decrees, or our conditional and partial exemption from them, entitling us to the like exemption from the British orders, was perfectly superfluous—an argument from premises totally denied, and stated by Mr. Foster, in the correspondence relied on by gentlemen on the other side of the House, to be altogether unnecessary and irrelevant. The declaration of the Prince Regent, so far from assuming higher ground than had been before occupied, always appeared to me to have been intended to furnish an opening for the promulgation of any French repealing decree that might exist, and if none did exist, that we might, more consistently with our former admissions, require one to be issued. This is inferred by the declaration, insisting only on the promulgation of a repealing document, regardless of its construction, or the practice under it, as preliminary to the repeal of the Orders in Council. It is fair to argue from what has, to what would have happened. The Orders in Council were repealed as soon after the appearance of the French repealing decree, as the unsettled state of the British Cabinet would admit; and the reason given for this change of policy was the promulgation of that decree—the difficulty gentlemen find in tracing up any other cause, proves what has been alleged to be the true one.

Some gentlemen have attributed this sudden and important change of system to the clamor of the manufacturing interest. Sir, this clamor was of no recent date. It was as loud on the 21st April, the date of the declaration of the Prince Regent, as it was on the 28d June, the day on which the orders were repealed—the result of the examination in Parliament on the subject was, I presume, as well known on 21st April as on 28d June. In addition to this, were we not informed by the Executive himself, within a few days of the declaration of war, that no prospect of a change in the British policy existed? Was not this the language of our agent in London, and did he not tell us that war was inevitable? It cannot then be that this was the real cause of the repeal of the Orders in Council.

The same, and other gentlemen, in their laborious and sagacious search for a cause, ventured to attribute no inconsiderable share in producing the repeal of the Orders in Council, to the armor and attitude assumed by the Message of the President—backed by the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, and those expenditures which followed in their train. Unfortunately, this supposition, like the preceding, is opposed by facts which cannot yield to this sort of speculation. The Message, the report of the committee, your army bill, and threatening war speeches, were known in England before the declaration of the Prince Regent, and long before the repeal of the Orders in Council; no effect was produced—your agent in London tells you none would be produced. The British Minister here manifested no alarm, but agreeable to the opinion of those same gentlemen he was instructed by his Government to make a stand in relation to the Orders in Council, which dissipated all hope of obtaining their repeal, but by an appeal to arms. If, indeed, the British Government were frightened at the aspect of war which was here exhibited—pity it is, the scare-crow system had not been longer kept up, and preserved from the vision and the touch the living skeleton of this war.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman (Mr. GRUNDY) has ventured to advance a doctrine on this floor both novel and extraordinary; a doctrine subversive of every principle of civil liberty, and destructive of our first and dearest, not only of chartered, but birth rights. He deems that man guilty of moral treason who does not volunteer his aid in strengthening the arm of Administration in the prosecution of this war; or who, in the free exercise of the right of speech and opinion, may be the means of inducing others to withhold their personal services or pecuniary resources from the disposal of those who conduct the war. Sir, this doctrine is freighted with the most monstrous consequences—it is not for a moment to be tolerated by a people regardful of their rights. Let this doctrine be once established, an ambitious Executive, and a weak, a wicked, or interested majority of Congress have nothing to do but to declare war, under any pretence, or for any cause or object, however unimportant, or however destructive of our best interests, we will be bound to strengthen the arm lifted for our destruction—join in acclamations of praise to our destroyers, or sit by, in silent anguish, awaiting the death-blow to our constitution, and with it our liberties as a people. If the people, who have been taught to believe they are secure in the right, not only of expressing their opinions fully and openly in relation to the conduct of their rulers, their motives and the tendency of their measures, but also in the right to change those rulers—are now to be told (and they should believe it) that their rights are only to be exercised in a state of peace and on ordinary occasions; but in time of war they are to be suspended or put out of existence—(the time, above all others, when they ought to be most vigilantly exercised and sacredly guarded)—when these things come to pass—when this doctrine of moral treason becomes the order of the day—then may we say, good-bye to the liberties of our country—welcome tyranny, welcome Bonaparte, welcome oppression in any other shape; for when the measure of our sufferings is full, little does it avail by whom they are inflicted.

Mr. Speaker, the member from Tennessee, not satisfied with merely advancing this doctrine, has made an application of it. As I understood him, and as he was understood by gentlemen around me, he charged the whole Federal party in this country with this newly-defined crime of moral treason; and being the friends of the "fast anchored isle." Although he did not charge the individual members of this House, it is not easily conceived how they can escape; particularly as the gentleman told us, he did not say more than he meant.

Sir, I am one of this great Federal party, and I glory in being so—many of my best and dearest friends belong to this party. Many of the greatest and best men in this country are attached to this party; and whilst they continue, as they have done, to make virtue, fortitude, and intelligence their means, and their country's good their end, I hope never to forsake them. This party cannot be hurt by such attacks; to attempt to defend them would be an act of injustice. For myself and my immediate constituents, I will say: If this charge of moral treason, and being the friends of the nation with whom we are at war, is intended to be applied to myself, or a single man who voted for me, from personal or political regard, the charge is false.

SATURDAY, JUNE 19.

The French Decrees.

The House proceeded, immediately on its meeting, to the consideration of Mr. WEBSTER'S resolutions.

JUNE, 1813.]

French Decrees.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. YANNEY said, believing as he did that, upon the question now under consideration, he should give a vote very different from many of his political friends, he begged leave briefly to state to the House the reasons which would induce him to co-operate with the gentlemen in the passage of the resolutions: it was not because he believed that there was any necessary and material information in the possession of the Executive which had not already been communicated; on the contrary, he believed that all the information upon this subject was communicated at the last session. Upon looking to the resolution offered at the last session by the honorable gentleman from Maryland, I find, said he, that all the substance of the present resolutions is embraced in that, and more especially if we take into view the answer of the President to that resolution. The resolution then adopted by the House, required that the President should inform the House at what time, and in what manner, the promulgation of the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811, was announced to this Government. In answer, sir, to that resolution, it will be seen, by a reference to the Executive papers of last session, that the President transmitted to this House a letter from Mr. Barlow, of the 1st of May, 1812, to the Duke of Bassano, stating that "we know, indeed, that the French decrees do not apply to the United States;" but that the Prince Regent, in his declaration of the 21st of April, declares that they are still unrevoked; and in order to remove all doubt upon that subject with the British Government, Mr. Barlow requested in that letter that the Duke of Bassano would furnish him with an authentic act of their revocation. It was furnished, sir, on the 10th of May, 1812, together with the decree of the 28th of April, 1811. Now, sir, though in the resolution offered by the honorable gentleman from Maryland, at the last session, it is not asked "by whom" the decree was announced to this Government; yet the answer of the President furnished the House with that fact; and it is shown by Mr. Barlow's letter of the 12th of May, communicated to the President, that the first intelligence of this Government was received from its accredited Minister. The resolution, therefore, now under consideration, does not materially differ from the one adopted at the last session; for though it was not moulded in that interrogatory form which this assumes, yet it is substantially the same. I believe, sir, the whole of the information sought for is sufficiently expressed in the first resolution, the one now under consideration; yet I shall vote for the whole of those resolutions. The last resolution, sir, I think objectionable in its phraseology, and also in its substance; but I shall give it my support. But let it be distinctly understood, at the same time, that I do not support those resolutions because I think there is any information in the possession of the Executive, which was withheld in violation of the resolution of the last session, or that any suspicion of unfairness attaches to the Administration in their foreign relations with Great Britain and France.

From the conduct of the particular friends of these resolutions during this discussion, I believe it would be a source of great gratification to them if they were rejected; and, so far, sir, as my vote goes, I am determined to disappoint them. I think it much better for the Administration that they should pass; not that I expect it will soothe the opposition, or produce any important information to the nation.

But, sir, the gentlemen on the other side of the House, not content with discussing the merits of those resolutions, have mingled in the debate our foreign relations. By way of showing the importance and value of the resolutions, and the good that will flow from them to the country, they tell us that the answer to those resolutions will show one or both of two facts, to wit: that if the French repealing decree of the 28th of April had been known to the Government before the declaration of war, it would have prevented it. And, secondly, that if this decree was not communicated to our Government before the declaration of war, (which they admit to be the fact,) then the Duke of Bassano, in his conversation with Mr. Barlow, has told a falsehood. Now, sir, permit me to remark that, if the gentlemen think it important to their cause, or are otherwise solicitous to prove a falsity on the Duke, let them do so; I want nothing to convince me of the political hypocrisy and perfidy of that Government.

Admitting that the French repealing decree had been formally communicated to this Government before the declaration of war; nay, that it had been even communicated to the British Government in April, 1811, when it purports to be dated; still he did not see how gentlemen could bring their minds to believe that that decree would have averted the war, without they knew the secrets of the British Government better than its accredited Minister; nay, without they knew the intention of that Government better than the Ministry and Prince Regent himself. And, sir, if any thing can be said in addition to what was so fully illustrated the other day by the luminous argument of my political friend from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY,) I beg leave to suggest it. The non-intercourse act of Congress, passed in the Spring of 1810, declared that, if either Great Britain or France would repeal or so modify their decrees or Orders in Council, that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, and the other failing to repeal her orders within three months thereafter, that the United States would take decisive steps against the one so failing to repeal. In August, 1810, the French Government, by its official act, pledged itself to our Government, that the Berlin and Milan decrees were repealed, and should cease to operate on the first of April following. Since which time, he defied the gentlemen to show that they had been enforced by order of that Government.

Previous to this time, however, it is worthy of remark, that the British Government only required of us, that France should repeal her orders as respected the United States, and she solemnly pledged herself that she would repeal her orders, pari passu, with the repeal of the decrees as respected the United States.

But, sir, what was her conduct upon this occasion? Instead of repealing, or promise of repealing, as France had done, she advances in her doctrine, and contends that America must now procure France to repeal her decrees, not only as respected herself, but as respected all other neutral powers.

How then, sir, might it be asked, could the promulgation of the French repealing decree have prevented the war? Would it have produced a repeal of the Orders in Council? It would not, if the British Government are to be believed. The declaration of the Prince Regent of the 21st of April; the correspondence between Mr. Foster and the Secretary of State of the 10th of June, and again on the 14th of June, a few days before the declaration of war, are conclusive on this point. But, sir, if we need better evidence to establish the fact, than the correspondence of the accredited Minister of England, permit me, sir, to refer the gentleman to the speeches of the Ministry in Parliament during the month of February, 1812; they will see, sir, that Mr. Rose and Mr. Percival, during that discussion, which grew out of the examination and investigation of the Orders in Council in the House of Commons, have frankly and honestly acknowledged that which the gentlemen upon this occasion deny. Mr. Rose expressly says, "that they are maintained to promote the trade of England at the expense of neutrals, and as a measure of commercial rivalry with the United States." Mr. Percival in his speech says, "that they are not only supported upon this principle of retaliation, but that this principle involved the license trade; that neither the partial nor total repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees as they related to America, or to any other nation, or all other nations, would form any claim on the British Government, while the Continental system, so called, continued in operation."

Mr. SHARPE said it was not his intention to have troubled the House with a single remark on the subject before them. He should have been content with a silent vote, had not the range of debate led into a full view of the conduct of the Administration in relation to the war. Intending to vote for all except the last of the resolutions, it became his duty to assign his reasons; as they were directly opposite to those of other gentlemen who advocated them. Some gentlemen, said he, have, for the first time during this Administration, become the supporters of the character of the nation; although not insensible to the cause of the discussion, and the effect it is intended to have, yet I am pleased to discover that such is the ground they are driven to take to obtain their object. On former occasions, those who styled themselves "friends to peace," contended that our Government waged war from a predilection to France; and we were entertained with their eloquence, displayed in comparing the nature and extent of injuries from each belligerent, France and England. The ruler of the first was denounced as a Usurper, a Despot, and a Tyrant; and the other triumphantly represented as defending our Holy Religion, as fighting the cause of Humanity and the World. Whether a ground that has afforded so much food for declamation hitherto, has been silently abandoned because it has ceased to have any effect upon the nation, and recoils upon those who resort to it; or because that magnanimous Government, finding it necessary in so great and good a cause to engage her barbarous allies on our exposed frontiers indiscriminately to murder, disregarding age or sex; and had placed the trophies of savage warfare, a human scalp, over the mace of their Legislative Council at York, representing that an authorized system of rapine and murder was interwoven with the genius of their Government; whether this occasioned the change, I leave others to decide.

I will consider this subject, sir, in the form in which it has been presented; and first, as to the avowed object of the resolutions. We learn from the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. WEBSTER,) and the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) that they are intended to support the honor of our country. Who can object to it? But how? By proving to the world that in a correspondence between Mr. Barlow, our Minister to France, and the Duke of Bassano, in May, 1812, the French Minister of Foreign Relations was guilty of asserting a falsehood; and that the decree of the Government of France, bearing date on the 28th of April, 1811, repealing the Berlin and Milan decrees, never was communicated to our Government until it was communicated through Mr. Barlow. Let it be admitted that the decree of the 28th April, 1811, never was communicated to our Government previous to the mission of Mr. Barlow. The gentlemen say so, and at once acquit our Government of all charge of duplicity or concealment. But they also contend that, had the decree of the 28th April, 1811, as the Duke of Bassano stated to Mr. Barlow, been communicated to our Government at the time it bears date, and by our Government been made known to England, she would have repealed her Orders in Council and we have had no war with her. To make good a position of that kind, those who assume it must have a knowledge of the temper of the British Government beyond what they have ever communicated to the public; and, so far as the assertion may depend on that sort of calculation, I should hold it wholly incontrovertible. But, if the diplomatic correspondence and public acts of the British Government are evidence against them, it is proven to a demonstration they would not have repealed their Orders in Council upon the production of the decree of 28th of April, 1811.

French Decrees.

The Prince Regent's manifesto of the 21st of April, 1812, after complaining of the injustice of France, in respect to neutrals, and excusing the course adopted by Great Britain under the plea of necessity, and as retaliatory of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, proceeds to require a repeal of those decrees as a condition precedent to the rescission of the Orders in Council—not a modification of them so as not to affect the commerce of America, but that they should cease to operate on all neutral commerce. That there should be no misunderstanding upon this subject, in the correspondence between Mr. Foster the Minister near this Government and Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, in June, 1812, Mr. Foster expressly states that nothing less than a full and unconditional repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan would induce his Government to repeal her Orders in Council; that Great Britain could not repeal her Orders in Council as it respected America, and leave them in force against other States, upon condition that France would except America singly and specially from the operation of her decrees. The relaxation or modification of those decrees is considered insufficient. America is not only to obtain from France the freedom of her own commerce, but she is required to contend for the commerce of others. She is not only to cause her own rights to be respected, but she must be the guardian of the rights of all neutral nations. Are gentlemen prepared to say America should have interposed in behalf of the rights of all the neutral world? Upon what honorable pretence could America contend for the redress of injuries other than her own; and more especially whilst Great Britain withheld a redress of the outrages she was daily committing upon our citizens?

The gentleman from New York (Mr. Grosvenor) and the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Gaston) tell us, that the British Government, on the 28d of June, 1812, by the repeal of their Orders in Council, afforded sufficient evidence, that, had the French decree of the 28th April, 1811, been communicated at the time it bears date, that the effect would then have been the same, and that the delay of the British Government in meeting the repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, so soon as the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, was communicated, was owing to the assassination of Mr. Perceval, the Prime Minister, which deranged the British Cabinet, and that so soon as it was organized, the repeal of the Orders in Council took place. Mr. S. said he was sorry to find upon examination, that the gentleman's understanding of the rescission of the Orders in Council was entirely different from what that State paper, from the face of it, would warrant. In its preamble, the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, is taken notice of, and so far from considering that sufficient for the repeal of their Orders in Council, it is expressly stated that the tenor of the decree of the 28th April, 1811, is not considered as satisfying the order of 21st April, 1812, nor such a repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan as the British Government had always required; nor would it justify the demand of the American Government, that their Orders in Council should be abandoned; nor does the order of the British Government of the 28d June, 1812, more than suspend the operation of their Orders in Council, reserving, at the same time, the express right to enforce them again whenever it should appear expedient, notwithstanding the decree of the 28th of April, 1811. This paper of the British Cabinet, suspending their Orders in Council, relied upon by the gentlemen themselves, goes uncontestedly to confirm what was meant by Mr. Foster, when he required a full and unconditional repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, and declared that a repeal as it respected America, would not do—but it must be general as it regards all neutrals. As the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811, is not the reason of the suspension of the Orders in Council on the 28d of June, 1812, we are led to inquire what were the causes that produced it. They are best discovered in the policy of that nation. Ever in the habit of considering her interest, she has long since, become insensible to those principles of justice that should as invariably govern nations as individuals. Feeling her ascendancy upon the ocean, her avarice would not suffer her to brook a rival. The unparalleled prosperity of American commerce soon excited her jealousy; and with the commencement of our present Government commenced the history of her injuries and injustice towards us. The annals of our diplomacy, for a period of above twenty years, exhibit complaints of the plunder of our property and the imprisonment of our citizens upon the high seas. With Great Britain, the generous spirit of commercial enterprise is converted into a system of piracy and plunder, sanctioned by the highest authorities of the Government. Emboldened by our long forbearance; encouraged by the strong opposition in our own country to avenging her injuries; and calculating on the want of unanimity in our councils, Great Britain was induced to believe this Government wanted energy to commence and prosecute a war. Thus she was induced to conceive the design, by her Orders in Council, of sweeping our commerce from the ocean and enriching her Navy with the spoils. Nor did she once think of abandoning that policy, until, when too late, it was apprehended war must be the result of the state of things in America. Gentlemen may talk about French perfidy as the cause of this war. Let me assure them the canker lies nearer home. The injuries and injustice of Britain were the immediate cause. Yet, I have no doubt, those in our own country who induced a belief that we wanted unanimity and energy to right our wrongs and support our sovereignty as a nation, are highly culpable.

This brings me, sir, to the most interesting part of the debate. We are now at war with a most potent and perfidious enemy. Enlightened politicians of all ages and countries agree, that the vigorous prosecution of a war, by calling into action the resources and energies of a nation, is the only certain means of procuring an indemnity for injuries and security for our rights, in a steady and honorable peace. So far as any gentleman's arguments go to contravene that course of policy, by disaffecting the people of this nation to their Government, and by their opposition to the ways and means of carrying on this war, to paralyze the Administration in their endeavors to bring it to a prosperous and happy termination, I feel alarmed at the consequence, and must entreat gentlemen to consider what will be the tendency of such doctrines. The gentleman from New York, (Mr. SHIPARD,) yesterday, on this floor denounced the present war as unjust, and said his conscience would not suffer him to take a part in it; that he should deem himself guilty of murder if he did. For the honor of the gentleman, I will not believe that sentiment to have been matured by reflection—I am necessitated to inculcate his head, to do justice to his heart. Will he reflect but one moment, that although he may differ with the Government on the causes that produced this war; although he may believe the enemy had a prescriptive right to plunder our ships and impress our seamen; yet, this is a government of laws, enacted by the constituted authorities, where the majority rules. This Government has, by its legitimate act, declared war with Great Britain. Have the minority a right to oppose that war, and bring disaster and disgrace upon their country? He who opposes the adoption of injudicious measures, is a patriot—those measures once adopted, to oppose their execution is rebellion. If to meet our enemies on the field of battle be murder, what crime is he guilty of who can tamely see a frontier of five hundred miles smoking with the blood of his fellow-citizens, and the only remaining inhabitants flying by the light of the conflagration of their dwellings, and would refuse to contribute to their protection? His crime must be treason against humanity.

The same honorable gentleman has said we are indebted to the enemy for their humanity and forbearance. Yes, Mr. Speaker, when we reflect on their wantonly consigning private property to the flames, in their destruction of our villages on the seaboard; when we recollect their giving up the wounded and prisoners taken at the defeat of General Winchester to be scalped and tomahawked by their Indian allies; when we see them side by side with savages, traversing the borders of our country, leaving the dwellings of our fellow-citizens a heap of ashes slaked with human gore, we are made to exclaim, If this be their tender mercies, good Lord deliver us from their wrath!

We are also told by the same honorable gentleman, that the Government has at last to depend upon the Federalists for funds to support this war; that the loans were all obtained from them; he was sorry any would contribute to so unjust a war, and he hoped they never would be paid by the Government. Mr. S. said he could by no means admit the fact of the Federalists filling up the loan, for he was well informed that gentlemen of both sides in politics had contributed largely in loans to the Government, and that he was happy in believing there were many whose politics were Federal that are true friends to their country. But, said he, I would not believe it until I heard it, that it would be contended by any one on this floor, that money borrowed by the Government, under legal authority, on any change of Administration or policy, ought not to be paid. When my country shall become so insensible to every principle of justice and honesty as to refuse to pay her just debts, I trust in God I may not be disgraced by being called her citizen. No doubt for the purpose of giving weight to such doctrine, the gentleman from New York (Mr. SHIPARD) boasts that Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York, were the foremost in the struggle for independence. It is well the gentleman named other States besides his own; but why he has overlooked the two very respectable States of Pennsylvania and Virginia, I am at a loss to tell. Those patriots and heroes who were foremost in the Revolution we honor as our country ought. But, alas! with the mutations of time they have passed away, and have left another race upon the stage. Massachusetts, the cradle of liberty! we inquire for your sages and heroes; we ask, where are they? and are answered only by the echo of our voice, repeating "where are they?" The same honorable gentleman, and the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. GASTON,) press this subject home, and tell us their fathers fought and bled in the Revolutionary contest for liberty; inferring that with sires so distinguished the sons should not easily be suspected of error.

But, sir, my perception of the right to inherit either the honors or the talents of an ancestor is so indistinct that we may very readily imagine that it might or might not happen. I am warranted from history in stating a case—such I hope does not exist in our own country: Brutus, the first distinguished patriot of that name in Rome, in no long time after driving the tyrant into banishment, had to sit in judgment on his own sons for treason. The illustrious father is not unfrequently cursed with a degenerate son. He who has worn out his life in the service of his country, and by his wisdom and valor rendered himself conspicuous in achieving her liberty and advancing her happiness, is entitled to the most exalted niche in the temple of fame; nor less distinguished he, who, in the ensanguined field, is sacrificed among a hecatomb of victims on the altar of his country's rights:

French Decrees.

[H. OF R.]

"Fresh leaves of martial laurel Shall shade the soldier's grave,
 Who dies with arm uplifted
 His country's rights to save!"

But the chaplet of flowers that adorned his silver locks would wither and decay on the brow of his son, unless cherished by the same virtues. Could the spirit of the departed sire converse with his son, he would point to the most exalted eminences of his country's promotion, and say, Son, climb there by understanding and promoting your country's weal, and you may gather laurels from those cloud-capt summits that will grow and flourish as long as you deserve to wear them. But, if you refuse to emulate your father's example, the lustre of his character will only throw upon your conduct a shade of opprobrium. Observation and history lead to this conclusion: that every one acts from his own judgment, and should receive the fame or infamy due to his own conduct.

Sir, when we reflect that this nation is now engaged in war, the object of the early meeting of this session of Congress will immediately occur. The ways and means for carrying on the war are imperiously demanded of us; to meet that object should be our first duty; and I had hoped no subject disconnected with it would have occupied the House; and much less could I have imagined several days would have been employed in investigating the causes that produced the war, at a period when it is a year since it was declared. The arguments of gentlemen in the opposition might have been serviceable at the time that subject was on the tapis, and I believe they were then urged, duly considered, and weighed before our Government acted. All arguments should be now applied to the present state of the Union, to the effectual means of bringing this war to a happy and honorable termination. Mr. S. said he hoped at least we should all unite in feeling an interest in the fortune and happiness of our own country, and in adopting the means necessary to that end.

Mr. MURFEE said that he was desirous of speaking on this question, for several reasons; one was, that being unaccustomed to deliver his sentiments in deliberative bodies, he might possibly extend his remarks to every thing else but the issue in controversy, and in that event would have the good fortune to find himself in company with many honorable gentlemen of the other side of the House. Indeed, if he wandered ever so far from the subject, he had the sufficient apology to offer, that he was but retracing those steps from which his eloquent colleague had lately brushed away the dust. He considered the debate, also, of a nature highly interesting to the whole community. The justice and expediency of the war are considered as coming within the scope of the resolutions upon the table, and the arguments of those who commenced it and advocate its continuance, contrasted with the objections of the opposition, will thus be fairly represented to the view of the people of the United States. It will be their province to decide in favor of the one or the other, and such decision is, at this time, not less desirable than necessary. If their determination shall be in our favor, and that of the war, it is to be hoped it would lead to a union of parties in its prosecution, that will tend not less certainly to a speedy than glorious conclusion. If, on the contrary, it shall be condemned by them as unjust and unnecessary, it will become us to acquiesce in their will, and obtain the most advantageous terms of peace that may be granted by the enemy to an humble and submissive acknowledgment of our error.

The discussion upon this subject is susceptible of being reduced to a single point. The decree of the French Government, formally repealing the Berlin and Milan decrees, so far as they affected the United States, purpose to bear date the 28th April, 1811. It does not appear that this instrument was ever published, or that it was made known to the American Minister until May, 1812, and by him transmitted to his Government. No one has spoken but disclaimed the idea that it ever was known to the Executive of this country prior to that period. In the conversation of Mr. Barlow with the Duke of Bassano, on the 12th of May, the latter stated that this decree had been communicated to Mr. Barlow's predecessor at his court, and also to the French Minister at this place, with orders to transmit it to the Secretary of State. Now, sir, the gentlemen on the other side say, if it was communicated to the President in either way previous to the declaration of war, and by him concealed, no language is capable of depicting the aggravated crime of which he has been guilty. For, if this decree had been made known, the Orders in Council would have been repealed, and this disastrous war, as they style it, never have taken place. To vindicate the honor of the Administration and attach the falsehood where it justly belongs, is the professed object of these resolutions. But, sir, we say, that, admitting what no one believes or pretends to believe, that it was so concealed by the Administration, still we say, had it been presented to the British Ministry, it would not have had the least possible effect in suspending or arresting the war.

The French decree of 28th April, 1811, repeals the Berlin and Milan decrees so far only as they affected the United States. The precise words are, "considered as not having existed in regard to American vessels." If we refer to the whole correspondence between the British and American Ministers, it will plainly appear that this was not such a repeal of the decrees as they required us to produce previous to rescinding their obnoxious edicts. In order not to detain the House by particular references to documents, which have been so much canvassed, I will content myself with recalling to their recollection two or three of the last letters, in which their demands are so explicitly avowed as to be impossible to be mistaken or misunderstood. In a letter from Lord Wellesley to Mr. Pinkney, of 11th February, 1811, he demanded their absolute and unconditional repeal, not as they affected the United States, but as they regarded all nations; that the commerce of the Continent thereby be restored to the same situation in which it stood previous to their promulgation. As they affected others, we never did or could justly have the least right to interfere.

In a short time after, Mr. Foster in his letter to the Secretary of State, on 8d July, 1811, repeats the same demand in almost the same words and to that he still more unequivocally answered the additional stipulation, that the neutral commerce should be restored to its former situation. This latter demand, in reality, was, and it could be nothing less, considered as a requisition of us to enforce the admission of British goods into those ports of the Continent which had been subsequently subjugated by the French arms. Accordingly, the Secretary of State, in reply, expressed his astonishment at a demand so unusual and unexpected, and desired an explicit answer, whether such an extravagant pretension was maintained by the British Government. In his answer to this, Mr. Foster labors to distinguish what he meant from the inference so easily deducible, not only from the former, but that very letter, and finally envelopes himself in those high-sounding epithets he could assume with so much facility when he speaks of the honor and dignity of the British nation.

If, sir, additional evidence were wanted in so plain a case, I would refer to the last letter of the 10th June, 1812, conclusive of the point, and sufficient to carry conviction to the most sceptical mind. In this memorable letter, written a few days previous to the declaration of war, which was and must have been known to him would follow in that short space, it is to be presumed he would tender the most favorable terms he was authorized, if his Government had been sincerely desirous of adjusting amicably the subsisting differences. From this letter alone, sufficient to silence forever the cavils of the most incredulous, I will conclude this point by reading a short passage: "I have no hesitation, sir, in saying that Great Britain never did, or could, engage to repeal her orders as affecting America alone, leaving them in force against other States, upon condition that France would except singly and specially America from the operation of her decrees."

I will now, sir, proceed to inquire what answer has been given to these facts by the two gentlemen who have stood forward the most conspicuous advocates of the resolutions upon the table. The honorable member from New York has remarked that they are so confused and indistinct that he is unable to understand them. How poor an evasion! how little applicable to expressions not merely as intelligible, but the most forcible of which the language is susceptible! From the gallant manner in which that gentleman presented himself in the van of the Federal phalanx, I did not expect to hear so humiliating an acknowledgment of his own defeat. The honorable gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Gaston) declines to take this ground, and displays his superior address by attracting the attention to another view of the subject. He attributes the clear light in which he was compelled to acknowledge that Mr. Foster did place the ultimatum of his Government to the superior diplomatic skill of the American Secretary. This unwilling testimony to the merit of that gentleman was as unexpected as just, and with the same candor, the honorable gentleman might have added, that he is not more distinguished in this correspondence for superior strength of argument and elegance of style than he is elevated by honesty and integrity above Mr. Foster, or any other corrupted minion of British power. The honorable member sickened with the repetition of these documents, and turned from them with disgust, to take a comprehensive view of the political controversy between the two countries. The gentleman was right; in minute detail there was danger; a rigid examination of them would have presented him with facts and arguments impossible to be answered, and which would surpass even his ingenuity to elude. Many others, like himself, have sickened in the perusal, because they place the Administration upon the high and commanding ground they deserve to occupy.

The honorable gentleman from North Carolina infers that they did intend to repeal their Orders in Council had they been furnished with an authentic repeal of the French decrees, because they actually did subsequently repeal them on that ground. But, sir, how was it possible for the Administration to have foreseen so complete a revolution in their designs within so short a period, expressly contrary to their declaration at various times and by so many different persons? We judge of the future actions of men by their professions, and to me the logic is incomprehensible by which we prove a man will perform an act which he declares he will not, merely because, influenced by new reasons, he may subsequently do that very act. It is a useless waste of time to argue further upon this point. That the British Cabinet requires the absolute and unconditional repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees and the restoration of the commerce of the Continent to its former situation, is proved by the declaration of the Prime Minister himself, by the instructions of the Resident Minister, by all the letters of the latter, and finally by the declaration of the Prince Regent himself.

But, sir, I never believed that it was their intention to rescind the Orders in Council if we could have performed the stipulation they required. In the early correspondence upon the subject, they justified them upon the ground of retaliation, and professed their readiness to proceed step by step with the French Government in the repeal of such as affected the commerce of the United States. From this ground they afterwards receded, and annexed the other condition to which I have before alluded. Finally, in the debate in the House of Commons on the 3d of March, what I have no doubt was the original object of the Orders in Council was no longer concealed. It was then substantially avowed by the Minister himself, that they were supported as a system of commercial monopoly which they had the power to enforce, and as a benefit they expected to derive from their naval supremacy.

The honorable gentlemen on the other side have liberally indulged in invective against the Ruler of the French Empire. I sincerely approve their sentiments, and fervently wish a hatred of kings and royalty may be indelibly impressed upon the heart of every American. I most cordially unite with them in an abhorrence of Emperors, over whatever country they may lord it, and by whatever appellation distinguished, whether Napoleon the Conqueror, or Alexander the Deliverer. I am equally indifferent to the personal fate of the Emperor of France, or that of his Empire, whether he fall by the dagger of a Parisian conscript, or be pierced by the lance of a wild and warlike Cossack. And, so far as my country be unaffected, I care not whether his Empire be tumbled into ruin, or whether he still have ability to drive back the torrent of Northern barbarians by whom he is surrounded into their native deserts.

As many gentlemen on the other side have still to speak upon this subject, permit me to point out an object to which they may with equal justice, direct their arrows. The honorable gentlemen may select from the catalogue of vices which have disgraced human nature in public or private life, and a corresponding one will be found to constitute a part of the character of the Prince Regent. This rich and fertile field has been left untouched. The gentlemen have asked why no notice has been taken, not a censure breathed against the wrongs and violence of the Emperor of France. As this surely cannot apply to me, I have the right to retort the inquiry. Why has the conduct of the Regent of England been passed over in silence? That man whose arrogant pretension and long-continued injustice reduced us to the alternative of encountering the calamities of war or submitting to national degradation and dishonor. An honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. SHERBURN) has stigmatized the war as a murderous project, and expressed his hopes and wishes that the money loaned for its support would never be repaid. A venerable member of this House has gone still further—publicly charges the Administration with bribery in procuring the late loans, and declared it the duty of upright men in a future Legislature, to refuse provision for a fulfilment of these usurious contracts. Must not all regret, deplore the frailty of human nature to see that gentleman, influenced by party spirit, tarnish the laurels of his youth, and in the decline of life consent to abandon those very rights he himself maintained by his pen and defended by his sword!

I am pleased, sir, that the sentiments and designs of the opposition are thus openly avowed to the world. And, sir, I will take the liberty to inform the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GOSVENER,) that feeble as the Administration may be, and poorly as he may think of them, while such are the opinions of himself and his friends, they will never drive us from our seats.

French Decrees.

The order of the day on Mr. WEBSTER's resolution having been called up,

Mr. ROBERTSON assigned at length the reasons why, although he believed these resolutions wholly unnecessary, he should nevertheless be induced to vote for them.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the first resolution, as follows:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, unless the public interest should in his opinion forbid such communication, when, by whom, and in what manner the first intelligence was given to this Government of the decree of the Government of France, bearing date on the 28th April, 1811, and purporting to be a definitive repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan:"

And passed in the affirmative—yeas 187, nays 26.

The second resolution having been read—

Mr. BUTLER rose, and said, so long as he entertained a hope that these resolutions would meet the fate they so richly deserved, he felt willing to give a silent vote; but having lost all expectation of a result so desirable, it was proper to render some reasons for voting in the negative.

Sir, said Mr. B., I see no necessity for the information required, and to call on the President for documents that can be of no use, would be improper. We may ask for information without giving the President the reasons, but we certainly ought to have good reasons ourselves for so doing. It has not been once intimated that any act of the Legislature can be founded on the answer expected, much less that we should now declare war against France. I therefore can discover no profitable use that can be made of any answer in the power of the President to give.

It has been said that this inquiry ought to have been made by the friends of the Administration. But as they have neglected their duty, these resolutions were introduced to give the President a fair opportunity, by his answer, to remove the suspicions under which many of the people are laboring.

Sir, if that unfortunate class of the community had believed the most solemn assertions of the President, or even their own senses, in relation to his conduct for forty years past, they would not now be laboring under these painful suspicions. As no part of his conduct has laid the foundation for, or given any support to these suspicions, nothing that he can do, nothing that he can place on paper, will remove them. Should the President give the most satisfactory answer, it would only leave his character on the same high ground on which it now stands, and therefore would contribute nothing to his reputation. I have another reason for voting against the adoption of these resolutions. The same inquiry was made by the last Congress, and received the answer of the President. And will you now repeat the same question in the most inquisitive language? Will you treat the President of the United States in a manner that would be resented by almost every man in private life? Strange marks of distrust and suspicion are to be seen on the very face of these resolutions; the time and manner in which they make their appearance also go to support the same opinions. I consider the introduction of these resolutions an attack upon the Executive of this nation; and when you have made them your own, if I am not mistaken, the world will consider it as made by this House.

Sir, the five resolutions you have had under consideration about a week appear all to be nearly related in form and spirit, and as you have adopted the first, the others will follow of course; but if they pass it must be by the votes of those who are moved by motives that shall not influence me; I will not vote for resolutions that I disapprove, merely to gratify those whom I am persuaded cannot be conciliated. The fear of being accused of having an intention to suppress useful information, will not move me. Conscious of the rectitude of my own intentions, I shall give no vote through fear of accusations founded in falsehood.

We have been told that the time spent in this debate has not been lost: if it has not been worse than lost, it will hereafter give me pleasure to acknowledge my own error.

Sir, I have been in the habit of viewing every man responsible for his own conduct; and this in legislation as elsewhere. And although it is the lot of man to err, it is not to be expected that honest wise men will always be unable to foresee the natural tendency of their own conduct in the plainest cases. If my conduct is such as can produce no other consequences but those that are bad—and this so plain that every person of sane mind must discern it—to what will you ascribe my improper behaviour? To the want of good motives, or the want of discernment? One or the other must be the cause. I have been taught to ascribe no improper motive to any member of this House. I shall be one of the last to transgress your rules; but they will prevent no one from inquiring after the effects of any measure proposed to the House, or of the tendency of the arguments in support of that measure.

As to the motives of the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, who introduced all these resolutions, I shall say nothing; I shall treat with equal charity all the arguments offered in their favor. It is sufficient for me to be fully satisfied that they can produce no other consequences than those that are to be deeply lamented. According to all the arguments advanced by gentlemen on the other side of the House, it would appear that either the Government of France, or that of the United States, is responsible for all the blood and treasure that may be wasted in our war with Great Britain. They might as well say, in plain English, that the President and the majority in Congress have been the sole cause of the war. It is only a circuitous course taken to enforce the charge with more effect. Through you all the people of the United States may be told this, and much sophistry urged to support it. I shall not say that the motives were bad; but that the effect must be so, is certain.

But, sir, no friend to our country will doubt, no man of sane mind can refuse his assent to the belief, that such arguments will tend directly to increase party spirit, inflame the public mind, create distrust in the Government, prepare the people for civil commotion, with all its concomitant evils, strengthen the hands of our enemies, and weaken the arms of our own Government. These are some of the natural consequences of such arguments as have been advanced in favor of your resolutions, so far as they gain credit.

In the course of this debate, you have been told of the forbearance and benevolence of the British in their conduct towards our country, since the commencement of the present war. Sir, if you will turn your thoughts and eyes upon those lonely chimneys of private houses, so recently burned that the bricks are scarcely cold, and take into view the slaughtered, defenceless women and children, together with the plundering of private property, both by themselves and spies, on the Atlantic and Western frontier, these facts will afford but little evidence of their humanity, justice, or even honorable warfare.

Mr. Speaker, I have paid particular attention to the correspondence of that Government with our own for several years past; and feel fully persuaded that that Government has assumed to itself principles and rights which, if suffered to grow into national law, would leave us in no better circumstances than colonies to that power.

The question was then taken to agree to the second resolution, as originally proposed, and passed in the affirmative—yeas 187, nays 29.

The question was then taken to agree to the third resolution, as originally proposed, and was passed in the affirmative—yeas 184, nays 30.

The question was then taken to agree to the fourth resolution, as originally proposed, and also passed in the affirmative—years 125, says 84.

The fifth resolution being amended by inserting after the word "President," the words "unless the public interest should forbid such a disclosure," the question was taken to agree to that resolution, with the said amendment, and also passed in the affirmative—years 98, says 68.

Remonstrance of Massachusetts.

Mr. PICKERING presented the Memorial or Remonstrance of the Legislature of Massachusetts against the war; which he read in his place.

After the reading of the remonstrance was concluded—

Mr. PICKERING moved to refer the memorial to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ROBERTSON objected to the reference. He had heard a part of this remonstrance read with great concern, and it should never be referred to any Committee of the House with his consent. He could not consent that that part of the remonstrance which brought into view any thing relating to the sovereignty of Louisiana, should be made a question before this House or any committee of the House. He called upon intelligent members on all sides of the House to frown upon any thing which should place that State in a light different from any other. The State of Louisiana had been admitted into the Union by laws solemnly passed; she had been guilty of no act which could have a tendency to deprive Massachusetts of any right, or any weight in the Union. That State had still her constitutional weight in the nation; she had all the officers belonging to her, and was deprived of no right to which any other State was entitled. If she had not that influence in the nation which she wished, she certainly would not look for its diminution in the abridgment of any constitutional right. She has experienced none. She may look to the diminution of her influence, if she has experienced any, to any other cause quite as rationally as to the introduction of Louisiana into the Union. Long before that event, the Eastern States had lost a considerable portion of that influence which they had previously possessed in the Union. The operation of the provisions of the constitution had produced that effect. As it regarded that portion of the remonstrance which adverts to the war in which we are engaged, to the manner in which it has been conducted, to the refusal of arms, &c.,—these portions of the remonstrance might give rise to some act, and might or might not be a proper subject of inquiry by the House of Representatives. But what act could grow out of that part complaining of the introduction of Louisiana into the Union? Would this House be so lost to the rights of Louisiana, rights equal to those of any other State; would it be so lost to the rights of that State as to take into consideration the petulant and unfounded complaints against the participation of that State in the Union? Was not every State in the Union interested in guarding against the slightest approach to the investigation of the sovereign rights of States in the Union? Mr. R. said he could not, consistently with his duty to the respectable State he represented, sit silent whilst observations which he would term at least indelicate towards it, were proposed to be seriously taken into consideration by the House; to have withheld his protest on this occasion, would have manifested a want of respect to his constituents and to himself, a want of feeling, which he hoped never to be guilty of. His only object being to express his sentiments on so much of the memorial as relates to Louisiana, he moved to except from the general reference of this memorial so much of it as relates to the admission of Louisiana into the Union.

Mr. PICKERING waived his motion for reference to a Committee of the Whole; he had no objection that for the present the memorial should lie on the table. He would at this time make a remark or two only, in reply to what had fallen from the gentleman from Louisiana. I was, said Mr. P., a member of the Senate, when the treaty ceding Louisiana to us, was ratified. My colleague, John Quincy Adams, voted for its ratification. I beg leave to say, there was not a man then in the Senate who supposed another State might be admitted beyond the original boundary of the Union. In proof of which, I recollect that Mr. Adams argued that the constitution might be so amended as to admit the introduction of such States; and, a very few days after the ratification of the treaty just mentioned, he laid upon the table of the Senate a proposition so to amend the constitution.

Mr. BIGELOW said that this petition contained important matter; that it was decent and respectful in its terms, and entitled to attention. He hoped, therefore, as many had complained that they had not heard it read, that it would be printed for general information. He hoped that a spirit of conciliation would prevail on all sides; that the reasons urged by the Legislature of Massachusetts might be fairly and candidly considered. If those reasons had weight, let the grievances complained of be redressed. If not, let the people of that State be convinced of their error by the answer to be returned to them. Mr. B. moved to print the remonstrance.

Mr. WRIGHT hoped the remonstrance would not be printed. He hoped nobody wanted a copy of it; sure he was that he did not. As to referring it to a committee, he should be happy to see it referred to the Attorney General of Massachusetts, to whom he thought its libellous character entitled it to be sent.

A conversation took place between Messrs. ROBERTS, McKEE, and BIGLOW, on the former practice of the House in printing papers expressive of the sense of the Legislatures of States in relation to the measures of the General Government.

Mr. MONTGOMERY considered it important that the House should meet this paper, and expose its fallacy, which they could not be enabled to do as well from its bare reading as if it were printed and before them. He wished an opportunity for himself of examining it at leisure, and reading it over and over again. He wished at the same time that the House should meet its reasoning and confute it, as he believed they might readily do.

Mr. MAOON regretted that any objection had been made to printing this paper. If we have been in error, said he, no man can object to being convinced of it. It is certainly impossible for any man to understand distinctly so long a paper from merely hearing it read. Suppose this representation had been a very able argument to show that our measures are correct, should we object to its publication? I apprehend not. Massachusetts has done what other States have done before her. She has thought proper to animadvert on our proceedings; and she is entitled to precisely the same respect as every other State, and every other State to the same respect as her. We come here as equals, and I hope as brothers. All truth asks is fair play. If truth be on our side, as I verily believe it is, we are impregnable. The cause of truth will prevail in the end.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, as a question of mere order, whether any paper was admissible in this House, charging the Government, in terms, with a violation of the constitution.

The SPEAKER replied, that was a matter entirely for the decision of the House.

Mr. INGERSOLL said he should vote for printing this memorial entire, notwithstanding what appeared to him to be an excitement of just and honorable feeling in the gentleman from Louisiana against the part he wished to except. He should vote for printing it, because he was of opinion that it was high time to meet this memorial and all such papers on the floor of this House with reason and argument, instead of fervor and passion, which had generally been applied on similar occasions.

Mr. ROBERTS said he was still unfriendly to the printing of this memorial, if it were only for the perfect novelty of thus questioning the sovereignty of a State. He was of opinion that a question ought to be settled, preliminary to printing this paper, whether the sovereignty of a State ought in any way to be questioned. He hoped it would lie on the table and not be printed.

The question was taken on the remonstrance lying on the table, and carried without a division.

The question recurred on the motion to print the paper, and first on the amendment thereto proposed by Mr. ROBERTSON.

Mr. FISK of Vermont spoke in favor of printing. He considered the remonstrance of an extraordinary character, and, if not intended to effect some extraordinary purpose where it originated, the course now proposed to be taken would give it that effect. If the statements contained in that paper could not be met, it was high time that the party at whom they were levelled was out of power. If it should be refused a hearing, the impression would prevail that it was unanswerable. A spirit of dissatisfaction had reigned in the quarter whence this memorial came, though it had not before been presented to this House. This spirit of opposition would be the evil genius of the country, unless it was quieted by a decisive reply. This paper contained statements, which, with all the deference he was disposed to pay to the Legislature of Massachusetts, were erroneous and unfounded. These statements were before the people. Their good sense would doubtless refute them; but he also wished to see them refuted in this House.

Mr. CALHOUN said if his vote for printing this memorial could be conceived as in any way countenancing the doctrines it contained, he certainly should not vote for it. He certainly never would countenance what might be considered a declaration of war by one State against another. When he gave a vote to publish this paper, he should do it because gentlemen had said they had not an opportunity of hearing it distinctly when it was read. As to the subject of the remonstrance, he was ready to meet it. Congress had declared war from necessity alone, and that they would always be willing and able to vindicate its justice and necessity, he had not the least doubt.

Mr. FARROW said he had not heard the whole of the remonstrance read, but he had heard more than enough of it. He regretted the consumption of time about this affair, and opposed its printing. Every member who wished had an opportunity to read it at the Clerk's table—he would assure those who were desirous of reading it, they would never find him in their way.

Mr. BRAD said he should vote against printing as unnecessary; because, when the subject should be taken up again, if no other gentleman did, he should move a reference of the memorial to a select committee, with the view of obtaining a detailed report on it. He considered the memorial, though addressed to this House, as an appeal to the people of Massachusetts, and of the United States, from the decision of Congress—he therefore wished a report which should expose the fallacy of its arguments.

The Ways and Means.

Mr. BRIGHAM spoke in favor of treating this petition with all the respect due to its importance and the respectable source from which it came. He was sorry that a disposition was manifested to prevent the remonstrance from coming fairly before the House. This memorial had been addressed to Congress by Massachusetts in the day of her distress. Should not the people of that State have the liberty of stating their complaints? He should be sorry to see gentlemen frown on the petition of an individual, much less of the State of Massachusetts, for whom he claimed no other respect or distinction than that to which all the States in the Union were entitled.

Mr. MACON said, that whenever the subject of British or French influence was started in this House, the members did just what the two Governments of Great Britain and France, equal in wickedness, wished us to do—widening divisions already sufficiently obvious. Does either of those nations, said he, love a free Government? Has either of them ever protected a free Government any where? If those Governments ever have a secret understanding with people among us, they will not let you know with whom; but they will throw out hints, and make public declarations and insinuations, to sow distrust among a people who are free, and whom they therefore envy and hate. Let us not then help them in the work, but bear with one another.

Mr. BAYLIES rose to support the remonstrance. Being a Representative from the State which had transmitted it—a State whose blood had flowed as freely as that of any other in support of our independence; a State which contributed as much to support it as any other—it was certainly incumbent on him to do his utmost that this memorial should be disposed of in a respectful manner. Why had this memorial, which all appeared to admit to be couched in respectful language, called forth the indignation of gentlemen? The Legislature, availing itself of its constitutional right, had performed that duty which, as guardians of the people's rights, they owed to their constituents; and he trusted, whatever might be said out of the House, that the doctrine never would be countenanced on this floor, that after a measure has become a law, it is not admissible to oppose it. Mr. B. spoke of the sufferings of the people of Massachusetts as being very great, and the sentiments contained in the memorial very general. He urged a temperate consideration of it, and reply or refutation of it if the people were proved to be in error. The gentleman from Maryland had charged this with being a treasonable paper, and of course the Legislature as being guilty of treason. A proper respect for Massachusetts and himself, Mr. B. said, forbade any other reply to such remarks, than that the honorable gentleman was as ignorant of the principles of free Government as he was of the character of the people of Massachusetts.

The motion to except from printing that part of the memorial which relates to Louisiana, was negatived; and the memorial was ordered to be printed—yeas 108.

Protest of Minority.

Mr. RICHARDSON presented an address of the minority of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, protesting against the statements and principles contained in the remonstrance above stated, as unseasonable in their origin, reprehensible in language, erroneous in facts, and pernicious in their effects.—Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The Ways and Means.

On motion of Mr. FISK of New York, the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolution, yesterday submitted by him, for imposing a duty on spirits.

The resolution having been again read—

Mr. INGERSOLL read the following resolutions, which he proposed to offer as amendatory of and additional to that of Mr. FISK:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of taxing all successions to the estates of persons dying after the — day of — next, within the United States, whenever such decedent shall leave a clear estate, real, personal, or mixed, worth five hundred dollars; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of taxing all ascertainable income from all estates, real, personal, and mixed, whenever the yearly amount of income shall exceed five hundred dollars; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of taxing all law suits, offices, and pensions; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. INGERSOLL.—Mr. Chairman, as long as the business of this session proceeded without interruption, I held myself bound, by a sense of imperious public duty, to refrain from disturbing it with any observations of mine; and on all the various subjects of debate have never taken the floor, except for a few minutes at an early day after our meeting, when I deemed it necessary to explain my vote to those against whom I gave it. But the harmony and regularity of our progress being now unfortunately broken up by the resolution of the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. FISK,) and we in danger, I am afraid, of being cast adrift upon a sea of troubles, the same sense of public propriety which enjoined silence on me heretofore, requires that I should now solicit your patience, and that of the committee, which I am apprehensive I shall severely exercise, during the discussion of the elaborate and uninteresting matters involved in the subject of taxation. Tedious and dull as they are intrinsically, they will prove peculiarly so in my treatment, because, besides having no ability to impart to them an extraordinary interest, I shall endeavor to restrict myself to the subject to be kept in view. Consecrated as I consider this special session to this special deliberation, and anxious to afford, as far as I am able, without regard to minor considerations, a good system of permanent and productive internal revenue, I beg leave to disclaim all mere party and State professions, to divest myself of their livery, and to approach the inquiry with no other inclination than that for the fairest and most eligible system. I will not, therefore, inflame the debate with the causes of the war which has rendered taxes indispensable. It is enough to say that war, without taxes, is a body without a soul. The physical material you may have without finance; but that moral momentum must be wanting, which gives to the physical material its movement and alacrity. The armor of war is, to be sure, fabricated of iron, but it never will be lasting unless burnished with gold; nor can the attitude of war be what it ought to be—an attitude of defiance and annoyance to the enemy, of protection and safeguard to us—unless it be erected on a well-founded Treasury, capable of perpetual reproductiveness and never-failing replenishment.

The Secretary of the Treasury has recommended taxes to our enactment, as "necessary evils." I do not mean my honorable friend and most worthy townsman, the acting Secretary of the Treasury, but that distinguished Secretary of the Treasury who is now, I suppose, about half seas over on his way to the arctic circle, in pursuit of peace; intoxicated, I am afraid, with vain hopes of at least a very doubtful and dangerous success—a success reposed on the remote and uncertain mediation of a foreign empire, rather than the native energies of our own. Most heartily, for my part, do I wish the Russian mission a speedy accomplishment of all its objects! But, though I have avoided inflaming this debate with a recapitulation of the causes of this just war, permit me to avail myself of this occasion to throw in very briefly my ideas of its legitimate progress and proper termination. If I differ in opinion with any of my friends, as it is an honest difference, there can be no impropriety in my exhibiting the grounds of the sentiments I entertain. I am one of the last individuals in this House who would wantonly utter a disrespectful or ungracious sentiment concerning any of the measures of that Administration, to which I am attached, or toward that excellent person in particular, who, so much to the interest and satisfaction of his country, fills the Executive Magistracy of these United States; whose strong and pervading hold on the confidence and affections of his fellow-citizens have been signally proved within these last few days, by the almost universal expression of their fervent wishes for his recovery from the illness with which he has been visited, and his restoration to the full enjoyment of those eminent faculties which have always been so exemplarily exerted in the purest public service. But, sir, I espoused this just and inevitable war, not because it was a measure of the present Administration—and I am wedded to its fortunes—not merely because the present Administration is intrusted with its prosecution. My affiance is founded on higher and deeper, I will add nobler principles—principles which will outlive this and every other Administration. I support, and will continue to support, this war, so long as I shall remain in the conscientious belief, together with the majority of the American people, that the hostilities we ought to be waging are indispensable to the welfare, the character, the union, the existence of the nation.

Sir, having said thus much, let me add, with a full foresight of the responsibility I incur—having well considered what I am about to say—and prompted in its public declaration by a powerful sense of public duty, I proceed to add, that I am afraid this war has been mortified with too pacific an aspect; I fear its vigor has been cramped for the purpose of pampering a premature peace. I am as warm a friend to peace as any man, and would subscribe to it on as moderate terms; but after war has been declared, in my humble apprehension, peace-seeking is not the avenue to peace, is not pacific policy. If this war had been waged with a boldness, such as has marked our incessant endeavors to put a stop to it, which have followed each other ever since war was declared, in an increasing ratio of iteration and intensity, I have no doubt that the enemy, long before now, would have been panting for peace, pent up within the walls of Quebec, if indeed even the last resort of his annoyance, the ultima thule of his foothold on the North American continent had not been in your safekeeping, a pledge, a mortgage, for a permanent pacification. Instead of which, what is the fact? Turn your eyes, sir, on that quarter, where all the eyes of this country are riveted in aching expectation; look to your lakes, and see a sufficient, well-disciplined and competent force—an army which triumphs in every conflict, in spite of the errors of its commanders—see that army frustrate and idle on the strand, because you have not yet, after a twelve months' war like a peace, the complete command of those inland waters, which are as vitally essential to the well-being, the tranquillity, the security, the integrity of this Union, as the command of this District of Columbia; in my view of both subjects infinitely more so. And why is this? Because, at least I fear it is because, your sinews have been distended towards Russia, instead of Canada.

As soon as war was declared, I would have almost forgotten that we had such an office as the Department of State, much as I revere the irreproachable gentleman in that Department, and would have limited all my views to the belligerent departments, now so well replenished with talents, experience, and competency

The Ways and Means.

[H. OF R.]

At any rate I would have looked to them alone as long as a remorseless enemy was thundering at the gate with bombardment and conflagration in his train. If I am not mistaken in my historical recollections, in the year 1788, when the English Cabinet sent Mr. Keene as their Minister to Madrid, to treat of the embarrassments at that time superinduced between Spain and England, by the resistance, the pertinacious and invincible resistance, opposed by the latter to a claim of search exercised by the Spanish Guarda Costa in the American seas—precisely the same sort of search which England now as pertinaciously and triumphantly asserts—if I am not entirely mistaken, the Spanish Government repelled all discussion, while Admiral Haddock's fleet was hovering in the Mediterranean on the coast of Spain, and insisted on the withdrawal of that fleet as a preliminary sine qua non to any overture for peace. If I am not equally mistaken, at a much later period, so recently as 1807, when Sir John Duckworth forced the Dardanelles, and ranged his squadron before Constantinople, with springs on their cables and matches lighted, threatening the favorite residence of the Musselmans with the devastation of their mosques and harems; the Turk, sir, the despised, the outlawed Turk, who never paid a tax but by exaction, peremptorily refused to treat with his invaders, on any terms, until their batteries should no longer overhang the Turkish shore; and Admiral Duckworth with, if I am correct in my remembrance, Mr. Arbuthnot, an able Ambassador on board, as much so probably as Sir John Warren, found it necessary to withdraw without the Dardanelles, in order to open his negotiation. These, sir, indeed, are Moorish precedents, unbecoming perhaps American imitation. But I must confess, when I perceive how this conflict lingers in America, however rapidly it may be hastening, for aught I know of, to a profitable and goodly end in Russia, I do not think it due to that large portion of the community, whose opinions I am sure I speak on this occasion, to refrain from a decided but decorous expression of regret, that the Secretary of the Treasury should have gone—while yet a whole province, I mean the Territory of Michigan, is under the enemy's subjugation—that he should have gone, scorched with the fires of Havre and of Georgetown, coolly to sue for peace, under the influence of the North Pole.

Accede to such a mediation as that of Russia I always would, without a moment's hesitation, and by all fair means cherish the Russian alliance; for undoubtedly Russia is the only European power of the first grade that has always treated America with respect and amity; though, to be sure, not to give Russia more credit than she is entitled to, we never have come in collision with her, and never can, unless we should disagree about the lands in Kamschatka. But move one single furlong from the American soil in quest of peace I never would, under any foreign auspices whatever. If we are to be victorious, this is the meridian for victory; if to be vanquished, this is the spot to fall upon. There is no wisdom, no policy, in courting peace; and I do anxiously trust that no hope of peace to be obtained in another hemisphere will be suffered to procrastinate the war in this.

Whether it would be possible, and how long, to carry on the belligerent operations of Government by loans alone, without taxes pledged for their regular and faithful redemption; and whether loans, as a system, be a good or a bad, I am not now about to inquire, though I am inclined to believe, from the abundance of money in the country, and the facility with which it has been procured, provided a high interest is offered, that perhaps for some time it would not be impracticable to obtain such loans. But then it must be in a ratio of interest always increasing, in a ratio of amount obtained always decreasing; and when the economy, independently of the dignity of the Commonwealth, is taken into view, there can be no question of the necessity and advantage of taxation. You otherwise fall into the hands of brokers. You have not incurred that misfortune yet. But as your first interest was six per cent., your second seven and a half, or some fractional sum between seven and eight, I do not know exactly what, nor is it material—so your next must be ten, after that twenty, or some such exorbitant remuneration, and so on until the interest almost equals the principal. That a system of loans, therefore, is a bad system, without a corresponding arrangement of taxes, is not to be disputed.

The Committee of Ways and Means have recommended, as the principal resource, a direct land tax. After we had been engaged for a week and more on the laborious details of this tax, and had arrived, as I flattered myself, very near their termination, most unexpectedly an objection to the whole is stated by the honorable gentleman from New York, who wishes, first, to substitute a whiskey tax to the amount of two millions in the place of the land tax, which he proposes to relinquish altogether; and, secondly, his plan is to convert the whiskey tax from a collection on the capacity, as the committee have reported it, to an excise on the gallon. As to the substitution of the one tax for the other, I am averse to such a change for a variety of reasons. All direct taxes are preferable to indirect taxes, in a republican country; and accordingly, in all the debates on this subject, in 1791, '2, '3, '4, '5, '6, '7, '8, and '9, the republican and agricultural representation in Congress expressed the predilection for such a tax. I do not pretend to be intimate with its details, nor competent to decide on the expediency of one establishment in preference to another. I am not yet perfectly aware of the merits of the controversy involved in the modification introduced by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. MONTGOMERY,) and voted against that modification, not because I clearly saw that the plan proposed by the committee was preferable in its assessments—for on that point I have not formed a judgment—but because I am convinced that the optional subsequent arrangement should be left with the respective States, as proposed by the committee, and controverted by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky. On that point I have a decided opinion. The Federalist, in the 88th and 45th numbers, explicitly asserts the position now taken by the committee; which convinces me that such a method of taxation was contemplated at the moment of the adoption of the constitution; and I am equally clear of its expediency.

A land tax is the principal item of taxation, I believe, in all countries where the agricultural interest predominates. Peuchet, a late French statist, gives the income of France, for 1804, at 684,000,000 of francs; which is about 84,200,000 pounds sterling. Of this sum no less than 206,908,000 proceed from the direct land tax. In England the land tax and assessed taxes afford but 7,899,000 out of an income of 71,000,000, exclusively of loans for the year 1812. So that the land tax in France amounts to nearly one-third of the whole national income, and to but a tenth in England.

The other taxes reported by the committee are mostly the same with those formerly in operation; but altered in their principles of distribution and collection, according to the amendments which experience and time have dictated.

In the tax proposed on pleasure carriages, it appears to me—and at a proper state of the proceeding I intend to submit an amendment to that effect—that by the substitution of pleasure houses for pleasure carriages, we shall equalize the taxation and increase the product. The former carriage tax fell in very unequal burdens on Massachusetts and Virginia; and I should suppose that such a tax would now prove more unequal than it ever was before. But by laying it on pleasure houses instead of pleasure carriages, or on pleasure houses as well as pleasure carriages, the imposition would be equalized.

The sources of income contemplated in the resolutions I have laid on the table, are brought into view, not so much for the purpose of pressing them forward at this session, as in order to show that there probably are as many projects in imagination as there are members in their seats: and if indeed the honorable gentleman from New York persists in his scheme, contrary to the report of the committee, I do not know why every other theorist may not be indulged in the prosecution of his, too. The result of it all will be, I have no doubt—I am certain from reflection and observation on the course of our business—that after floundering for a fortnight, at this intemperate season, through a mire of schemes, we shall at last return, nothing the wiser or nearer our respective objects, to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means. At another session there will be abundant opportunity for the alteration of such taxes as may be enacted at this, and the introduction of such additional taxes as may be devised.

I am myself attached to a system of income taxes. All economists agree that taxes are preferable which bear on income, to taxes which bear on principal, as I have before intimated. The tax on successions would be a fair and a profitable one, and easy of collection. I would provide for it, as is done in England, by a clause or two in the stamp act, declaring that receipts to executors and administrators should not be valid unless stamped with a particular kind of stamp, together with other securities for the attainment of the tax. The public would thus be, in fact, the heir of every decedent; and his heirs or devisees would be obliged to pay but a small discount on the receipt of their successions. This is a tax as old as the age of Augustus Cæsar, and in operation, I believe, in most of the countries of modern Europe.

The tax on law suits I would arrange also by a clause or more in the stamp act, declaring that, on the institution of any suit for a demand exceeding $100, the party plaintiff or complainant should be obliged to pay down a certain sum, say never less than one dollar nor more than five, which should abide the event of the action, like other costs. If the plaintiff succeeded, the advance should be refunded to him by taxing it on the defendant. If the defendant succeeded, the plaintiff should not have it back again. I cannot speak with any precision of the number of suits brought in any other jurisdiction than that of the several courts of Philadelphia. I compute there about 8,500 a year. Taking this number of suits, and calculating the product on the whole United States at the same rate, and I make an annual income which might amount to $300,000, from this item of internal revenue.

But the best of all taxes, in my opinion, is an income tax. It is true it was reserved for one of the last struggles of finance in England, where it did not appear until the time of the late Mr. Pitt. But it affords, as appears by the British budget for 1812, upwards of thirteen millions sterling a year; and must be, of all taxes, the most just, because it is nothing more than a deduction from superfluity and wealth, to be bestowed in the public service. It is perhaps true, that very serious difficulties would occur in its collection. But I do not think it would be found indispensable to put every citizen to his oath as to the amount of his income. The amount might be assessed according to his visible or ostensible property, as I believe is the case with other rates in Philadelphia, leaving to the party a right of appeal in all cases of grievance, but fixing him with the burden of disproving what he had been rated at.

WEDNESDAY, June 30.

The Ways and Means.

The question, whether the Committee of the whole House have leave to sit again on Mr. Fisk's resolution for laying an excise on domestic distilled spirits, was taken up and decided in the affirmative—yeas 68, nays 48.

And the further consideration of the same was then postponed to Monday four weeks—yeas 68, nays 61.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bills for laying and collecting a direct tax.

The committee proceeded to consider the bill for laying a tax on licenses for distilling.

Mr. TAYLOR, after a speech of considerable length, moved to strike out the whole of the 2d section of the bill, which lays a tax on the capacity of the still.

[A debate of considerable length took place on the motion, in which Messrs. BIBE, DUVAL, WRIGHT, FISK of New York, ROBERTS, FINDLAY, BOWEN, SHIPARD, and PICKENS, successively spoke.]

Mr. DUVAL.—Mr. Chairman, I rise with reluctance to address you on this subject. But the interests of the nation, and particularly the Western States, are deeply concerned in the subject now under consideration. Sir, I was opposed to the amendment offered to this bill by a gentleman from New York, (Mr. FISK,) on yesterday, changing its principle by laying an excise duty of nine or twelve cents on each gallon of domestic distilled spirits; and the proposition now made by another honorable member from the same State, (Mr. TAYLOR,) to strike out the first and second sections of this bill, is made with the avowed intention of laying an excise duty on the gallon; it is the same proposition, made only in another manner. I fear, sir, if this motion should prevail, the first and second sections of this bill be lost, and its principle entirely changed, its final passage will be rendered doubtful. I ask but the attention of this committee for a short time to prove to their satisfaction that the motion to strike out ought not to prevail. To do this, I shall not exhaust your patience by a learned display of ancient and modern history, or by a recitation of the fiscal systems of Great Britain and France. For the honorable member from Pennsylvania (Mr. INNESOLL) has taken a wide and learned view of all these subjects. I shall account myself fortunate if I can come to the point in controversy, and mix up a little common sense in the opinions I shall advance. I admire the book learning that has been displayed by several gentlemen on this subject; but let me assure you that common sense and practical knowledge of the operation of this tax, are worth all the learned theories and disquisitions which we can have on this subject. I ask who are to pay the tax on stills? The people of the Western country, who have already sustained the weight of the war. The people of the Western country, are they to do all the fighting, and to pay all the taxes? Will the people of the South, East, and a great portion of the North pay this tax? No. It will be paid by the Western people, men without capitals, farmers, whose distance from the seaboard compels them to distill the product of their farms, in order to take it to distant markets in the only shape that can reward them for their labors. The tax, as proposed in the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, is one dollar and eight cents per gallon on the capacity of each still. I fear that this will be more than our farmers can pay; men who are obliged daily to labor on their farms for the support of their families, cannot command the money that will be required to pay the tax on their stills. A license on a still of the capacity of one hundred and fifty gallons, for one year, will amount to one hundred and sixty-two dollars, which not one farmer in two hundred can advance. The certain consequence, then, will be to prevent all who are owners of stills (and who cannot command the amount of duty) from distilling at all. The revenue, contemplated even under the bill as it now stands, will fall far short, I fear, of the calculations already submitted, which is seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The tax is now too high. It will not yield as much revenue as can be raised by lessening the duty, for if the duty was seventy-five cents per gallon upon the capacity of the still, I assert that three stills would be in operation under the duty, when not more than one in five will be employed under the regulations which are now submitted by the bill as reported. But change the principle of this bill, and lay an excise of nine or twelve cents on each gallon of domestic spirits distilled, and, I venture to predict, that the revenue from this source will be but an illusion. Men in moderate circumstances, and such constitute the large body of the people in the Western States, will be completely debarred of the use of their stills, and the Government defeated of its revenue by an avaricious and over-calculating spirit. The thousands that this tax has been calculated to produce will vanish like a morning dream. If it is our serious business to raise money for the war, let me ask if it is wise or prudent to lay such a weight on one article, when it is evident that, if overstrained, it will sink at once with all our prospects, all our hopes of revenue? I was surprised when I heard the gentleman from New York (Mr. FISK) gravely tell you, that the whole revenue now wanted by the Government, ought to, and could, be raised by an excise on distilled spirits. But, surprise was changed to astonishment when that gentleman said a revenue of twenty-five millions of dollars could be raised in the way proposed, and that he would vote for the raising of that sum if necessary. Yea, sir, I have no doubt that that gentleman and many others will vote for laying an extravagant excise on distilled spirits, because they hope by doing so to avoid (what they view with trembling apprehension) a direct tax; their own constituents will not then feel the weight of the taxes, and if this motion shall prevail, it will exempt them from the burden of the Government. This course of legislation is, I suppose, what some gentlemen call patriotic—supporting the war with vigor by shuffling the burdens of it from their own on the shoulders of others. If so, let them boast of their virtue and patriotism in voting for the only tax that cannot reach their constituents. Such refined patriotism does not belong to the Western people. I, sir, shall vote for the bill as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, not because I think it equal, but because the situation of this nation demands that we raise a revenue; because, if this law laying a duty on stills does not pass, no other tax bill will get through this House. The tax on stills has never been popular in my State, and I do not expect it will be approved of by every person in my district. The great body of the people of the Western States will, however, submit with cheerfulness, as they know the necessity that requires them to contribute to the National Treasury, is of first importance to the Union. I know that gentlemen in the Opposition have said publicly that the people will not submit to be taxed, because they objected to taxes under Mr. Adams' Administration.

THURSDAY, July 1.

Ways and Means.

An engrossed bill for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties was read the third time; and, on the question that the same do pass, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 63, as follows:

FRIDAY, July 2.

The Ways and Means.

The engrossed bill to lay a duty on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors, was read a third time.

[This bill proposes a duty on licenses to distillers, as follows: For the employment of a still or stills employed in distilling spirits from domestic materials; for two weeks, nine cents for each gallon of the capacity thereof, including the head; for one month, eighteen cents; for two months, thirty-two cents; for three months, forty-two cents; for four months, fifty-two cents; for six months, seventy cents; for one year, one hundred and eight cents for each gallon of its capacity as aforesaid. For a license for the employment of a still or stills in the distillation of spirits from foreign materials: for one month, twenty-five cents for each gallon of its capacity, for three months, sixty cents; for six months; one hundred and five cents; for one year, one hundred and thirty-five cents for each gallon of its capacity. And for every boiler, however constructed, employed in distilleries by steam, double the amount on each gallon of its capacity, which would be payable for said license if granted for the same terms and to employ the same materials for a still.]

The bill was passed, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Barnett, Beall, Bibb, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Cheves, Clopton, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Duvall, Earle, Evans, Farrow, Findlay, Fisk of New York, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harria, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Hungerford, Hyneman, Ingham, Irwin, Jackson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Lafferts, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Moore, Murfree, Newton, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Roane, Roberts, Robertson, Sevier, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Ward of New Jersey, Whitehill, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wood, Wright, and Yancey—85.

MONDAY, July 12.

Answer to Mr. Webster's Resolutions.

Two Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

JULY, 1813.]

Tax on Bank Notes.

[H. OF R.]

To the House of Representatives of the United States :

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of State, containing the information requested by their resolutions of the 21st of June last.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, July 12, 1813.

To the House of Representatives of the United States :

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of State, containing the information requested by their resolution of the 21st of June last.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, July 12, 1813.

The Messages and documents being read, were referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations, and five thousand copies of said Messages and documents ordered to be printed.

Encouragement to Privateers.

The unfinished business was resumed, viz: the consideration of the bill "to relinquish the claims of the United States to certain goods, wares, and merchandise, captured by private armed vessels."

[This bill releases all right and claim accruing to the United States, under the non-importation laws, to goods, wares, or merchandise, the property of British subjects, shipped from British ports since the declaration of war, which, having been captured by private armed vessels on the high and open seas, have been libelled and claimed in the courts of the United States, in all cases where such goods, &c., shall be condemned as prize of war, for the benefit of the captors, &c.]

The question on the passage of the bill was carried—79 to 64, as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Clark, Clopton, Condict, Conard, Creighton, Davis of Pennsylvania, Dawson, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Evans, Findlay, Fisk of Vermont, Forney, Franklin, Gourdin, Goodwyn, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harria, Hasbrouck, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hyne-man, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irwin, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Lefferts, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Sharp, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey.

VOL. V.—5

TUESDAY, July 13.

Foreign Relations.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, made the following report :

The Committee of Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the President's Message of the 12th instant, and the accompanying documents, report : That they have examined the Message and documents with all the attention their importance demands. Your committee will not indulge themselves in making the various observations which the interesting subjects brought under their consideration naturally suggest. The delay incident to such a course, connected with the lateness of the session and the advanced season of the year, forbid so wide a range ; but they cannot abstain from remarking that, while the Message and documents furnish strong additional proof of the justice and necessity of the war, they also present powerful motives for the steady and vigorous prosecution of it, and the surest means of a safe and honorable peace. It can now no longer be doubted, that it was the pressure of our measures, combined with the determination of Congress to redress our wrongs by arms, and not the repeal of the French decrees, that broke down the Orders in Council of 1807 and 1809 ; that dangerous system of monopoly by which we were, as to our commerce, in fact recolonized. Let us then persevere, and under a just Providence we doubt not of final success. The reward is worthy of the cost and privation. It is no less than the lasting peace and independence of ourselves, and our posterity.

There is another view of the subject which your committee are compelled to present to the House. It is due to justice to consider the Message and documents in relation to the conduct of the Executive. They are aware that on ordinary occasions it is not proper for this House to express sentiments of approbation or censure on the conduct of the President, but submit with deference, that as through this body he is responsible to the people for the faithful discharge of his duties, there are cases in which it is not only the right but the duty of this House to express its opinion. Such, in the judgment of your committee, is the present. The language of the resolutions, and the motives avowed by their supporters, leave no alternative. To be silent, would be to condemn. Upon a full investigation of the conduct of the Executive in relation to Great Britain and France, as disclosed in the Message and documents, your committee are of opinion, that a just course has been pursued towards both nations, and in no instance has the dignity, honor or interests of the United States been compromised.

Your committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution :

"Resolved, That the conduct of the Executive in relation to the various subjects referred to in the resolutions of the 21st day of June, 1813, meets with the approbation of this House."

WEDNESDAY, July 14.

Tax on Bank Notes.

The Committee of the Whole then took up the bill laying a duty on bank notes, notes of hand, and foreign bills of exchange of certain descriptions.

Mr. BRIS explained the grounds on which he supported this measure at the present time.

Mr. TAYLOR, after some explanatory remarks, going to show the difficulty of collecting a revenue on stamped paper, and the great inconveniences of such a tax on the people, made a motion to strike out a part of the first section of the bill for laying a tax on promissory notes, &c., so as to impose a duty on bank notes alone.

Considerable discussion arose on this motion, in which Messrs. TAYLOR, WRIGHT, and JACKSON supported the amendment; and Messrs. BIBB, ROBERTS, CLAY, and SEYBERT, opposed it. The question was taken and decided in the negative—ayes 84, noes 84.

The Speaker (Mr. CLAY) then moved to amend the bill, so as to confine the tax on notes, &c., to those negotiated at banks, with a view to except from stamp duties the ordinary country transactions by notes, &c.; which motion Mr. O. supported by a luminous and comprehensive view of the expediency and policy of the course he proposed.

After some remarks from Mr. JACKSON, approving the proposition of Mr. CLAY, but suggesting a variation of the proposed mode of collecting the tax, and in opposition to the amendment from Mr. WRIGHT, the question was taken on Mr. CLAY's motion, and carried without a division.

The bill having been gone through, and some further amendments made thereto, the committee rose, reported the bill to the House as amended, and obtained leave to sit again on the remaining tax bills.

THURSDAY, July 15.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole to the bill laying duties on bank notes, and on notes of hand, and foreign bills of exchange, of certain descriptions; and the said amendments being again read at the Clerk's table, were severally concurred in by the House.

A motion was then made by Mr. KING of Massachusetts, further to amend the bill by adopting the following proviso to the end of the first section, to wit:

"Provided further, That where any bank, by the existing laws of any State, now pays a tax on the capital stock or dividend of such bank to such State, such tax shall be deducted from the amount of the tax imposed by this act."

And the question being taken it was determined in the negative.

Mr. KING again moved further to amend the bill, by adding the following proviso to the end of the second section, to wit:

"Provided, That where any bank, by the existing laws of any State, now pays a tax to such State on the capital stock or dividend of such bank, such tax shall be deducted from the composition allowed by this act; provided it does not exceed one per cent. on the amount of the annual dividend of such bank."

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

The said bill was further amended, and on the question that the same be engrossed for a third reading, it passed in the affirmative; yeas 90, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bibb, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Cheves, Clark, Clopton, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Davis of Pennsylvania, Dawson, Desha, Duvall, Eppea, Evans, Farrow, Findlay, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Hyneman, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irwin, Kennedy, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Pickens, Piper, Pleasant, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Richardson, Roane, Roberts, Robertson, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Whitehill, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancey.

The bill was then ordered to be read the third time to-morrow.

FRIDAY, July 16.

Salt Tax, and Fishing Bounties and Allowances.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to lay a duty on imported salt. The question recurred on concurring in the second amendment reported by the Committee of the whole House.

A motion was made by Mr. MACON, to amend the said amendment, by inserting the following section, to come in as the third section of the bill:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no bounty, drawback, or allowance, shall be made, under the authority of this act, unless it shall be proved, to the satisfaction of the Collector, that the pickled fish or salted provisions for which the bounty, drawback, or allowance, shall be claimed, was wholly cured with foreign salt, and on which a duty shall have been secured or paid.

Mr. JOHN REED—Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to have troubled this House with any observations at this time. But, sir, I consider it my duty to offer some plain and obvious reasons in favor of the proposed amendment; and also to read some extracts from an able and elaborate report of a former Secretary of State on the subject.

Encouragement to Privateers.

[H. OF R.]

The amendment now under consideration, to the bill laying a duty of twenty cents per bushel on imported salt, makes an allowance to vessels engaged in the cod fisheries under certain limitations and restrictions as therein provided, and also allows a drawback on the exportation of pickled fish and salted provisions. The allowance and drawback above mentioned are intended as an equivalent to the duty paid on the salt used in the curing and preserving fish and meat.

I would state to this House that, in the curing and preserving codfish, great quantities of salt, especially in comparison with the value of fish cured and preserved, are absolutely requisite. I believe the remark equally true as it respects pickled fish.

If a duty of twenty cents per bushel be laid on all foreign salt, as contemplated by the bill on your table, and the proposed amendment should not prevail, this tax would be oppressive on fishermen beyond all precedent or endurance.

Shall I be permitted to state some cases for the consideration of this House? Suppose a fishing vessel of seventy tons burden use 1,500 bushels of salt in the fishing season; a duty of twenty cents per bushel would amount to three hundred dollars. If all the profits to all the fishermen and owners of such vessel as I have described during the fishing seasons and markets would amount to nine hundred dollars, then, by the proposed tax of three hundred, you take from their pockets 88½ per cent., or one-third part of all the income and profits of fishermen.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. PROKENA) has several times addressed this House on the proposed amendment. That gentleman observed yesterday that the salt tax would bear very hard on his constituents. He stated that in the district he had the honor to represent, salt sold for about two dollars per bushel, that the addition of twenty cents would be a severe burden; at the same time, that gentleman seems much opposed to any amendment which has for its object the relief of any portion of the community from the proposed duty. Other gentlemen have advanced the same sentiments. If a farmer use fifteen or thirty bushels of salt he must pay a tax to this Government of three dollars or six dollars. If a fisherman, possessed of the same value of property, and having the same income, should use 1,500 or 3,000 bushels of salt, of course he would pay a tax to this Government of three hundred or six hundred dollars. The hypothetical statements I have made, I believe substantially true. I will not for a moment believe any gentleman in this House, while he complains of burdens about to be laid on his own constituents, almost too heavy to be borne, will consent to lay burdens one hundred fold heavier on any portion of the inhabitants of any section of the United States.

Again, by the constitution we have no power to tax the exports of our own country; and by a provision in the bill on your table, conformable to the uniform policy of the country, when salt imported is again exported, a drawback is allowed. If no duty can be laid on our own exports, and a drawback of duties paid be allowed on the exportation of foreign merchandise, I am unable to perceive any good reason, founded either in justice or the fitness of things, why those who pay the duties on salt necessarily used in preserving fish and meats should not be entitled to the like advantages on the exportation of the same, as they would have been, if the salt had not been usefully employed. It can certainly be no objection in the mind of any man that the salt is incorporated with the fish—a production of this country of so little profit to the fisherman and so highly advantageous to the United States. The quantity of salt necessarily used can be easily ascertained. I do not believe the allowance proposed adequate to the duty on salt which must necessarily be used. It certainly ought to be our object to tax every portion of the inhabitants of the United States as equally as possible. It is my solemn and deliberate opinion that those engaged in the fisheries now pay this Government more, in proportion to the value of their property, than any other class of citizens in the United States. They pay various taxes not known to those not engaged in navigation. Tonnage duty alone, and the trouble and vexation of paying it, is a much heavier tax than the land and house tax, so much feared and dreaded. I can by no means agree with the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who stated a few days since that ship owners did not at all regard the tonnage duty, as they charged it to the consumers. To fishermen, at least, it is a tax. It takes the money directly from them, and places it in your treasury. They can recover nothing of the tax paid from the consumers, as European nations are the consumers, and we are wholly unable to regulate or control their markets. The above remark is equally true and applicable to the duty paid on salt.

The amendment proposed is most important as it affects the interests of the nation. You can obtain little from fishermen. The business is too poor; it will not afford it. They are now distressed more than any other class of citizens. I assure you they cannot pay into your treasury one-third of all the profits of their voyages. If, therefore, you prosecute the notions of some, you may destroy the fisheries, but will gain very little revenue.

SATURDAY, July 17.

Encouragement to Privateers.

Mr. NELSON submitted the following resolutions for consideration:

1. Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of affording encouragement to the private armed vessels of the United States to cruise against the ships and vessels of the enemy, by diminishing the duties on prizes and prize goods captured by them; and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

2. Resolved, That the Naval Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of encouraging the private armed ships of the United States to capture the officers, seamen, and marines, of the enemy, by holding out the offer of a bounty for all such captives.

A motion was made by Mr. BIBB to amend the first resolution, by striking out the words "by diminishing the duties on prizes and prize goods, captured by them, or by permitting them to bring into port, free from duty, all prizes and prize goods." And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was made by Mr. INGHAM to amend the first resolution, by striking out the words "or by permitting them to bring into port, free from duty, all prizes and prize goods." And the question thereon being taken, it passed in the affirmative.

A division of the question to agree to the said resolutions was called for: Upon which, the question was taken on the first resolution, as amended and passed in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 51.

The second resolution was then agreed to by the House.

TUESDAY, July 20.

Foreign Relations.

Mr. CALHOUN moved for the consideration of the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations on the President's Message, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State on Mr. Webster's resolutions. This motion was lost—yeas 62, nays 74.

WEDNESDAY, July 21.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Naval Establishment, reported a bill allowing a bounty to the owners, officers, and crews, of the private armed vessels; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

FRIDAY, July 23.

The Ways and Means.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing a loan for a sum not exceeding — dollars. The bill was reported with an amendment thereto, by filling the blank with the words "seven millions five hundred thousand;" which was concurred in by the House.

TUESDAY, July 27.

Encouragement to Privateers, by reducing duties on Prize Goods.

The engrossed bill, "for reducing the duties payable on prize goods captured by the private armed vessels of the United States," was read a third time.

And on the question, "Shall the bill pass?"

it passed in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alston, Anderson, Archer, Bard, Beall, Bowen, Butler, Caldwell, Chappell, Clopton, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Davis of Pennsylvania, Dawson, Deaha, Duvall, Earle, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Forney, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Hasbrouck, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hyneman, Ingersoll, Irwin, Kennedy, Kerr, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lyle, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Parker, Pickens, Rea of Penn., Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Roberts, Sevier, Sharp, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancey.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Champion, Cilley, Culpeper, Davenport, Ely, Eppea, Forsyth, Gloninger, Goldborough, Hawes, Hufty, Hungerford, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Lewis, Lovett, Mosely, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, Ridgely, Ruggles, Sheffey, Sherwood, Stanford, Stuart, Sturges, Thompson, Voea, Wright, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Winter.

Honors to General Pike and Captain Lawrence.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. NELSON:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine and report on the propriety of conferring public honors on the memory of James Lawrence, late Captain of the United States frigate Chesapeake, and of Zebulon M. Pike, late a Brigadier General in the Armies of the United States, whose distinguished death in the service of their country add lustre to the character of the American nation; the propriety of adopting, as the peculiar children of the Republic, the sons of these distinguished heroes, and the propriety of making provision for the support and comfort of the families of these deceased officers."

The resolution was read, and debate arising thereon, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, July 28.

Appropriation Bill—Compensation to Ministers.

The House again in Committee of the Whole on the additional appropriation bill. The amount of $48,000 proposed to be appropriated to defray expenses of the Russian mission, was reduced to $38,500, with a view of allowing to John Q. Adams, for his services on said mission, $4,500 instead of the usual outfit of $9,000 proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means to be allowed to him.

A motion was made by Mr. WRIGHT to amend the bill by adding thereto the following proviso:

"Provided, That no compensation be made to John Q. Adams, Minister Resident, unless the British Government agree to send a Minister or Ministers to the mediation of the Emperor of Russia. And, provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury receive no part of the salary of the Secretary of the Treasury during the time he shall be absent from the seat of Government on said mission."

And the question being taken on said motion, was decided in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. SHEFFEY to add the following proviso to the end of a section of the bill:

"Provided, That nothing in this or any other act contained shall be construed to authorize any allowance to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, resident at the Court of St. Petersburg, for any services as Minister to negotiate a Treaty of Peace with Great Britain, beyond the sum of $4,500, included in the appropriation hereinbefore mentioned; which sum is hereby authorized to be paid to the said Minister, if the President shall deem it proper."

And, after much debate, the question thereon being taken by yeas and nays, it appeared that there were for the amendment 55, against it 55.

The House being equally divided, the SPEAKER decided the said question in the negative. And the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Bounty to Privateers.

The bill allowing a bounty to the owners, officers, and crews of the private armed vessels of the United States, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow, in the following words:

A bill allowing a bounty to the owners, officers, and crews of private armed vessels.

Be it enacted, &c., That a bounty of twenty-five dollars be paid to the owners, officers, and crews of the private armed vessels of the United States, commissioned as letters of marque, for each and every prisoner by them captured and brought into port, and delivered to an agent authorized to receive them, in any part of the United States; and that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to pay or cause to be paid to such owners, officers, and crews of private armed vessels commissioned as aforesaid, or their agent, the aforesaid bounty for each person captured and delivered as aforesaid.

And be it further enacted, That the sum of fifty thousand dollars, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, be, and the same is hereby appropriated.

THURSDAY, July 29.

British Licenses.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill to prohibit the use of licenses or passes issued by the Government of Great Britain.

After several ineffectual attempts to amend the bill, the committee rose and reported it without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed, yeas 78, nays 88.

SATURDAY, July 31.

British Barbarities.

Mr. MAOON, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the President's Message which relates to the spirit and manner in which the war has been waged by the enemy; made a report, including a voluminous mass of testimony on the subject. The report is as follows.

The committee, to whom was referred that part of the President's Message which relates to the spirit and manner in which the war has been waged by the enemy, report:

That they have collected and arranged all the testimony on this subject which could at this time be procured. This testimony is submitted to the consideration of the House, arranged under the following heads:

1. Bad treatment of American prisoners;
2. Detention of American prisoners as British subjects, on the plea of nativity in the dominions of Great Britain, or of naturalization;
3. Detention of mariners as prisoners of war, who were in England when the war was declared;
4. Compulsory service of impressed American seamen on board British ships of war;
5. Violation of flags of truce;
6. Ransom of American prisoners from Indians in the British service;
7. Pillage and destruction of private property on the Chesapeake Bay, and in the neighboring country;
8. Massacre and burning of American prisoners surrendered to officers of Great Britain, by Indians in the British service; abandonment of the remains of Americans killed in battle, or murdered after the surrender to the British; the pillage and shooting of American citizens, and the burning of their houses after surrender to the British under the guarantee of protection;
9. Outrages at Hampton, in Virginia.

The evidence under the first head demonstrates that the British Government has adopted a rigor of regulation unfriendly to the comfort, and apparently unnecessary to the safekeeping of American prisoners generally. It shows, also, instances of a departure from the customary rules of war by the selection and confinement in close prisons of particular persons, and the transportation of them for undefined causes from the ports of the British colonies to the island of Great Britain.

The evidence under the second head establishes the fact, that however the practice of detaining American citizens as British subjects may be regarded as to the principle it involves, that such detentions continue to occur through the agency of the naval and other commanders of that Government. It proves, too, that however unwilling to allow other nations to naturalize her subjects, Great Britain is disposed to enforce the obligation entered into by their citizens when naturalized under her own laws. This practice, even supposing the release of every person thus detained, obviously subjects our captured citizens, upon mere suspicion, to hardships and perils from which they ought to be exempt according to the established rules in relation to prisoners of war.

The evidence under the third head shows, that while all other American citizens were permitted to depart within a reasonable time after the declaration of war, all mariners who were in the dominions of Great Britain, whether they resorted to her ports in time of peace for lawful purposes, or were forced into them under pretence of illegal commerce, are considered prisoners of war. The injustice of this exception is not more apparent than the jealousy it discloses towards that useful class of our fellow-citizens. But the committee can but remark, that if the practice of hiring American seamen to navigate British vessels is generally adopted and authorized, and that it is suffered, appears from the advertisement of George Maude, the British agent at Port Royal, which is to be found with the testimony collected under the first head, that the naval strength of that empire will be increased in proportion to the number of our seamen in bondage. The present war having changed the relation of the two countries, the pretended right of impressment can no longer be exercised, but the same end may be accomplished by the substitution of this mode. Every seaman thus employed (the terms of whose engagement have not been ascertained) increases the naval strength of the enemy, not only by depriving the United States of his active services, but by enabling Great Britain to carry on and even extend her commerce without diminishing the number of sailors employed in her vessels of war.

The testimony collected under the fourth head proves, that it is the ordinary practice of the officers of British armed vessels to force impressed Americans to serve against their country by threats, by corporal punishment, and even by the fear of immediate execution; an instructing commentary upon the professions of the Government of its readiness to release impressed American seamen found on board ships of war!

On the evidence collected under the fifth head, it is only necessary to observe that, in one case, the case of Dr. McKeehan, the enormity is increased by the circumstances of the flag being divested of every thing of a hostile character, having solely for its object the relief of the wounded and suffering prisoners who were taken at the river Raisin, on the 23d January, 1818. The treatment of Dr. McKeehan, not by the allies of Great Britain, but by the officers of her army, can only be rationally accounted for by the supposition, that it was considered good policy to deter American surgeons from going to the relief of their countrymen, as the Indian surgeons had a more speedy and effectual mode of relieving their sufferings.

The evidence respecting the ransom of American prisoners from Indians, collected under the sixth head, deserves attention, principally from the policy it indicates, and as it is connected with Indian cruelties. Considering the savages as an auxiliary military force, in the pay of Great Britain, the amount of ransom may be regarded as part of their stipulated compensation for military service; and as ransoms would be increased and their value enhanced by the terror inspired by the most shocking barbarities, it may be fairly concluded, whatever may be the intention of the British Government, that the practice of redeeming captives by pecuniary means will be occasionally quickened by the butchery of our fellow citizens, and by indignities offered to their remains; as long as the Indians are employed by the enemy. The justice of this conclusion is confirmed by the testimony of those witnesses who were retained after ransom as prisoners of war.

The testimony collected under the seventh head shows, that the private property of unarmed citizens has been pillaged by the officers and crews of the British vessels of war on our coast, their houses burnt, and places of public worship mutilated and defiled. It appears that the officers, animated by the presence of Admiral Cockburn, particularly distinguished themselves in these exploits. This evidence proves, that they were governed by the combined motives of avarice and revenge; not satisfied with bearing off, for their own convenience, the valuable articles found, the others which furnished no allurements to their cupidity, were wantonly defaced and destroyed. It has been alleged, in palliation of these acts of wanton cruelty, that a flag sent on shore by the Admiral was fired upon by the American militia. The evidence proves this not to be the fact. This pretence has been resorted to only to excuse conduct which no circumstances can justify.

The committee forbear to make any observations upon the testimony collected under the eighth head, from a perfect conviction that no person of this or any other nation can read the simple narrative of the different witnesses of the grossest violations of honor, justice, and humanity, without the strongest emotions of indignation and horror. That these outrages were perpetrated by Indians, is neither palliation nor excuse. Every civilized nation is answerable for the conduct of the allies under their command, and while they partake of the advantages of their success, they are equally partakers of the odium of their crimes. The British forces concerned in the affair of the 22d, at the river Raisin, are more deeply implicated in the infamy of these transactions than by this mode of reasoning, however correct. The massacre of the 23d January, after the capitulation, was perpetrated without any exertion on their part to prevent it; indeed, it is apparent, from all the circumstances, that if the British officers did not connive at their destruction, they were criminally indifferent about the fate of the wounded prisoners.* But what marks

* Sworn statement of Dr. GUSTAVUS M. BOWEN, surgeon's mate, Kentucky Volunteers:

NICHOLASVILLE, Ky., April 24, 1818.

SIR: Yours of the 5th instant, requesting me to give you a statement respecting the late disaster at Frenchtown, was duly received. Rest assured, sir, that it is with sensations the most unpleasant that I undertake to recount the infamous and barbarous conduct of the British and Indians after the battle of the 23d January. The blood runs cold in my veins when I think of it.

On the morning of the 23d, shortly after light, six or eight Indians came to the house of Jean Baptiste Jereame, where I was, in company with Major Graves, Captains Hart and Hickman, Doctor Todd, and fifteen or twenty private volunteers, belonging to different corps. They did not molest any person or thing on their first approach, but kept sauntering about until there were a large number collected, (say one or two hundred,) at which time they commenced plundering the houses of the inhabitants, and the massacre of the wounded prisoners. I was one among the first that was taken prisoner, and was taken to a house about twenty paces from the house, after being divested of a part of my clothing, and commanded by signs there to remain for further orders. Shortly after being there I saw them knock down Captain Hickman at the door, together with several others with whom I was not acquainted. Supposing a general massacre had commenced, I made an effort to get to a house about one hundred yards distant, which contained a number of wounded; but, on reaching the house, to my great mortification, found it surrounded by Indians, which precluded the possibility of my giving notice to the unfortunate victims of savage barbarity. An Indian chief of the Tawa tribe, by the name of McCarty, gave me possession of his horse and blanket, telling me, by signs, to lead the horse to the house which I had just before left. The Indian that first took me, by this time came up and manifested a hostile disposition towards me, by raising his tomahawk as if to give the fatal blow, which was prevented by my very good friend McCarty. On my reaching the house which I had first started from, I saw the Indians take off several prisoners, which I afterwards saw in the road in a most mangled condition, and entirely stripped of their clothing.

Messrs. Bradford, Searle, Turner, and Blythe, were collected around a carryall, which contained articles taken by more strongly the degradation of the character of the British soldiers, is the refusal of the last offices of humanity to the bodies of the dead. The bodies of our countrymen were exposed to every indignity, and become food for brutes in the sight of men who affect a sacred regard to the dictates of honor and religion. Low indeed is the character of that army which is reduced to the confession, that their savage auxiliaries will not permit them to perform the rites of sepulture to the slain. The committee have not been able to discover even the expression of that detestation which such conduct must inspire from the military or civil authority on the Canadian frontier, unless such detestation is to be presumed from the choice of an Indian trophy as an ornament for the Legislative Hall of Upper Canada.

the Indians from the citizens. We had all been placed there, by our respective captors, except Blythe, who came where we were, entreating an Indian to convey him to Malden, promising to give him forty or fifty dollars, and whilst in the act of pleading for mercy, an Indian, more savage than the other, stepped up behind, tomahawked, stripped, and scalped him. The next that attracted my attention was the houses on fire that contained several wounded, whom I knew were not able to get out. After the houses were nearly consumed, we received marching orders, and after arriving at Sandy Creek, the Indians called a halt, and commenced cooking; after preparing and eating a little sweetened gruel, Messrs. Bradford, Searls, Turner, and myself, received some, and were eating, when an Indian came up and proposed exchanging his moccasins for Mr. Searl's shoes, which he readily complied with. They then exchanged hats, after which the Indian inquired how many men Harrison had with him, and, at the same time, calling Searls a Washington or Madison, then raised his tomahawk and struck him on the shoulder, which cut into the cavity of the body. Searls then caught hold of the tomahawk and appeared to resist, and upon my telling him that his fate was inevitable, he closed his eyes and received the savage blow which terminated his existence. I was near enough to him to receive the brains and blood, after the fatal blow, on my blanket. A short time after the death of Searls, I saw three others share a similar fate. We then set out for Brownstown, which place we reached about twelve or one o'clock at night. After being exposed to several hours' incessant rain in reaching that place, we were put into the council house, the floor of which was partly covered with water, at which place we remained until the next morning, when we again received marching orders for their village on the river Rouge, which place we made that day, where I was kept six days, then taken to Detroit and sold.

Sworn statement of Dr. JOHN TODD, a surgeon in the Kentucky Volunteers:

LEXINGTON, May 2, 1818.

SIR: I received your letter some time since, relative to the disastrous affair of Frenchtown, of 23d and 24d January last. For the particulars of the action, and the terms of capitulation, I refer you to the official report of General Winchester, which is correct as far as came within my knowledge. After the capitulation, I was introduced to Colonel Proctor, the commander of the British forces and Indians, as one of the surviving surgeons, and by him was requested to attend to our wounded who were left on the ground where the action was fought. I willingly acquiesced, and Doctor Bowers, my mate, remained with me: at the same time I informed Colonel Proctor of my apprehensions for the safety of the wounded and the surgeons; he replied, "be under no apprehensions, you will be perfectly safe, I will place you under the special care of the chiefs until morning, and very early I will send conveyances for the wounded and yourself to Amherstburg." Shortly after, I was requested to ascertain the number and rank of the wounded, and in so doing was assisted by a British officer, (whose name I did not know,) to whom I likewise communicated my apprehensions of safety; he manifested some irritation at my doubts of British honor and magnanimity, and assured me protection would be afforded me. While engaged in this business, one of the rooms occupied by the wounded was crowded with the Indians who were peaceable, but one of them, who could speak English, admonished the British officer of the propriety of stationing interpreters in the houses. Upon my return from this business to the room I occupied, and which was set apart for the wounded

The committee have considered it their duty to submit the evidence collected under the ninth head, of the atrocities committed at Hampton, although these enormities have been committed since their appointment. These barbarities may be rationally considered as the consequence of the example set by the officers of the naval force on our coast. Human turpitude is always progressive, and soldiers are prepared for the perpetration of the most dreadful crimes by the commission of minor offenses with impunity. That troops who had been instigated by the example of their officers, to plunder the property and burn the houses of unarmed citizens, should proceed to rape and murder, need not excite surprise, however it may inspire horror. For every detestable violation of humanity an excuse is fabricated or found. The officers, I met, and was made acquainted with Captain Elliott, at present a British officer, who had visited Captain Hart, then wounded. Captain Hart was solicitous to be removed that evening, and Captain Elliott replied, if it was possible (and every exertion should be made) he should, and if it could not be effected that evening, early in the morning he would call for him in his own train (sleigh) and convey him to his own house in Amherstburg, where he should remain until recovered, assuring him repeatedly no danger was to be apprehended, and, if possible, he would remain with him that night.

In the afternoon Captain Elliott and every British officer left the encampment, leaving behind three interpreters. From the repeated assurances my apprehensions were quieted; for who could doubt? About one hour before daylight (for my duties required my attention nearly all the night) the interpreters suddenly disappeared. About an hour after daylight the Indians began to collect in the town, and commenced plundering the houses in which the wounded were placed, and then stripped them and myself of our clothing. At this time the room I had occupied was so crowded with Indians, and Captain Hart's wound already painful, being injured by them, I conveyed him to an adjoining house which had been plundered and was empty, where I met the Indian, (who, on the preceding day, had requested that interpreters should be left,) and he knew my rank. He inquired why the surgeons were left, and why the wounded were left? I replied, it was the wish of Colonel Proctor we should remain until he could send for us; and Captain Hart informed him Captain Elliott was a friend of his, and was to call for him that morning. He shook his head significantly, and replied they were damned rascals, or we would have been taken off the preceding day. The Indian informed me every individual would be killed, and requested me to be quiet, for the chiefs were then in council, and "may be" only the wounded would be killed. Captain Hart offered him $100 to take him to Malden. He replied, you are too badly wounded. While we were conversing one of the wounded was tomahawked at our feet. Shortly after the Indian returned and told me I was a prisoner, and must go. I was taken by the Indian to the house I had left, and there discovered that Captain Hickman and two others had, in my absence, been tomahawked, scalped, and stripped. I was tied and taken by this Indian towards Malden about four miles, when I came to the encampment of the British wounded, and met with Captain Elliott and the surgeon of the 41st regiment. Captain Elliott immediately recognized me, and inquired the cause of my situation. I informed him what had taken place, and requested him to send back immediately; that some who were badly wounded might still be alive, and could be saved, and particularly named Captain Hart, for whom he manifested much friendship. Captain Elliott replied, it is now too late; you may rest assured that those who are once taken by the Indians are safe, and will be taken to Malden, and those who are badly wounded are killed ere this. I replied, many are unable to walk, and some will be killed, after making an effort, and walking several miles, who might be saved. To which he replied, charity begins at home; my own wounded are to be conveyed first, and if any sleighs remain they shall be sent back for your wounded. My anxiety to get some person to return, in hopes of saving some of the prisoners, induced me at length to make an appeal to their avarice. The surgical instruments of the detachment were left in the room I occupied, and I informed the surgeon of their value and importance at that time; he immediately despatched an interpreter for them, who returned with the information that they were destroyed in the burning of the house, and gave additional confirmation of the massacre of the wounded. I was released from the Indians by Captain Elliott and the wounded prisoners on the Northern frontier were massacred by Indians; the sick murdered, and the women violated, at Hampton, by the foreign troops in the pay of Great Britain. These pretexts, admitting them to be true, are as disgraceful as the conduct which made a resort to them necessary. Honor and magnanimity not only forbid the soldier to perpetrate crimes, but require every exertion on his part to prevent them. If, in defiance of discipline, acts of violence are committed upon any individual entitled to protection, the exemplary punishment of the offender can alone vindicate the reputation of the nation by whom he is employed. Whether such exertions were made by the British soldiers, or the character of the British nation thus vindicated, the evidence will show.

The shrieks of the innocent victims of infernal lust at Hampton were heard by the American prisoners, but were too weak to reach the ears or disturb the repose of the British officers, whose duty, as men, required them to protect every female whom the fortune of war had thrown into their power. The surgeon. At this time my brother, who was wounded, and several others, were in possession of the Indians, who were taking them towards Malden. I requested their release, and permission for them to accompany me on foot under British protection. Captain Elliott told me it was impossible, and to be under no fears, they were safe; for he knew the fidelity of the Indians with whom they were. When the intelligence of the massacre was by me communicated to Captain Elliott and the surgeon, they appeared much exasperated, and declared it was impossible to restrain the savages. The cause he then assigned to me was, that when the Indians discovered their loss in killed and wounded, and that of the British, they started off towards our wounded, declaring they would have satisfaction, and, he continued, I was fearful of the event. During the plunder and the massacre, our wounded conducted themselves with the utmost composure and resignation, and made no resistance, which they knew would be fruitless, and destruction to all.

It was asserted by Colonel Proctor, in a conversation at Amherstburg, that the Indians had got some whiskey in the house where we were stationed, and had become intoxicated. That the Indians may have had some whiskey I shall not deny; but I think I can safely say, that they did not procure it there, and that was not the cause of the massacre; for, on the preceding days, and subsequent to the action of the 18th, I wanted some spirits, and made application to the housekeeper, who assured me there was none about the house, for it was all consumed by the British and Indians, who had quartered in the house prior to the action of the 18th; besides, the Indians showed no manifestation of drunkenness; their deliberate pilfering, and their orderly conduct throughout, was not such as would be expected from drunken Indians.

Upon my arrival at Malden, I was again solicited to take charge of the wounded; the surgery was opened to me, and I had the use of the medicines and dressings necessary, and they had as comfortable rooms as could be procured. During our stay in Malden some eight or ten of the wounded were brought in by the Indians; several made their escape who were doomed to massacre, and found protection with the inhabitants of the Territory, who brought them into Malden; and several made their escape, wandered in, and delivered themselves up at the fort. Prior to our leaving Malden one poor fellow was brought in scalped alive by the Indians, and delivered up to the British; but before I reached him death put an end to his sufferings. I frequently, and on every occasion, urged the British officers to exert themselves and procure the release of the wounded from the Indians, urging the necessity of having their wounds dressed. In a conversation on this subject with Captain Elliott, and while urging it, he replied, the Indians are excellent surgeons. The prisoners were all marched off to Sandwich, after remaining a few days at Malden, and I was called upon to know how many from their wounds were unable to march, who had aleigh furnished them, which was the case during the march to Fort George. Before I conclude, I must say, that the terms of capitulation were violated in every particular by the enemy. The wounded were not protected; private property was not held sacred; and our side arms were not restored. With a few exceptions, I was treated respectfully by the British officers, save the abuse which was lavished on my Government, and that was by no means sparingly bestowed.

committee will not dwell on this hateful subject. Human language affords no terms strong enough to express the emotions which the examination of this evidence has awakened; they rejoice that these acts have appeared so incredible to the American people. And for the honor of human nature they deeply regret that the evidence so clearly establishes their truth. In the correspondence between the commander of the American and British forces will be found what is equivalent to an admission of the facts by the British commander. The committee have yet to learn that the punishment of the offenders has followed the conviction of their guilt. The power of retaliation being vested by law in the Executive Magistrate, no measure is considered necessary to be proposed; but the resolution annexed to this report.

As such enormities, instead of inspiring terror as was probably intended, are, in the opinion of the committee, calculated to produce a contrary effect, they submit for the consideration of the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States

Sworn statement of ALBERT AMMERMAN, a private in the Kentucky Volunteers:

STATE OF KENTUCKY, }

Pendleton County, in the town of Falmouth, }

On the 21st day of April, 1818, I, Albert Ammerman, a private of Captain Glave's company, of the first regiment of Kentucky volunteer militia, being wounded in the battle of the 18th January last, at the river Raisin, by a ball in the flesh of the thigh; and from the window of the house which was appropriated for an hospital, was a witness to the battle of the 22d of the same month. And after the surrender, I being but slightly wounded, proposed marching with the rest of the prisoners, and was prevented by the order of a British officer, who said that a guard would be left to take care of the wounded, and carryalls would be sent for them to ride into Malden on the next morning. But to my astonishment no guard was left, and about sunrise on the morning of the 23d, a party of Indians returned to the hospital, and the first Indian that came to the room I was lodged in could speak the English language. He was asked by one of the wounded, what was to be done with the wounded. He replied, they were all to be killed that could not walk; and shortly after a general massacre commenced. I instantly put on my knapsack and went out of the house; my knapsack was demanded by an Indian at the door, to whom I gave it. He conducted me to a log some little distance from the house, on which I sat down, where I witnessed the butchery of many of my fellow-citizens, sufferers by the tomahawk and scalping knife, and, to finish the scene, set fire to the houses occupied by the wounded prisoners; many of them, struggling in the arms of death, put their heads out of the windows whilst enveloped in smoke and flames. After this bloody work was finished, I was marched off in the direction towards Brownstown, by an Indian, and when about half a mile from Frenchtown on our way, was overtaken by two Indians who had Captain Hart in custody, mounted on a horse. As they approached nearly to us, I noticed they were speaking loud and animated as if in a quarrel, but not understanding their language, did not understand what passed between them, but think it was probable that the quarrel was occasioned respecting one hundred dollars which I understood Captain Hart had given to one of the Indians aforesaid to convey him to Fort Malden. The quarrel appeared to grow very warm, so much so that the Indians took aim at each other with their guns; and, as if to settle the dispute, it appeared to me as if they had mutually agreed to kill Captain Hart, and plunder him of the rest of his money and effects, which they did, by taking him off his horse, then knocked him down with a war club, scalped and tomahawked him, and stripped him naked, leaving his body on the ground. I was gratified in observing that, during this scene of trial, Captain Hart refrained from supplication or entreaty, but appeared perfectly calm and collected. He met his fate with that firmness which was his particular characteristic. No other prisoner of our army of the United States was present to witness this melancholy scene—the death of Captain Hart. During my captivity with the Indians, five days only, I was treated with more hospitality than I had any reason to expect; much more so than I experienced from the British, after I was ransomed at Detroit, by Mr. Benjamin Chittenden, who will ever be entitled to my utmost gratitude; by him I was humanely treated, and also by some of the French Canadians.

be requested to have collected and presented to this House, during the continuance of the present war, evidence of every departure by the enemy from the ordinary modes of conducting war among civilized nations.

The resolution was agreed to, and a committee appointed to present the same to the President.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, 5,000 copies of said report were ordered to be printed for the use of the members.

MONDAY, August 2.

Adjournment.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate, having completed the Legislative business before them, are now ready to adjourn; and they have appointed a committee on their part to wait on the President of the United States, and to inquire of him whether he has any further communications to make to Congress at the present session.

Mr. DAWSON and Mr. GROSVENOR were appointed of the above-mentioned joint committee, on the part of the House.

Soon after, Mr. DAWSON reported that the committee had performed that service, and that the President answered that he had no further communications to make.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House is now ready to adjourn, and that the clerk do go with the said message.

The Clerk accordingly went with the said message; and, having returned, the Speaker adjourned the House until the first Monday in December next.

CONFIDENTIAL SUPPLEMENTAL JOURNAL

OF SUCH PROCEEDINGS OF THE FIRST SESSION OF THE THIRTEENTH CONGRESS, AS, DURING THE TIME THEY WERE DEPENDING, WERE ORDERED TO BE KEPT SECRET, AND RESPECTING WHICH THE INJUNCTION OF SECRECY WAS AFTERWARDS TAKEN OFF BY ORDER OF THE HOUSE.

THURSDAY, July 15, 1813.

The following preamble and resolution was submitted by Mr. STUART for consideration:

Whereas the Seat of the General Government, from the unprepared and defenceless state of the District of Columbia, is in imminent danger, if an attack should be made thereon: And whereas the fleet of the enemy is understood to be within a few hours' sail of the Capitol: And whereas the immense value of public property exposed to destruction, the great value of the public records, and other deeply interesting considerations, render it peculiarly important that any invasion of the Metropolis should be met with vigor and successfully repelled: Whereupon,

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, a distribution of such arms as are in the possession of the Government, within the District of Columbia, should be immediately made, to be placed in the hands of all able-bodied men within the District, willing to be embodied to perform military duty; and also in the hands of such members of this House as may be willing to receive them, to act against the enemy in any manner not incompatible with their public duties.

A question was taken, whether the subject-matter of the said proposition requires secrecy in discussion, and passed in the affirmative.

A motion was then made by Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, that the said proposition do lie on the table. And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 64, nays 74.

A motion was made by Mr. GHOLSON to amend the said proposition by striking out the preamble. And the question being taken it passed in the affirmative.

A motion was then made by Mr. BURWELL, that the said proposition, as amended, be committed to the Committee on Military Affairs.

And the question being taken, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 74, nays 44.

British Licenses.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which was read, and is as follows:

[CONFIDENTIAL.]

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

There being sufficient ground to infer that it is the purpose of the enemy to combine, with the blockade of our ports, special licenses to neutral vessels, or to British vessels in neutral disguises, whereby they may draw from our country the precise kind and quantity of exports essential to their wants, whilst its general commerce remains obstructed; keeping in view, also, the insidious discrimination between different ports of the United States; and as such a system, if not counteracted, will have the effect of diminishing very materially the pressure of the war on the enemy, and encouraging a perseverance in it, at the same time that it will leave the general commerce of the United States under all the pressure the enemy can impose, thus subjecting the whole to British regulation, in subserviency to British monopoly: I recommend to the consideration of Congress, the expediency of an immediate and effectual prohibition of exports, limited to a convenient day in their next session, and removable, in the mean time, in the event of a cessation of the blockade of our ports.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, July 20, 1813.

A question was taken whether the subject-matter of the said Message required secrecy; and passed in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the said Message be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

WEDNESDAY, July 21.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, received yesterday, made a report; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said report; and, after some time spent therein, the Speaker resumed the Chair, and Mr. KENNEDY reported that the committee had had the said report under consideration, and agreed to the same, with an amendment; which was read at the Clerk's table, and concurred in by the House.

The said report, as amended, is as follows:

Resolved, That it would be expedient to adopt the measures submitted by the Message to the consideration of the House."

A long debate took place on the adoption of this amendment. Mr. CLAY, and Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, spoke in favor of the amendment, and the policy of the measure. Mr. CALHOUN spoke in defence of the report of the committee, and in opposition to an embargo; as did, also, Mr. DUVALL, of Kentucky, Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, Mr. HANSON, Mr. GEORVENOR, and others.

The question was then taken, to concur in the said report as amended, and passed in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 51.

Ordered, That the said report be committed to Mr. GRUNDY, Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. BIBB, and Mr. FISK, with instructions to report a bill in conformity thereto.

THURSDAY, July 22.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the committee appointed yesterday, reported a bill laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States; which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

The question was taken, "Shall the bill be the order of the day to-morrow?" and was determined in the negative—yeas 56, nays 79.

The said bill was then made the order for this day.

And the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. NELSON reported that the Committee had had the bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where they were again read, and concurred in by the House.

The question was then taken that the said bill be engrossed and read the third time; and passed in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 56.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time to-day, and accordingly was read the third time, when a motion was made by Mr. PITKIN that the said bill be postponed indefinitely; and the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

The question was then put, "Shall the bill pass?" And passed in the affirmative—yeas 80, nays 50.

Ordered, That the title be, "An act laying an embargo on all the ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," and that Mr. GRUNDY and Mr. ROBERTSON be appointed a committee to carry the said bill to the Senate, and inform them that the House have passed the same, in confidence, and ask their concurrence therein.

THURSDAY, July 29.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. CAMPBELL and Mr. VARNUM, their committee:

Mr. Speaker: The Senate do not concur in the bill passed by the House of Representatives, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States."

A motion was made by Mr. WRIGHT, that the injunction of secrecy imposed upon the proceedings of this House on the Message of the President of the United States of the 20th instant, be removed.

And the question being taken thereon, it passed in the affirmative.

DECEMBER, 1818.]

President's Message.

[SENATE.]

THIRTEENTH CONGRESS.—SECOND SESSION.

BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, DECEMBER 6, 1818.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.

MONDAY, December 6, 1818.

The Second Session of the Thirteenth Congress commenced this day at the city of Washington, conformably to the act passed the 27th of July last, entitled "An act fixing the time for the next meeting of Congress," and the Senate assembled in their Chamber.

PRESENT.

NICHOLAS GILMAN and JEREMIAH MASON, from New Hampshire.

JOSEPH B. VARNUM, from Massachusetts.

JONATHAN ROBINSON and DUDLEY CHACE, from Vermont.

JOHN LAMBERT, from New Jersey.

MICHAEL LEIB and ABNER LACOCK, from Pennsylvania.

OUTERBRIDGE HORSEY, from Delaware.

SAMUEL SMITH, from Maryland.

WILLIAM B. GILES and RICHARD BRENT, from Virginia.

JAMES TURNER, from North Carolina.

JOHN GALLARD and JOHN TAYLOR, from South Carolina.

CHARLES TAIT, from Georgia.

JESSE BLEDSOE, from Kentucky.

JOSEPH ANDERSON, from Tennessee.

THOMAS WORTHINGTON and JEREMIAH MOREW, from Ohio.

JAMES BROWN and ELEGIUS FROMENTIN, from Louisiana.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the Senate proceeded to the election of a President pro tempore, as the constitution provides; and JOSEPH B. VARNUM was appointed.

WILLIAM WYATT BIBE, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Georgia, in place of WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, resigned, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that a quorum is assembled, and are ready to proceed to business.

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States and acquaint him that the Senate have, in the absence of the VICE PRESIDENT, elected JOSEPH B. VARNUM their President pro tempore.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives is assembled, and that the House is ready to proceed to business. The House have appointed a committee on their part, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

The Senate concurred in the appointment of a joint committee on their part, agreeably to the resolution last mentioned; and Messrs. ROBINSON and BRENT were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

After passing the usual resolutions for the supply of newspapers, &c., the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 7.

DAVID DAGGETT, from the State of Connecticut, and JEREMIAH B. HOWELL, from the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, severally took their seats in the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON reported, from the Joint Committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, and that the President informed the committee that he would make a communication to the two Houses this day at 12 o'clock.

President's Message.

The following Message was then received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

In meeting you at the present interesting conjuncture, it would have been highly satisfactory if I could have communicated a favorable result to the mission charged with negotiations for restoring peace. It was a just expectation from the respect due to the distinguished Sovereign who had invited them by his offer of mediation; from the readiness with which the invitation was accepted on the part of the United States and from the pledge to be found in an act of their Legislature for the liberality which their plenipotentiaries would carry into the negotiations, that no time would be lost by the British Government in embracing the experiment for hastening a stop to the effusion of blood. A prompt and cordial acceptance of the mediation on that side was the less to be doubted, as it was of a nature not to submit rights or pretensions on either side to the decision of an umpire; but to afford merely an opportunity, honorable and desirable to both, for discussing, and, if possible, adjusting them, for the interest of both.

The British Cabinet, either mistaking our desire of peace for a dread of British power, or misled by other fallacious calculations, has disappointed this reasonable anticipation. No communications from our Envoys having reached us, no information on the subject has been received from that source. But it is known that the mediation was declined in the first instance, and there is no evidence, notwithstanding the lapse of time, that a change of disposition in the British Councils has taken place, or is to be expected.

Under such circumstances, a nation, proud of its rights, and conscious of its strength, has no choice but an exertion of the one in support of the other.

To this determination, the best encouragement is derived from the success with which it has pleased the Almighty to bless our arms, both on the land and on the water.

Whilst proofs have been continued of the enterprise and skill of our cruisers, public and private, on the ocean, and a new trophy gained in the capture of a British by an American vessel of war, after an action giving celebrity to the name of the victorious commander, the great inland waters, on which the enemy were also to be encountered, have presented achievements of our naval arms, as brilliant in their character as they have been important in their consequences.

On Lake Erie, the squadron under command of Captain Perry, having met the British squadron of superior force, a sanguinary conflict ended in the capture of the whole. The conduct of that officer, adroit as it was daring, and which was so well seconded by his comrades, justly entitles them to the admiration and gratitude of their country, and will fill an early page in its naval annals, with a victory never surpassed in lustre, however much it may have been in magnitude.

On Lake Ontario, the caution of the British commander, favored by contingencies, frustrated the efforts of the American commander to bring on a decisive action. Captain Chauncey was able, however, to establish an ascendancy on that important theatre; and to prove, by the manner in which he effected every thing possible, that opportunities only were wanted, for a more shining display of his own talents and the gallantry of those under his command.

The success on Lake Erie having opened a passage to the territory of the enemy, the officer commanding the Northwestern army transferred the war thither, and, rapidly pursuing the hostile troops fleeing with their savage associates, forced a general action, which quickly terminated in the capture of the British, and dispersion of the savage force.

This result is signally honorable to Major General Harrison, by whose military talents it was prepared; to Colonel Johnson and his mounted volunteers, whose impetuous onset gave a decisive blow to the ranks of the enemy; and to the spirit of the volunteer militia, equally brave and patriotic, who bore an interesting part in the scene; more especially to the Chief Magistrate of Kentucky,* at the head of them, whose heroism, signalized in the war which established the independence of his country, sought, at an advanced age, a share in the hardships and battles for maintaining its rights and its safety.

The effect of these successes has been to rescue the inhabitants of Michigan from their oppressions, aggravated by gross infractions of the capitulation which subjected them to a foreign power; to alienate the savages of numerous tribes from the enemy, by whom they were disappointed and abandoned; and to relieve an extensive region of country from a merciless warfare which desolated its frontiers, and imposed on its citizens the most harassing services.

In consequence of our naval superiority on Lake Ontario, and the opportunity afforded by it for concentrating our forces by water, operations, which had been provisionally planned, were set on foot against the possessions of the enemy on the St. Lawrence. Such, however, was the delay produced, in the first instance, by adverse weather, of unusual violence and continuance, and such the circumstances attending the final movements of the army, that the prospect, at one time so favorable, was not realized.

The cruelty of the enemy in enlisting the savages into a war with a nation desirous of mutual emulation in mitigating its calamities, has not been confined to any one quarter. Wherever they could be turned against us, no exertions to effect it have been spared. On our Southwestern border, the Creek tribes, who, yielding to our persevering endeavors, were gradually acquiring more civilized habits, became the unfortunate victims of seduction. A war in that quarter has been the consequence, infuriated by a bloody fanaticism, recently propagated among them. It was necessary to crush such a war before it could spread among the contiguous tribes, and before it could favor enterprises of the enemy into that vicinity. With this view, a force was called into the service of the United States from the States of Georgia and Tennessee, which, with the nearest regular troops, and other corps, from the Mississippi Territory, might not only chastise the savages into present peace, but make a lasting impression on their fears.

The progress of the expedition, as far as is yet known, corresponds with the martial zeal with which it was espoused; and the best hopes of a satisfactory issue are authorized by the complete success with which a well-planned enterprise was executed against a body of hostile savages, by a detachment of the volunteer militia of Tennessee, under the gallant command of General Coffee; and by a still more important victory over a larger body of them, gained under the immediate command of Major General Jackson, an officer equally distinguished for his patriotism and his military talents.

The systematic perseverance of the enemy in courting the aid of the savages in all quarters, had the natural effect of kindling their ordinary propensity to war into a passion, which, even among those best disposed towards the United States, was ready, if not employed on our side, to be turned against us. A departure from our protracted forbearance to accept the services tendered by them, has thus been forced upon us. But, in yielding to it, the retaliation has been mitigated as much as possible, both in its extent and in its character, stopping far short of the example of the enemy, who owe the advantages they have occasionally gained in battle, chiefly to the number of their savage associates; and who have not controlled them either from their usual practice of indiscriminate massacre on defenceless inhabitants, or from scenes of carnage without a parallel, on prisoners to the British arms, guarded by all the laws of humanity and honorable war. For these enormities the enemy are equally responsible, whether with the power to prevent them, they want the will, or, with the knowledge of the want of power, they still avail themselves of such instruments. In other respects, the enemy are pursuing a course which threatens consequences most afflicting to humanity.

President's Message.

A standing law of Great Britain naturalizes, as is well known, all aliens complying with conditions limited to a shorter period than those required by the United States; and naturalized subjects are, in war, employed by her Government in common with native subjects. In a contiguous British province, regulations promulgated since the commencement of the war, compel citizens of the United States being there under certain circumstances to bear arms; whilst, of the native emigrants from the United States, who compose much of the population of the province, a number have actually borne arms against the United States within their limits; some of whom, after having done so, have become prisoners of war, and are now in our possession. The British commander in that province, nevertheless, with the sanction, it appears, of his Government, thought proper to select from American prisoners of war, and send to Great Britain for trial as criminals, a number of individuals, who had emigrated from the British dominions long prior to the state of war between the two nations, who had incorporated themselves into our political society, in the modes recognized by the law and the practice of Great Britain, and who were made prisoners of war, under the banners of their adopted country, fighting for its rights and its safety.

The protection due to these citizens requiring an effectual interposition in their behalf, a like number of British prisoners of war were put into confinement, with a notification that they would experience whatever violence might be committed on the American prisoners of war sent to Great Britain.

It was hoped that this necessary consequence of the step unadvisedly taken on the part of Great Britain would have led her Government to reflect on the inconsistencies of its conduct, and that a sympathy with the British, if not with the American sufferers, would have arrested the cruel career opened by its example.

This was unhappily not the case. In violation both of consistency and humanity, American officers and non-commissioned officers, in double the number of the British soldiers confined here, were ordered into close confinement, with formal notice that, in the event of a retaliation for the death which might be inflicted on the prisoners of war sent to Great Britain for trial, the officers so confined would be put to death also. It was notified, at the same time, that the commanders of the British fleets and armies on our coasts are instructed, in the same event, to proceed with a destructive severity against our towns and their inhabitants.

That no doubt might be left with the enemy of our adherence to the retaliatory resort imposed on us, a correspondent number of British officers, prisoners of war in our hands, were immediately put into close confinement, to abide the fate of those confined by the enemy; and the British Government has been apprised of the determination of this Government, to retaliate any other proceedings against us, contrary to the legitimate modes of warfare.

It is as fortunate for the United States that they have it in their power to meet the enemy in this deplorable contest, as it is honorable to them that they do not join in it but under the most imperious obligations, and with the humane purpose of effectuating a return to the established usages of war.

The views of the French Government on the subjects which have been so long committed to negotiation have received no elucidation since the close of your late session. The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris had not been enabled, by proper opportunities, to press the objects of his mission, as prescribed by his instructions.

To give to our vessels of war, public and private, the requisite advantage in their cruises, it is of much importance that they should have, both for themselves and their prizes, the use of the ports and markets of friendly powers. With this view, I recommend to Congress the expediency of, such legal provisions as may supply the defects or remove the doubts of the Executive authority to allow to the cruisers of other powers at war with enemies of the United States, such use of the American ports as may correspond with the privileges allowed by such powers to American cruisers.

The attacks of the enemy on Craney Island, on Fort Meigs, on Sackett's Harbor, and on Sandusky, have been vigorously and successfully repulsed; nor have they, in any case, succeeded on either frontier, excepting when directed against the peaceable dwellings of individuals, or villages, unprepared or undefended.

On the other hand, the movements of the American army have been followed by the reduction of York, and of Forts George, Erie, and Malden, by the recovery of Detroit, and the extinction of the Indian war in the West, and by the occupancy or command of a large portion of Upper Canada. Battles have also been fought on the borders of the St. Lawrence, which, though not accomplishing their entire objects, reflect honor on the discipline and prowess of our soldiery, the best auguries of eventual victory. In the same scale are to be placed the late successes in the South, over one of the most powerful, which had become one of the most hostile also, of the Indian tribes.

If the war has increased the interruptions of our commerce, it has, at the same time, cherished and multiplied our manufactures, so as to make us independent of all other countries for the more essential branches, for which we ought to be dependent on none; and is even rapidly given them an extent which will create additional staples in our future intercourse with foreign markets.

If much treasure has been expended, no inconsiderable portion of it has been applied to objects durable in their value, and necessary to our permanent safety.

If the war has exposed us to increased spoliations on the ocean, and to predatory incursions on the land, it has developed the national means of retaliating the former, and of providing protection against the latter; demonstrating to all, that every blow aimed at our maritime independence is an impulse accelerating the growth of our maritime power.

By diffusing through the mass of the nation the elements of military discipline and instruction, by augmenting and distributing warlike preparations, applicable to future use; by evincing the seal and valor with which they will be employed, and the cheerfulness with which every necessary burden will be borne, a greater respect for our rights, and a longer duration of our future peace, are promised, than could be expected without these proofs of the national character and resources.

The war has proved, moreover, that our free Government, like other free Governments, though slow in its early movements, acquires in its progress a force proportioned to its freedom; and that the Union of these States, the guardian of the freedom and safety of all and of each, is strengthened by every occasion that puts it to the test.

In fine, the war, with its vicissitudes, is illustrating the capacity and the destiny of the United States to be a great, a flourishing, and a powerful nation, worthy of the friendship which it is disposed to cultivate with all others; and authorized, by its own example, to require from all an observance of the laws of justice and reciprocity. Beyond these their claims have never extended; and, in contending for these, we behold a subject for our congratulations, in the daily testimony of increasing harmony throughout the nation, and may humbly repose our trust in the smiles of Heaven on so righteous a cause.

Trading with the Enemy.

The injunction of secrecy respecting a confidential Message of the President of the United States of the 9th instant, together with the proceedings of the Senate thereon, having been removed, they are here inserted.

[CONFIDENTIAL.]

THURSDAY, December 9.

The following confidential Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The tendency of our commercial and navigation laws, in their present state, to favor the enemy and thereby prolong the war, is more and more developed by experience. Supplies of the most essential kinds find their way not only to British ports and British armies at a distance, but the armies in our neighborhood, with which our own are contending, derive from our ports and outlets a subsistence attainable with difficulty, if at all, from other sources. Even the fleets and troops infesting our coasts and waters, are, by like supplies, accommodated and encouraged in their predatory and incursive warfare.

Abuses having a like tendency take place in our import trade. British fabrics and products find their way into our ports under the name and from the ports of other countries, and often in British vessels disguised as neutrals by false colors and papers.

To these abuses it may be added, that illegal importations are openly made, with advantage to the violators of the law, produced by undervaluations or other circumstances involved in the course of the judicial proceedings against them.

It is found, also, that the practice of ransoming is a cover for collusive capture, and a channel for intelligence advantageous to the enemy.

To remedy, as much as possible, those evils, I recommend—

That an effectual embargo on exports be immediately enacted:

That all articles known to be derived, either not at all, or in an immaterial degree only, from the productions of any other country than Great Britain, and particularly the extensive articles made of wool and cotton materials, and ardent spirits made from the cane, be expressly and absolutely prohibited, from whatever port or place, or in whatever vessels the same may be brought into the United States; and that all violations of the non-importation act be subjected to adequate penalties:

That, among the proofs of the neutral and national character of foreign vessels, it be required that the masters and supercargoes, and three-fourths at least of the crews, be citizens or subjects of the country under whose flag the vessels sail:

That all persons concerned in collusive captures by the enemy, or in ransoming vessels or their cargoes from the enemy, be subjected to adequate penalties.

To shorten as much as possible the duration of the war, it is indispensable that the enemy should feel all the pressure that can be given to it, and the restraints having that tendency will be borne with the greater cheerfulness by all good citizens, as the restraints will affect those most who are most ready to

DECEMBER 9, 1813.

JAMES MADISON.

The Message was read, and referred to the committee this day appointed on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to our Foreign Relations, with leave to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

MONDAY, December 13.

Mr. BIBB, from the committee appointed the 9th instant on the subject, reported, in part, a bill laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States; which was in part read.

A confidential message was received from the House of Representatives, by Messrs. GRUNDY and LEWIS, two of their members; Mr. GRUNDY, Chairman:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill (in confidence) "laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, December 15.

The Embargo.

Mr. BIBB, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was recommitteed the bill, entitled "An act laying an embargo on ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," reported amendments to the fourth section; and the bill and amendments were considered as in Committee of the Whole; and the bill having been further amended, the amendments were agreed to.

On the question, "Shall the bill be read a third time, as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb of Georgia, Bledsoe, Brent, Campbell, Chace, Gaillard, Giles, Howell, Lacock, Leib, Morrow, Robinson, Smith, Stone, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, and Worthington.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, German, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, and Wells.

THURSDAY, December 16.

The Embargo.

Mr. FROMENTIN, from the committee, reported the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended.

Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, rose, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: Knowing that the advocates of the bill under consideration are averse to a full discussion of its merits, and that a speedy decision is determined on, I do not intend to trespass a long time on your patience. But believing this measure to be pregnant with consequences the most pernicious to our country, I cannot permit it to pass without entering against it my solemn protest. You are about to change the daily occupations, and destroy the means of a subsistence, of a vast portion of your population.

The evil complained of is, that our enemy obtains from this country supplies of provisions essential for the subsistence of his fleets and armies. To remedy this, the bill prohibits all exports of every kind. Why does the prohibition extend to any commodities other than provisions? Or, at most, to such as may, in some way, be useful to his fleets or armies? The object is said to be to distress our enemy, and disable him to carry on the war. It is important to inquire, who will be most injured, our enemies or ourselves? For if, on examination, it should be found that the loss and injury will fall mostly on our citizens, a wise and dispassionate Legislature will find no sufficient inducement to assent to the bill, in the apparently consolatory reflection in the President's Message, "that the restraints will affect those most who are most ready to sacrifice the interests of their country in pursuit of their own." To determine what will be the effect on our enemy, we must know his wants, and to what degree they are relieved by supplies from this country. We have no evidence, nor even an estimate, of the quantity of provisions which the enemy obtains from our country. Had he obtained such supplies to a great amount, it would seem the Government must have some evidence of the facts. If the Government does possess such evidence, it is to be regretted that it has not been laid before the Legislature. Destitute of evidence, we are obliged to act on conjecture.

The enemy is supposed to have obtained from this country supplies, consisting principally of flour for his troops in the West Indies and at Halifax. These supplies must have gone mostly through the medium of neutrals. Existing laws prohibit, under heavy penalties, all trading with the enemy. Few, if any, prosecutions have been instituted on those laws. It is to be presumed, therefore, that our citizens have not often transgressed them. The scarcity of provisions at the places mentioned may be judged of by their prices, which, during the past summer, have not been unusually high. Flour has also been exported to Spain and Portugal, but this is mostly for the use of the inhabitants. The allied armies are removed too far into the interior of the country to draw their supplies from Lisbon and Cadiz, the places to which our flour is chiefly carried. I trust it does not enter into the policy of the Government to distress any portion of the Spanish people, except what is in arms against France.

That the necessities of the enemy are urgent, is rendered almost incredible by the fact, that he exerts his utmost power to prevent supplies going from this country. A rigorous blockade was last spring instituted, and has ever since been enforced on the ports from which our provisions were usually exported in the greatest quantities. Discovering that the article of flour began to find its way out of the country, through Long Island Sound, he has lately extended the blockade to all that coast. Can we suppose the enemy anxious to obtain provisions, or other produce of this country, while he thus throws every obstacle in his power in the way of their getting to him?

Honors to Captain Perry, Lieutenants Barrows and McCall.

But it has been urged, and seems to be relied on, as the strongest reason in favor of the bill, that the hostile ships and squadrons on our coast draw from the country necessary supplies, which they could not otherwise obtain. Here again, in the absence of all evidence, we must rely on conjecture. It is well known, that foreign salted provisions are not often permitted to be used on board British ships of war. The supplies from this country for their ships are said to consist mostly of fresh provisions and breadstuffs. The former are supposed to have been obtained partly by force and partly by purchase. The quantities of either of these articles thus obtained are wholly uncertain. A person voluntarily furnishing supplies to the enemy, under certain circumstances, is guilty of treason; under any circumstances, he is guilty of a great misdemeanor, and liable to heavy penalties. While exposed to such perils, is it to be presumed that our citizens have furnished supplies in large quantities? That would be to suppose, not only the highest degree of depravity, but also a carelessness and negligence of self-preservation. If such crimes have been committed, why has not punishment followed? If the present laws will not restrain our citizens, what better hopes can be entertained from that now proposed? Suppose the bill to operate as favorably as its friends can expect, would it, in any considerable degree, produce the desired effects? While our seacoasts remain wholly unprotected, the hostile ships may always obtain by force a partial supply of vegetables and fresh provisions. Even breadstuffs may in that manner be obtained from certain parts of our coasts in considerable quantities. Nor can it be believed that this bill will entirely prevent all trade with the enemy's ships. Our prohibition of the exportation of flour and other produce, will, of course, greatly depress their prices at home. This will operate as a premium to supply the enemy in violation of the law. By our utmost exertions we shall not be able to prevent the hostile ships obtaining supplies, and partly from our shores. The most we can expect to do is, to enhance the prices at which they may be obtained. This will be more than balanced by lessening the number of ships which it will be necessary for the enemy to keep on our coast. A great portion of these are now employed in enforcing the blockade. Our embargo, together with a prohibition of importations, the other part of the system recommended by the President, strictly enforced, will completely effect the objects of the blockading squadrons; a few single ships will probably remain to take care that we faithfully execute our own laws, while the rest will be employed in predatory expeditions, or in other and more honorable service, in looking after our frigates. It is not probable, therefore, that the operation of the bill will even increase the expense to the enemy of maintaining on our coasts the ships necessary for his purpose. But suppose we should be able to do this to a certain degree. Suppose the enemy should find it necessary to keep the usual number of ships of war on our coast, and that we could increase the expense of the supplies of provisions now obtained from our shores to double the amount of their present prices—would this induce him to withdraw his squadrons from our waters?

When Mr. MASON had concluded, the question was taken, "Shall this bill pass as amended?" and was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 14.

MONDAY, December 20.

On motion, by Mr. BIRB, that the injunction of secrecy on the proceedings of the Senate in respect to the bill, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," be removed, a motion was made by Mr. WELLS, to amend the motion. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy on the Message of the President of the United States of the 9th instant, and also on the proceedings of the Senate in respect to the bill, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," be removed.

TUESDAY, December 28.

Encouragement to Privateers.

Mr. FROMENTIN submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States, as relates to the Navy of the United States, be directed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for an increase of the bounty allowed to the owners, officers, and crews of the private armed vessels of the United States, and likewise into the expediency of allowing the same bounty to the officers and crews of the public ships of the United States.

THURSDAY, December 30.

Honors to Captain Perry.

The resolutions expressive of the sense of Congress of the gallant conduct of Captain Oliver H. Perry, the officers, seamen, marines, and infantry acting as such, on board of his squadron, were read the second time. On the question, "Shall these resolutions be engrossed, and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative.

ment of Lieutenants Burrows and McCall was read the second time. On the question, "Shall this resolution be engrossed, and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative.

WEDNESDAY, January 5, 1814.

Honors to Capt. Lawrence.

The resolution relative to the brilliant achievement of Captain James Lawrence, in the capture of the British vessel of war the Peacock, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and sundry amendments having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the resolution to the House amended accordingly.

On the question, "Shall it be read a third time as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative.

The amendments to the resolution relative to the brilliant achievements of Captain James Lawrence in the capture of the British vessel of war the Peacock, having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, it was read a third time by consent.

TUESDAY, January 11.

JOHN CONDICT, from the State of New Jersey, attended.

MONDAY, January 17.

Relief to Nantucket.

On motion, by Mr. ROBINSON, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the purpose of procuring subsistence for the inhabitants of Nantucket, Martha's Vineyard, Block Island, and the adjacent Islands thereto, together with the amendments reported by the select committee; and having agreed to the amendments, and further amended the bill, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly.

On the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative, yeas 18, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Brent, Brown, Campbell, Chace, Condict, German, Howell, Lacock, Leib, Morrow, Robinson, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, and Worthington.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bibb of Georgia, Daggett, Fromentin, Goldsborough, Gore, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, and Wells.

Bounty for Enlistment.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to increase the bounty to be allowed to persons who shall enlist in the army of the United States, and to promote the recruiting service.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: I would with pleasure obey the admonition of the honorable Senator from Georgia, (Mr. BIBB,) who has just taken his seat, if after the bold discussion which this subject has undergone, I did not feel myself imperiously called on to justify the vote I shall give. His admonition comes too late; we have progressed beyond the point of return, and we stand pledged in the view of the nation to answer for our conduct.

If we contrast the bounty proposed to be given by this bill, with that which has formerly been given, we shall be astonished at the great disparity between them. Hitherto the men enlisted, for five years or during the war, have had sixteen dollars bounty and one hundred and sixty acres of land. Those who enlisted for twelve or eighteen months, had the sixteen dollars without the land—and the last year an act of Congress gave those who enlisted for five years, or during the war, the increased advantage of three months' pay in advance, which amounted to twenty-four dollars in addition to the former sixteen. If we extend our view further, the contrast will be more striking. In Great Britain, the country of our enemy, the usual bounty is about a guinea a man, and on the Continent of Europe it does not exceed two dollars; whilst we are giving from one hundred to one hundred and twenty dollars bounty, eight dollars extra fee, and a total exemption from militia duty to any one who will procure a recruit; with from one hundred and sixty to three hundred and twenty acres of land at the end of the service. What nation can stand under such extravagance as this? What country can possibly carry on an efficient warfare for any time upon such terms?

But, sir, there is a consideration which may not be altogether unworthy of attention; how far this extravagant use of the public money in raising an army may have a prejudicial effect upon your navy. If we give this enormous bounty for the land service, will it not be just as well as necessary, to give a corresponding bounty for the sea service? Or will you exalt the one and depress the other? Will you depress that service which, when the honor of the nation languished on the shore, bore it in triumph o'er the main, unsullied by reproach, and on which you must ultimately depend, when a better policy bears sway, efficiently to contend with every foreign foe? I hope not, sir. If you should increase the bounty now contemplated it will be irrevocably fixed; you can never diminish it; you can never expect again to enlist another soldier for a less premium. You will then, sir, have the further difficulty of adjusting so prodigal an expenditure of the public money to the necessities of a Treasury filled exclusively by loans and taxes. I well remember the sentiment of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. BLEDSOE,) who said that when the national rights were in contest, he would not count the cost. Sir, I honor the feelings that dictate such a sentiment, and the only reply I can make to it is, that statesmen must calculate as well as feel.

Mr. WELLS rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President, the bill before us is for filling up the present establishment of the army; and proposes to effect this purpose, by giving a very extraordinary bounty to each recruit hereafter entering the service.

I am at a loss to determine by what rule any of the bounties, which have been talked of upon this occasion, have been governed. None of them bear any reasonable proportion to the sum allowed at present by law. The bounty established by law is only sixteen dollars. Nominally it is more; but the excess is only an advance of pay. The proposed bounties go still further beyond what is usually allowed for this purpose in other countries.

A bounty in land is liable, in my mind, to two objections. It will create a fund for speculation; and, taking up a good deal of the labor of the country, will transfer a larger part of it, at the conclusion of the war, to the Western States. At the end of the war, I could wish to see our laborers who are temporarily detached from us, returned to the districts from which they were drawn. And besides, if the object be simply to fill up the army, and is unconnected, as I am bound to presume it is, with any favorite local policies, which can only be promoted at the expense of particular interests, the surest way to obtain your soldiers is to pay them down at once the bounty they are to have. You would get their service, in this way, at a fairer and cheaper rate to the public than in any other.

I do not mean, however, to say, when I am objecting to the enormity of the proposed gratuities, that some increase of the present established bounty is not necessary. A state of things, in this country, is brought about, which ought to have been within the foresight of those who precipitated us into this war. It is certainly true, as has been well observed, that a population thinly spread over a great expanse of country, accustomed to convenient interchanges by water, requiring but little labor to transport its heaviest products, is suddenly obliged to transfer this operation to land conveyance; which, of course, has absorbed, if I may be allowed the term, much of the labor of the country. It is equally true that the almost total exclusion of foreign merchandise from our markets, by occasioning an extensive demand for our own manufactures, has produced an additional absorption of labor. From the remaining stock of labor the supplies for your army are to be drawn after the other concerns of this country are provided for.

That by these competitions the difficulty of enlisting your army is in no small degree increased, I am willing to admit. But I am far from being prepared to say, that the inefficiency of this country for war is such as to justify the prescription of such bounties as are now proposed to be given. Much, however, perhaps every thing material in relation to this subject of bounty, depends upon the kind of war you wage. It is the first inquiry, sir, the recruit will make of you—and according to the answer you give him, will be the price he will ask you —“Am I to march to Canada?” If you tell him that there the service is to be performed which you require of him, if he does not turn his heel upon you, he will ask you fully the price now proposed to be given to him. But ask him what bounty he will take to fight for his parents, for his sisters, for his wife and his children—to meet the invading foe, and repel him from his country; talk to him in this way, make an appeal of this kind to him, and he will be yours without very high bribing.

No, sir, it is not for this kind of war your soldier is to be enlisted. Not his own, but a foreign country is to be the theatre of his glory. Canada is to be that theatre. There the war is to be waged by us and not here. The bounty proves it. The price you offer shows what you want. If we establish, then, this bounty, we do virtually approve of, we do advise the war in Canada. I cannot approve of that war, I cannot advise its prosecution there. I, therefore, cannot vote for these bounties.

Bounty to Privateers.

The bill in addition to an act, entitled “An act allowing a bounty to the owners, officers, and crews, of the private armed vessels of the United States,” having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, was read a third time, and the blanks filled.

On the question, “Shall this bill pass?” it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 15, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bledsoe, Brown, Chace, Condict, Fromentin, Gaillard, Giles, Howell, Lacock, Leib, Morrow, Stone, Taylor, Varnum, and Worthington.

NAYS.—Messrs. Daggett, Dana, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, King, Lambert, Mason, and Wells.

So it was resolved that this bill pass.

Maryland Memorial.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH presented the memorial of the House of Delegates of the State of Maryland, on the awful condition of national affairs in general, and the exposed and defenceless situation in which that State in particular, has hitherto been left by the General Government, under the calamities of a war, which, with the consequent measures thereon, they highly disapprove, and earnestly entreating the national authorities to furnish them the necessary munitions and means of defence, together with a speedy reimbursement of the moneys already advanced by the State for those purposes; and that the negotiations for peace, about to be instituted, may be carried on with a just and earnest intention of bringing them to an amicable result.

[SENATE.]

In presenting the memorial, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: In obedience to the commands of the House of Delegates of Maryland, I have the honor to present to the Senate the address of that honorable body to the President and Congress of the United States.

The substance of the address, sir, is a strong and able view of the present situation of our national affairs; a faithful and emphatical description of the exposed and defenceless condition of the State; and a dignified petition, in the true spirit of the constitution, for efficient protection and defence. It sketches in glowing colors, and from comprehensive views, the leading causes of the war, and concludes with an earnest and respectful entreaty to the constituted authorities of the nation that they would avail themselves of the present auspicious moment to stay the horrors and calamities that oppress us, and once more restore to our country and its citizens the blessings of peace.

The address then being read by Mr. G., he made a motion that it should be printed.

The question was then taken on the motion to print the memorial, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, German, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Stone, and Wells.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bledsoe, Campbell, Chace, Condict, Gaillard, Giles, Howell, Lacock, Leib, Morrow, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, and Worthington.

Ayes 15, nays 15—so the question was lost.

FRIDAY, February 4.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States attended.

MONDAY, February 7.

Secretary of the Treasury.

The Senate resumed, agreeably to the order of the day, the resolution submitted by Mr. MASON on the 24th of January.

Mr. BIBB, of Georgia, said, that when these resolutions should be discussed, he believed he could show that they were out of order, and therefore not admissible; but as he was about to propose a postponement, he should not raise the question of order. Whenever, he said, it should be ascertained by the Executive that Mr. Gallatin would not speedily return, it had been in its contemplation to appoint a Secretary of the Treasury in his stead. Late circumstances had induced the impression that his speedy arrival was at least doubtful; and he believed that the Executive had determined to appoint a Secretary for the Department over which that gentleman had presided. This was a reason sufficient to induce the mover of these resolutions to consent to postpone their consideration to Monday. If a Secretary should not at that time have been nominated, the resolutions might be taken up, and Mr. B. said he would submit the question of order to which he had before adverted. But he had, on his part, no sort of doubt the alleged vacancy in the Treasury would in the mean time be filled.

Mr. MASON expressed his earnest desire that these resolutions should be taken up at an early day. The postponement to this day had been made at the suggestion of the gentleman who now moved a further postponement, and nearly for the same reasons as were now assigned. The subject Mr. M. conceived to be all important—the more so as an opinion had been publicly expressed on this floor, when a motion was made to postpone, (a day or two ago,) that the office of Secretary of the Treasury was vacant. That opinion he believed was entertained by many; and, if the fact were so, it was time that something should be done on the subject. As to the alleged intention to appoint a Secretary of the Treasury, he did not know that it ought to have weight at all—the object of his motion being to declare the constitutional law on this subject. If this motion was persisted in, Mr. M. said he must enter generally into the subject, to show why it should not prevail. As he was unwilling, however, to enter incidentally into a subject of this magnitude, if the gentleman would vary his motion to an earlier day, he would consent to the postponement.

After some conversation across the House, between Messrs. MASON and BIBB, in an undertone, Mr. BIBB varied his motion for postponement to Friday; and the motion was agreed to nem. con.

SATURDAY, February 26.

Patent Rights.

Mr. SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Isaac McPherson and others, on the subject of the patent granted to Oliver Evans, under the act of the 21st January, 1808, entitled "An act for the relief of Oliver Evans," made a report; which was read. The report is as follows:

That in the year 1787, Oliver Evans obtained from the States of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, laws vesting him with the exclusive right to use, in those States, the elevator and hopperboy, being inventions or improvements claimed to have been made by him in the process of the art of manufacturing flour. That, in the year 1790, he obtained a patent under the laws of the United States for the elevator and hopperboy and also for the screw or conductor, an additional improvement in the art, claimed also as his invention and improvement; that for fourteen years (the term of his first patent) he continued to receive, from nearly all the persons employed in the art of manufacturing flour, from thirty to forty dollars (being the prices which he then deemed sufficient) for the use of the machinery for each water wheel.

That, about three years after the expiration of his patent, to wit: in the year 1807, a suit, pending in the court of Pennsylvania, was decided against him, "on the ground that his patent was deficient in form, and, therefore, invalid." It is, however, believed by your committee, that its invalidity was unknown until after the trial; and that nearly all engaged in the manufacturing of flour, during the term of his patent, had paid. A plea, however, was made by the said Oliver Evans, to wit: that little benefit had arisen to him from his patent, because of the deficiency in form thereof; and Congress, in consequence, passed a law, dated 21st January, 1808, "for the relief of Oliver Evans;" thereby granting to the said Evans, his "heirs, &c., for a term not exceeding fourteen years, the full and exclusive right and liberty of making, constructing, using, and vending to be used, his invention, discovery, and improvement in the art of making flour and meal, and in the several machines which he has invented, improved, and applied to that purpose."

That, under that act, a patent issued to the said Evans, dated 22d January, 1808, for the term of fourteen years. By the authority derived therefrom, he claims that there is secured to him, not only the exclusive privilege of using the machine specified therein, but a power to "prohibit the use of any other invention that shall accomplish the same effect, although the principles be ever so different." In proof whereof, the said Evans has actually instituted a suit against Jeremiah Bayley, to recover damages for using his own invention, (for which he has received a patent,) which, by the application of wind, conveys wheat or flour from one part of a mill to another.

Since the passage of the said act, he, the said Evans, has demanded and received for the use of his machinery unusual, and, in the opinion of your committee, extravagant prices, to wit: for a pair of stones of four and a half feet diameter, for which, under his first patent, he charged thirty dollars, he now demands three hundred dollars; for those of six feet, for which he formerly received forty dollars, he now charges five hundred and twenty dollars; and for a pair of seven feet stones, his demand is seven hundred and thirty-five dollars. For a mill (now building) to run five pair of stones of seven feet diameter, his demand is three thousand six hundred and seventy-five dollars, for which, under his former patent, he would only have demanded two hundred dollars.

The memorialists have produced proof to show that the said Evans is not the original inventor of any of the machinery specified in his patent, to wit: that the principles of the elevator have been known for ages; and particularly in latter years, through their use in the well known operation of the chain pump. That the hopperboy was invented by Christian Stouffer, and used in the mills of his father, brother, and others, prior to the year 1775. That the screw or conductor was invented and used by Jonathan Elliot, prior to the date of the first patent obtained by the said Evans in 1790. It is admitted by the said Evans that he is not the original inventor of any of the principles of the machines specified in his patent, but that he is the inventor of improvements therein, and that he has combined and applied the whole to operate their present useful effects; that is to say, that he invented the leather strap, and improved and applied the principles of the chain pump to the purposes now in use for his elevator; that he has improved the hopper machine, now called the hopperboy; and that he has made some useful improvements in the conductor, and has applied it to the purposes specified in his patent. The memorialists have submitted proof to show that the elevator, by a strap, had been in use in the year 1786, in the mill of Marshal and Stroud, near the residence of the said Evans, which had been seen by him, and that, in consequence, they, Marshal and Stroud, had been exempted from payment for the use of the elevator and hopperboy, under the acts of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland.

The committee are of opinion, that the act for the relief of Oliver Evans was an act of benevolence which Congress were under no obligation to grant, his patent having expired nearly three years; that it could not have been expected that an act of such high favor would have been used for the purpose of extortion and oppression. It must have been believed that the patentee, grateful for the extraordinary favor conferred on him, would have used the right reinstated in him with moderation and temper. It is, however, with regret that the committee are compelled to state that he has abused the power vested in him by an act intended for his relief, to the oppression of individuals, by the exaction of exorbitant sums of money for the use of the machines specified in his patent, and by his attempt to prevent the use of the inventions of others, which, although entirely different in principle, are capable of operating the same effect.

To prevent the said Evans from abusing (in future) the power vested in him, the committee submit a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act for the relief of Oliver Evans."

Mr. SMITH then, from the same committee, reported a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act for the relief of Oliver Evans," and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading. And the Senate adjourned.

Michigan Sufferers.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

It has appeared that, at the recovery of the Michigan Territory from the temporary possession of the enemy, the inhabitants thereof were left in so destitute and distressed a condition as to require from the public stores certain supplies essential to their subsistence, which have been prolonged under the same necessity which called for them.

The deplorable situation of the savages, thrown by the same event on the mercy and humanity of the American commander at Detroit, drew from the same source the means of saving them from perishing by famine; and, in other places, the appeals made by the wants and sufferings of that unhappy description of people have been equally imperious.

The necessity imposed by the conduct of the enemy in relation to the savages, of admitting their co-operation, in some instances, with our arms, has also involved occasional expense in supplying their wants; and it is possible that a perseverance of the enemy in their cruel policy may render a further expense for the like purpose inevitable.

On these subjects an estimate from the Department of War will be laid before Congress, and I recommend a suitable provision for them.

Executive Appointments.

[SENATE.]

MONDAY, March 7.

Mr. BIBB of Georgia, submitted the following resolutions for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate such information as he may possess, calculated to show what has been the practice of Great Britain concerning her native subjects naturalized in other countries and taken in arms against her; also, what is the general practice of the nations of Europe relative to the naturalization or employment in war of the native subjects of each other.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate such information as he may possess, calculated to show under what circumstances, and on what grounds, Great Britain has been in the practice of refusing to discharge native citizens of the United States impressed into her service.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate such information as he may possess, calculated to show what has been the conduct of Great Britain relative to American seamen on board her ships of war at and since the commencement of the war with the United States.

Executive Appointments.

The following motion was made by Mr. GORE, with closed doors, on the 28th of February last:

The President of the United States having by the constitution power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate, no such vacancy can happen in any office not before full.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate, the office of Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, to negotiate and sign a Treaty of Peace with the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, had not been filled at any time after the declaration of war upon the eighteenth day of June, A. D. 1812, and before the late recess of the Senate upon the third day of March last, when the same was not full.

Resolved, That the granting of commissions to Albert Gallatin, John Q. Adams, and James A. Bayard, to be Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary, to negotiate and sign a treaty of peace with the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, during the late recess of the Senate, as in the President's Message to the Senate of the twenty-ninth day of May last, is stated to have been done, was not, in the opinion of the Senate, authorized by the constitution, inasmuch as a vacancy in that office did not happen during such recess of the Senate, and as the Senate had not advised and consented to their appointment: Whereupon,

Resolved, That, while the Senate venerate the authority and dignity of the office of President of the United States, and will, at all times, as a high and essential power in the constitution, exert themselves to maintain and preserve undiminished the whole Executive authority thereby established, they owe it to the trust confided to themselves, as well as to the States, their constituents, to protect the power over appointments to office, which the constitution has placed in that body. From these considerations, joined to the conviction that the rights of the Senate have been infringed by an important act, to the validity of which the advice and consent of the Senate were essential; the Senate find themselves called upon, by their duty to the States, and in support of the constitution, reluctantly to protest, and they do hereby solemnly protest, against the commissioning as aforesaid of Albert Gallatin, John Q. Adams, and James A. Bayard, as an act not authorized by the constitution, and in the performance of which, the power of the Senate has been disregarded.

Resolved, That an authenticated copy of the foregoing resolution be delivered to the President, by a committee of — members of the Senate.

On motion, by Mr. TURNER, this day having been assigned for the consideration thereof, with open doors, it was accordingly taken up.

Mr. GORE addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: The subject which occasioned these resolutions will be readily recognized to be the President's commissioning Messrs. Gallatin, Adams, and Bayard, Envoys Extraordinary, to negotiate a Treaty of Peace with the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, during the recess of the Senate, prior to their session in May last.

When the Message of the President announced that he had commissioned these gentlemen during the recess, the supposed irregularity was noticed, and frequently made the topic of discussion. It was then remarked that, although the granting the commission during the recess might be irregular, it was not an evidence against the fitness of the gentlemen for the office to which they were named. The advice and consent of the Senate to their appointment could only give validity to the commission which would issue after the date of such advice and consent. That the nomination, with its circumstances, was sufficiently perplexing, without the addition of any difficulties that were not necessarily involved in its consideration. That the subject of the resolutions, if passed at that time, might unduly influence in the question of appointing the Envoys, and the desire of appointing them might, on the other hand, have an improper influence in the decision of this question. The subject was therefore waived until the Senate had acted on the nomination. The resolutions were then brought forward, but this was so late in the session, that several members had gone home, and all were preparing to go. They were therefore postponed. So soon as the Senate appeared to be as full as it was expected to be this session, the resolutions were brought forward.

I have thought it not improper, sir, to make this statement, as a reason why this subject has been so long delayed, and why it is brought forward at the present time, and, I trust, under such circumstances, as will insure to it a temperate discussion, and a just decision.

The second section of the second article of the constitution treats of the power of appointment to office, under that instrument. It constitutes and defines the authorities in whom this power shall be vested, the circumstances in which it may be varied, and the modifications wherewith it may be exercised.

Speaking of the President, the section declares, "he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law, but the Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments."

"The President shall have power to fill all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session."

The power of appointment is vested in the President and Senate with specified exceptions, otherwise provided for, by the constitution itself, and of such cases of inferior officers, whose appointments Congress may by law vest in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments. The depositing of this power of appointment in these two great departments of Government was, from the very nature and constitution of one of them, subject to inconvenience. The President, at all times and in all places, contains, within his own person, all the powers and authorities of his high office. This department is always in existence.

The Senate consists of various members, having no power or authority but when legally assembled together, and acting in a body, under one head, and with their recording officers. They were neither expected nor intended to be always in session.

Vacancies in office might happen during their recess.

To guard against a failure of the public service, from this circumstance, the constitution provides a remedy, taking especial care that the remedy shall be no greater, than to relieve against the mischief that was apprehended.

To this end, it declares that the President, one of these departments, a portion of this depository of the general authority of appointment, shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at their next session.

The power of appointment is vested, conjointly, in two branches of the Government. A case is described, in which one branch may, under special circumstances, exercise a modified power. What is that case? It is the case of a vacancy in an office, a vacancy of a certain and definitive character, viz: a vacancy that may happen during the recess of the Senate. If the vacancy happen at another time, it is not the case described by the constitution; for that specifies the precise space of time wherein the vacancy must happen, and the times which define this period bring it emphatically within the ancient and well-established maxim: "Expressio unis est exclusio alterius."

The reason why the constitution adopts this precise language and so strictly limits the case, is evident from the spirit and intention of that instrument, in the distribution of the powers thereby created and delegated.

The intent of the constitution was to vest the power of appointment in two departments of the Government. It would defeat its own purpose, then, were it to authorize one of these departments to exercise this power, except in the specified case in which the public interest may require immediate action, and the other could not be convened seasonably for this purpose.

An office is created by the constitution, or by some law in pursuance thereof. A vacancy may be said to exist in such office, immediately after its creation. Such, however, is not the case provided for by the clause under examination. It is the case of a vacancy that may happen during the recess of the Senate.

If the vacancy existed during the session, it could not be said to have happened during the recess; that is, within a period which, ex vi terminorum, excludes the very time when it did happen.

If a vacancy happen in an office, the office must have been before full; for, to assert that a vacancy has happened, necessarily implies the fact, that such office had previously an incumbent—that it was before full. If a vacancy exist prior to, it does not happen in the recess of the Senate. Therefore, for a vacancy to happen at any time in an office, that office must have been full at some time previous to the period when it did happen; for a vacancy to happen during the recess of the Senate, the office must have been full during their session prior to, and at the commencement of their recess. Were it not for the precision of language used in this grant to the President, and the unavoidable construction thereof, a great and manifest object of the constitution, viz: the vesting the power of appointment in two great organs of the Government, the President and the Senate, might have been totally defeated, by an assumption of the whole power by the President.

Vacancies exist in all offices, however created, until persons are appointed to fill them.

If an office had been created by law, or otherwise, and brought into existence during the session of the Senate, it would be only for the President to wait until their recess to commission a person to fill the vacant office, prefer his name to the Senate at their next session, and a short time before their recess. If disapproved, he may be re-commissioned immediately on the adjournment, and the same course be pursued at the subsequent as at the preceding session. In this way an officer, and, if one, all officers, might be commissioned and continued in office, as long as the President should please, not only without, but contrary to, the advice and consent of the Senate, a department of the Government constituted by the constitution an essential branch in the power of appointment.

The second resolution is an assertion of the opinion of the Senate as to a mere matter of fact, which I presume will not be doubted, and although necessary to effect the conclusion contained in the subsequent resolutions, needs no comment.

The third seems to be an unavoidable corollary from the opinions and facts declared in the preceding resolutions and in this.

The observations before made preclude the necessity of much remark on this resolution, as most which would be pertinent now have already been presented to the consideration of the Senate. Some general notice, however, will be taken of the powers and authorities of the constitution in regard to the subject under discussion.

In recurring to the constitutional power of appointment it will be seen that it consists of two branches of authority, to be exercised by two distinct bodies, acting independently of each other; but, in order to effectuate an appointment, both must concur.

The power of nomination is exclusively in the President. That of appointment is vested in the President and Senate jointly, and their advice and consent are as necessary to effect an appointment as the nomination of the President.

If the constitution stopped at the end of the second paragraph of the section before quoted, the only inquiry, in order to determine on the necessity of the advice and consent of the Senate to an appointment, would be, whether the officer were an inferior officer, and whether Congress had by law vested the appointment in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

The answer in the case now under consideration is, Congress have made no law respecting it; and further, that Congress have no power to vest the appointment of these officers in any one, they not being inferior officers.

If Congress have no power to vest this appointment in the President alone, it would seem free from all doubt, that the President could not rightfully exercise such an authority; and equally so, that the Senate could not surrender their authority, or acquiesce in its exercise by another. The Senate is a trustee for the benefit of the public, of all the powers vested in them. Wherever a power is vested in a trustee, there is a correspondent duty to exercise such power, and not to surrender it to another.

It will not be amiss, in considering this subject, to keep in view how sacredly the people intended to guard this right, and this duty in the Senate, by not permitting that body, even with the concurrence of the House of Representatives, and the President, to discharge itself of such a duty, by a surrender thereof to any other body.

If it be attempted to defend this appointment, it will probably be on the last paragraph in this section, which authorizes the President to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate. Sufficient has been said, I trust, to show that no authority can be derived from this clause.

It has been suggested, that the President has a right, by the constitution, to create the office of Ambassadors and other public Ministers. An office is created by the constitution, or by some power under it. Prior to its being so created, it does not exist. Whatever power is granted, as regards the appointment of public Ministers, is in that clause which says, "the President shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint." If this, then, be the power of creating the office, it must be an actual appointment, and that can be only by the President and Senate. No other authority than what is embraced by these words can be found for the creation of the office of public Ministers, and this is not in the President alone, but in the President and Senate. In other words, the appointment makes the office, and the appointment cannot be made without the concurrent judgment of these two great organs of the Government.

Perhaps it may be more proper to consider the office of Ambassador and public Minister as necessarily existing, from the relation of the United States, as an independent power to other independent powers, and thus recognized by the constitution. Most offices are created by laws enacted by Congress. The practice has been, in cases where there is reason to apprehend that sufficient time will not be afforded, during the session of the Senate, for a proper selection of persons to fill such offices, and that inconveniences might result from delay till their next session, to authorize the President to appoint such officers in the recess of the Senate. This course will be found to have been adopted early in the history of this Government. There is one act to this effect, of March 8, 1791, volume 1, page 301. This was in the second session of the 1st Congress, and the practice has been invariably continued since. An act is also made (March 8, 1799) to authorize the President to fill up vacancies that happen during the session of the Senate.

In these cases the offices undoubtedly exist, and the authority given to the President in them, goes on the presumption that there exists a vacancy at the time of passing the act, and that such vacancy will exist during the recess of the Senate. If nothing further were necessary, than the existence of an office, and a vacancy therein, to entitle the President, constitutionally, to make the appointment in the recess of the Senate, this authority, by law, would be unnecessary.

Congress, then, and this Senate, as one branch of Congress, seem to have settled the question, and one may fairly say, the President also; for if, in his opinion, the power of appointment to vacant offices was vested in him by the constitution, he would hardly consent to receive that power from Congress, especially as thus receiving it must be construed into an acknowledgment that he could derive no such power immediately from the constitution. The construction of an instrument made contemporaneously with, or shortly after, its formation, may be safely relied on for disclosing the intention of the framers, in the language they used.

It is well known that the first President of the United States was also President of the Convention that reported the constitution; and that two of the heads of departments, and many of the first Senate, had been distinguished members of the same convention.

It will be found, by a reference to the Executive Journals of the Senate during the Administration of President Washington, that at each session of the Senate, and shortly after their meeting, he sent messages on the subject of appointments during the recess, that left no doubt of his construction of the constitution in this particular—vol. 1, pp. 286, 389; vol. 2, pp. 9, 76. In addition to the conclusion to be drawn from these messages of President Washington, a fact is stated by Chief Justice Marshall, in his Life of Washington, which shows distinctly the construction of that great man on his constitutional powers, in a case analogous to the one under consideration; and that, notwithstanding the circumstances were urgent, he did not feel himself authorized to act in the recess of the Senate, in the case of a vacancy that did not happen in such recess.

Thus, sir, I have supported the construction of the constitution contained in the resolution now on your table, by the literal sense and meaning of the terms used in that instrument, by its obvious spirit and intent, by the judgment of the President, Senate, and House of Representatives, repeatedly, deliberately, and solemnly given, in their legislative acts, and by the uniform conduct of President Washington during his Administration.

To maintain the rights of this department of the Government, and thereby protect those of the States represented in this body, is not only the privilege, but a sacred duty of the Senate, with which, in my judgment, we are not at liberty either to compromise or equivocate.

To the end, then, sir, that we may arrest the progress of an evil, which subverts the organization of the Government, by depriving the Senate of their constitutional authorities, and vesting them in the President of the United States, I propose these resolutions, which contain the solemn protest of the Senate, and provide for its presentation to the Supreme Magistrate.

On motion, by Mr. BIBB, of Georgia, the further consideration of the resolutions was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Wednesday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted on the 7th instant, which was amended; and, on motion by Mr. KING, the following amendment to the second resolution, was agreed to.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate such information as he may possess, of the cases, with their circumstances in which any civilized nation has punished its native subjects taken in arms against her, and for which punishment retaliation has been inflicted by the nation in whose service they were taken.

Whereupon—

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate such information as he may possess, calculated to show what has been the practice of Great Britain concerning her native subjects, naturalized in other countries, and taken in arms against her; also, what is the general practice of the nations of Europe, relative to the naturalization or employment in war between two nations of the native subjects of each other.

THURSDAY, March 31.

Executive Appointments.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. GORE, as is stated on the 7th instant.

Mr. BRIBB, of Georgia, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President:—The propositions now before the Senate, whether viewed in reference to the constitutional grounds they assume, or to the circumstances which cause their introduction, present to my mind a most extraordinary aspect.

I shall endeavor to show, that if the principle laid down in the first resolution, from which the conclusions contained in the subsequent resolutions are deduced, were admitted, that the course of proceeding proposed is unauthorized by the constitution. And I shall endeavor to show that the President has done as he ought to have done; that he has conformed to the fair interpretation of the constitution, and to the uniform practice under it from the commencement of the Administration of General WASHINGTON to the period when commissions were granted to Albert Gallatin, John Q. Adams, and James A. Bayard.

Sir, we are called upon to annex by resolve a codicil to the constitution—to usurp the authority of determining what are the powers belonging to another independent department of the Government; and, having prescribed such limits as may be suitable to our own purposes, we are then to decide that that department in the discharge of its duties has disregarded the obligations of the instrument from which its powers are derived. What clause of the constitution, I ask, authorizes the Senate to expound its provisions for the President, or in this way to sit in judgment on his conduct? The constitution has defined the respective limits of the departments—their rights, duties, and responsibilities; and the conduct of neither can be restrained or condemned by the other, except in the mode expressly provided. On the present occasion, however, it is gravely proposed to assume a power not granted, and to violate a maxim the soundness of which is universally admitted—that no man shall be a judge in his own cause. A trespass on the rights of the Senate is asserted, and the Senate are called upon to decide the case. The President of the United States is to be adjudged guilty of a violation of the constitution which he has sworn to support; and that, too, without allowing him a privilege which is secured to every freeman—the privilege of being heard in his own defence. We are to become both accusers and judges. Yes, sir, the tribunal before whom the President is to be tried in case of an impeachment, are now to accuse—to prejudice—to condemn—to disqualify themselves as judges, if the House of Representatives should think it proper to impeach! Adopt the resolutions, and you will have done that which would disqualify a juror before any court, for sitting on the trial of an offender. I trust I shall not be told that the resolutions do not condemn the President—that they only express an opinion relative to the powers of the President. This would be quibbling in a manner and to an extent unworthy the dignity of this honorable body. You do propose solemnly to adjudge that he is guilty of a high offence—that he has violated the constitution and disregarded the rights of the Senate.

The constitutional control of the Senate over the Executive is particularly defined by the instrument; and unless the power of censure and condemnation now proposed to be exercised is among the powers enumerated, it does not exist. What are the controlling powers of the Senate? A negative on nominations to office and on treaties. The power of acquittal or condemnation in case of impeachment, and in none other, is also vested in this body. The power of accusing—of preparing articles of impeachment, is exclusively vested in the House of Representatives; and, considering the intimate connection between the powers of the Executive and of the Senate, without this check in the other branch, the President would cease to be the head of a co-ordinate department of the Government—he would become a mere instrument in the hands of the Senate. The constitution has wisely provided that the House of Representatives shall accuse before the Senate can condemn; and, sir, it is this barrier to the absolute dominion of the Senate we are now called upon to destroy. Assume the authority of prescribing the limits of the Executive powers—of accusation and condemnation, and in every view of which the case is susceptible, I pronounce that you are guilty of an act of usurpation unparalleled in the history of this Government. If you can suppose a corrupt Senate and President, and an act committed by the latter meriting impeachment, the Senate may decide, for the purpose of avoiding investigation, that he is innocent; and thus the House of Representatives are virtually precluded the exercise of their constitutional prerogative. It would be idle and absurd to impeach after the judges had decided on the guilt or innocence of the offender.

But, Mr. President, I will not dwell on this part of the subject. I will meet directly the resolutions, in the full persuasion that I shall demonstrate the fallacy of the constitutional grounds they assume. Before, however, I proceed, permit me to remark that the arguments and precedents advanced by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. GORR) were wholly intended to prove that the President has not power to fill vacant offices unless the vacancies happen during the recess of the Senate—a point, as I shall show, not at all involved in the present case. If, according to my view of the matter, the case now the subject of complaint, was one in which the vacancy did happen during the recess of the Senate, that point is excluded from the discussion.

Let us examine the resolutions—

"The President of the United States having by the constitution power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session,

"Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate no vacancy can happen in any office not before full."

I will make no question concerning the application of the word "office," or "vacancy," to a foreign mission; because it is not necessary to my present purpose. Nor shall I advert to other provisions of the constitution which have been referred to; because, having no relation to the power of filling vacancies, they neither enlarge nor limit that power. The provision I have just read, is the only one which relates to the question before us; and it is from that provision alone that the Executive power of filling vacancies is derived. It delegates to the President exclusively the power to fill all vacancies which happen during the recess of the Senate; and it will not be denied that where a discretionary power is granted to do a particular act, in the happening of certain events, that the party to whom the power is delegated is necessarily constituted the judge whether the events have happened, and whether it is proper to exercise the authority with which he is clothed. The President, therefore, is the judge whether vacancies have happened during the recess of the Senate, and whether the public interest required that they should be filled. The commissions thus granted, however, expire at the end of the next session of the Senate thereafter. This is the only limitation imposed on the power, and in this consists the only control of the Senate. The assumption of any other control is unauthorized by any rule of construction—is unwarranted by the constitution. If the President abuse the power, appropriations may be withheld and the House of Representatives may impeach. These are the only checks, and they are amply sufficient, provided by the constitution; and none other can be exercised, without an act of usurpation. The true interpretation of this part of the constitution I take to be this:—that the Executive may fill all offices which from whatever causes happen to be vacant or unoccupied during the recess of the Senate, without regard to the precise period when they became so. The object unquestion-ably was to avoid inconveniences which might result to the nation from essential offices being vacant; and certainly these inconveniences can neither be increased nor diminished by the fact, that the vacancy did or did not happen while the Senate were in session. But I will not take this ground on the present occasion. I will agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the President is not authorized to fill vacancies unless they happen during the recess of the Senate; and still deny that the principle assumed in his resolution is deducible from the premises.

I deny that the word "vacancy," in its usual acceptation or in its application to office, implies a previous filling; and I call upon him to produce the authority of any writer who has given such an interpretation to the word. A vacant office is "an office unoccupied," "an office not filled." So soon as an office is created and as long as it exists, it is either vacant or it is full. If it be filled, it is not vacant—if it be not filled, it is vacant; and it is as manifestly vacant if it never has been filled as if the vacancy be created by the death of an incumbent. It is therefore obvious, that, supposing the President incompetent to fill any vacancy, except such as happens in the recess of the Senate, there can be no question concerning the manner in which the vacancy takes place. The only question is, when did it happen? I will state a case, and appeal to the candor of the gentleman for the answer. Suppose an act to be passed during the present session creating an office, and the act to take effect during the recess, if a defined contingency shall happen. The contingency happens, the act begins to operate and the office its existence, during the recess. Is the office from that moment vacant until it is filled? Has the vacancy happened during the recess of the Senate? Is it such a vacancy as may be filled by the President? Sir, there can be but one rational answer. The office commences its existence and the vacancy happens during the recess; and these circumstances constitute the precise case of vacancy which the President is authorized to fill. It is therefore manifest that the principle assumed, is wholly incorrect; and permit me to remark that the argument drawn from a Message of Gen. Washington concerning certain military appointments, and from the provisions of the tax laws passed during the last session of Congress, is altogether unavailing. What were the circumstances of the first case? A bill had passed for raising a military force, which became the law of the land from the moment of its passage, and while Congress was in session. Gen. Washington deemed it unnecessary to appoint all the officers immediately, and yet was apprehensive it might be necessary to fill the offices before the Senate would again convene. He so informed the Senate, and requested that he might be clothed with the authority to make the appointments during the recess. What was the ground of this request? The offices were created from the date of the act, and being vacant from the moment of their creation, the vacancy did not "happen during the recess of the Senate," and therefore could not be filled by him alone, without special authority from Congress. The offices created by the tax laws of the last session were in the same situation, and it being impracticable to select the officers during the session which was about to terminate, authority was given to the President to appoint in the recess. Why was this provision in both cases necessary? Not because the "offices had not been before full," but because the vacancies happened during the session, and not "during the recess of the Senate."

But, Mr. President, let us examine the particular case which is now made the subject of complaint. In March, 1813, "during the recess of the Senate," the Emperor of Russia offered his mediation for the procurement of peace between the United States and Great Britain. It was promptly accepted by the President, and Ministers were commissioned to meet such as might be appointed on the part of England. They proceeded on their peaceful errand to St. Petersburg, and their nominations were submitted to the Senate at their next meeting thereafter. Two of the mission were confirmed and one rejected. It is now proposed solemnly to protest against those appointments in the recess, "as an act not authorized by the constitution, and in the performance of which the power of the Senate has been wholly disregarded." Such is the history of the case. Sir, there are two descriptions of offices altogether different in their nature, authorized by the constitution—one to be created by law, and the other depending for their existence and continuance upon contingencies. Of the first kind, are judicial, revenue, and similar offices. Of the second, are Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls. The first description organize the Government and give it efficacy. They form the internal system, and are susceptible of precise enumeration. When and how they are created, and when and how they become vacant, may always be ascertained with perfect precision. Not so with the second description. They depend for their original existence upon the law, but are the offspring of the state of our relations with foreign nations, and must necessarily be governed by distinct rules. As an independent power, the United States have relations with all other independent powers; and the management of those relations is vested in the Executive. The Ministerial trust confided to our foreign Ministers cannot be considered an "office" in the sense and to the extent which are applicable to internal offices or offices properly so called. But I will use the word in conformity to the resolutions, because I am unwilling to enlarge the limits of the present debate, and because it will enable me to express my ideas upon the subject before us, more intelligibly. I say, then, that whether the office of a Minister exists or does not—how and when it exists, are questions not particularly and precisely settled by the constitution; but that the Executive authority to nominate to the Senate foreign Ministers and Consuls, and to fill vacancies happening during the recess, necessarily includes the power of determining those questions. According to my view of the subject, the office commenced with every independent power from the moment the United States became independent, and authorized the appointment of foreign Ministers; and it will continue to exist so long as we and they continue independent, unless destroyed by the termination of the relations which created it. The period at which it should be filled is left by the constitution to the discretion of the President. Until he chooses to nominate, there is no power vested in any department to control him, or to appoint. Whether and at what time the office in regard to any foreign nation should be filled, may and generally will depend on accidental circumstances. Hence Congress have always appropriated a gross sum for foreign intercourse, leaving the President to select the powers with whom we should be represented, unrestrained, except by the amount of the appropriation. As the office with reference to any foreign power, is created by, and dependent for its continuance upon the relations subsisting between that power and the United States, its existence and destruction must be contemporaneous with the existence and destruction of those relations. It dies and revives with them. It becomes extinct by war—its revival depends on contingencies, and when revived it is vacant, until it is filled. If the contingencies happen during the recess of the Senate, (of which the President is made sole judge by the provision of the constitution which has been quoted,) he is authorized to appoint. The declaration of war against Great Britain destroyed the office in that country, and its revival depended on subsequent events. If England had immediately thereafter, and during the recess of the Senate, proposed to treat by Ministers for peace, there can be no question that it would have been the constitutional right and the duty of the President to commission persons for that purpose. The mediation of Russia was proposed during the recess. The proposition created a new and necessarily vacant office, and it belonged to the President to determine whether the public interest required that he should fill it. I conclude, therefore, that in this case, the vacancy did "happen during the recess of the Senate," and that the President did not invade the rights of the Senate in the exercise of his constitutional and exclusive power to "fill up all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Such, sir, is the fair interpretation of the constitution; and, in my opinion, the welfare of the nation required that this power should have been vested in the Executive. The power of making war is properly confided to Congress.

The power of making peace to the President, subject to the control of the Senate over treaties. If a treaty be formed, compromising the honor, or abandoning the rights of the nation, the Senate may reject it. But why we should now be called on to interfere in the first stages of negotiation for peace; to adopt a principle to preclude the Executive from seizing every proper occasion, during the recess of the Senate, of procuring an object which all parties profess to desire, is to my mind astonishing. The principle proposed is calculated to destroy that promptitude and unity of action which is always necessary in the management of our foreign intercourse, and which sometimes may be indispensable to the safety of the country. It must produce one of two effects—either to keep the Senate always in session, or to produce injurious delays inseparable from convening its members. The provision of the constitution annexed to the resolutions proves that the continual sitting of the Senate was neither contemplated nor intended; and the evil tendency of the latter effect might be illustrated by presenting numerous cases, which may and probably will happen. On the other hand, what possible injury can result from the construction for which I contend? None. The checks provided are abundantly sufficient. The commissions granted continue no longer than the end of the next session of the Senate, and in the mean time the Senate may reject the nominations. If a treaty be formed which they do not approve, they are competent to reject that also. Congress, moreover, may withhold appropriation, and put an end thereby to the mission; and, besides, if the power be abused, the President is liable to impeachment. Indeed, Mr. President, it does appear to me, that of all the powers delegated by the constitution, none are better guarded and restrained than that which authorizes the Executive to fill vacancies during the recess of the Senate. But the gentleman from Massachusetts insists that the construction for which I contend puts it in the power of the President to fill permanently all appointments in opposition to the will of the Senate. And how? An appointment is made in the recess, and the person nominated to the Senate at their next session. The nomination is rejected, and the President abstains from nominating another. The commission granted in the recess expires at the end of the session, and consequently the office would again become vacant in the recess, and a second commission might be issued. Thus, says the gentleman, the power of the Senate over appointments would be entirely wrested from them. Sir, this is an argument drawn from the possible abuse of power not admissible on general principles, and I have shown that sufficient checks are provided against such abuse. Besides, does not the gentleman perceive that this objection applies to the constitution, and not peculiarly to my construction. He admits that the President has the constitutional power to fill vacancies which happen during the recess of the Senate, and it necessarily follows that the abuse to which he refers may as readily take place in one case as in another. The objection, then, is an objection not to my construction, but to the constitution itself; and the remedy is to be sought for, if indeed any remedy were wanting, in proposing an amendment according to the mode constitutionally prescribed. The second resolution is in the following words:

“Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate, the office of Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, to negotiate and sign a treaty of peace with the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, had not been filled at any time after the declaration of war upon the 18th of June, 1812, and before the late recess of the Senate upon the 8d day of March last, when the same was not full.”

If, sir, I have shown satisfactorily, as I think I have, that the President is authorized to fill up all vacancies which happen in the recess of the Senate, and that such vacancies may happen in offices not before full, it is unnecessary to discuss the proposition contained in this resolution. But I cannot avoid noticing an obvious absurdity which the resolution presents. It speaks of an office not having been filled at a period when the office was not in existence. I deny that “the office of Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to negotiate and sign a treaty of peace with the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland,” was in existence at any time after the declaration of war upon the 18th day of June 1812, and before the late recess of the Senate upon the 8d day of March last; and it surely behooved the gentleman to prove that such an office existed before he began his inquiry whether or not it had been filled. It is not now too late, and I invite him to the task. It cannot be done. As well might he undertake to prove that an effect may exist before the cause which produced it. The manifest fact is, that there could not have been an office of Minister to treat for peace, under the mediation of Russia, until the mediation was proposed, which was not until after the adjournment of Congress, on the 8d of March last, as is proved by the correspondence upon the subject lately laid before this body. As, therefore, the office did not exist “before the late recess of the Senate upon the 8d day of March last,” it could not have been either vacant or full.

The third and fourth resolutions are in the following words:

“Resolved, That the granting of commissions to Albert Gallatin, John Q. Adams, and James A. Bayard, to be Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary to negotiate and sign a treaty of peace with the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, during the late recess of the Senate, as in the President’s Message to the Senate of the 29th of May last is stated to have been done, was not in the opinion of the Senate authorized by the constitution, inasmuch as a vacancy in that office did not happen during such recess of the Senate, and as the Senate had not advised and consented to their appointment:

MARCH, 1814.]

Executive Appointments.

[SENATE.]

"Whereupon, Resolved, While the Senate venerate the authority and dignity of the office of President of the United States, and will, at all times, as a high and essential power in the constitution, exert themselves to maintain and preserve undiminished the whole Executive authority thereby established, they owe it to the trust confided to themselves, as well as to the States, their constituents, to protect the power over appointments to office which the constitution has placed in that body. From these considerations, joined to the conviction that the rights of the Senate have been infringed by an important act, to the validity of which the advice and consent of the Senate were essential, the Senate find themselves called upon by their duty to the States, and in support of the constitution, reluctantly to protest, and they do hereby solemnly protest against the commissioning as aforesaid of Albert Gallatin, John Q. Adams, and James A. Bayard, as an act not authorized by the constitution, and in the performance of which the power of the Senate has been disregarded."

The third resolution assumes that the vacancy in the office which was filled by the President did not happen during the recess of the Senate, and that therefore he was not authorized to fill it. Sir, I have shown that the office could not exist until the Russian mediation was proposed, and that it was proposed during the recess of the Senate. Until, therefore, the office was created, it could not be said to have been either full or vacant; but the moment it commenced its existence, it was necessarily full or vacant. It was vacant until filled by the President. The office itself, like that of all foreign missions, was the offspring of circumstances, and the happening of the vacancy was contemporaneous with the commencement of the office. They were both created by the occasion; the occasion occurred; the office began its existence; the vacancy happened during the recess of the Senate; and as the Executive is authorized "to fill up all vacancies which may happen during the recess," it was his constitutional right to fill this.

The remarks which I had the honor to submit in the commencement of my argument concerning the authority of the Senate in this way to sit in judgment on the conduct of the President, and the evil tendency of such a course of proceeding, are applicable to the fourth and last resolution. If I have succeeded in showing that the act of commissioning Albert Gallatin, John A. Adams, and James A. Bayard, was "authorized by the constitution," and that, "in the performance of which the power of the Senate has not been disregarded," the pledge which I gave to the Senate will be fully redeemed, when I shall have proved that the conduct of the President in this affair has conformed to the uniform practice under the constitution from the beginning of the administration of General Washington. Before I proceed, however, I beg leave to notice a circumstance on which the gentleman was disposed to dwell, because he thought it calculated to show that Mr. Madison had made an alarming innovation on the practice of former Presidents. Some days ago the gentleman offered a resolution, which was adopted, calling for copies of commissions granted by General Washington to John Rutledge, as chief justice; to William Paca, as district judge, and to William Nelson, as marshal; and for copies of the commissions granted to our late Envoys to St. Petersburg. The Senate were not informed of the use intended to be made of them, until we were favored with the gentleman's speech; and it being then impracticable to call officially for other commissions without postponing the debate, I immediately addressed a note to the Secretary of State, requesting that I might be furnished with copies of certain commissions granted by General Washington in similar cases of foreign missions. I have received them, and will presently read and compare them with those lately granted. The difference between the commissions issued by General Washington to Messrs. Rutledge, Paca, and Nelson, and those granted to Messrs. Gallatin, Adams, and Bayard, is this, the former expressly limit their continuance to the end of the next session of the Senate thereafter, and the latter do not express such a limitation. Sir, whether the former had, or had not contained such a limitation, was wholly immaterial, because the constitution having imposed the limitation, the commissions would have expired as certainly without it as with it. The difference is in form, and not in substance; and considering the nature of a foreign mission, the idea of expressing on the face of a commission granted to a Minister, which he must show as the evidence of his authority as such, that it shall expire at the end of the next session of the Senate, is altogether absurd. I venture to assert that such a commission never was issued under this Government. If the gentleman had thought proper to call for commissions granted by the present Executive, during the recess of the Senate, to internal officers, he would have seen that they were, both in form and substance, similar to those granted by the first President; or, if he had called for commissions granted by General Washington in cases of foreign embassies, similar to the present, he would have found no limitation of their continuance. And I confess, Mr. President, this would have appeared to me the fair and obvious course of ascertaining whether any innovation had been practised. I will now read to the Senate commissions which were granted by General Washington and Mr. Adams, in cases of foreign missions, during the recess of the Senate. [Mr. B. here read several commissions, and by comparing them with those which were granted to Messrs. Gallatin, Adams, and Bayard, showed that they were in every respect alike. He then proceeded.] Permit me now, sir, to advert to the practice of the Government, from its commencement, concerning the construction of the provision of the constitution which is the subject of discussion. I hold in my hand a list of the appointments which have been made by the Executive, in the recess of the Senate, since the adoption of the constitution, which I procured from the office of the Secretary of State. It furnishes incontestable evidence of the fact that each President has deemed himself authorized to institute and to fill foreign missions in the recess of the Senate, whenever, in his opinion, the interest of the United States required it. I will, at present, refer to one or two examples only, remarking, at the same time, that the examples are numerous, and that the list may be examined by any gentleman who desires it.

Soon after General Washington became President, and in the recess of the Senate, he authorized Gouverneur Morris, by a letter of instructions, to negotiate with England concerning the interchange of Ministers and the formation of a commercial treaty. I mention this fact to show that he thought himself competent alone to determine whether the United States should or should not be represented in England, and to negotiate concerning a treaty, without previously consulting the Senate. In June, 1792, John Paul Jones was commissioned to negotiate a treaty of peace with Algiers. The office was not before full, and was now filled for the first time during the recess of the Senate. Thomas Barclay was appointed Consul at Morocco, on the 31st March, 1791. This was an original appointment, and was now made during the recess of the Senate. These examples, without referring to others, are sufficient to show that the late commissioning of Albert Gallatin, John Q. Adams, and James A. Bayard, was sanctioned by the practice under Washington's administration. The same practice was pursued by Mr. Adams, of which the list before me presents many examples, but which I will abstain from reading, lest I should trespass on the patience of the Senate. During the administration of that distinguished statesman, Mr. Jefferson, we find the same construction given to the constitution; but presume his examples would not be deemed good authority by the mover of these most extraordinary and unprecedented resolutions.

Thus, I trust, the case is fully made out. 1st. That the resolutions themselves are unauthorized by the constitution; and 2nd. That the commissioning of Albert Gallatin, John Q. Adams, and James A. Bayard, was an act authorized by the constitution, and sanctioned by the practice of all Administrations. It appears, then, Mr. President, that we are called upon to protest against the conduct of the present Chief Magistrate, for exercising his legitimate constitutional powers, and for following the example of the first President of the United States. Sir, I have witnessed with pain and mortification the precepts and examples of the Father of his Country set at naught by those who profess to be his exclusive followers; but I do cherish the hope that they will not be condemned by an act of this honorable body. Why the examples to which I have referred should have received universal and uniform acquiescence, and why, at this peculiar moment, it should be proposed to censure Mr. Madison for following those examples, I will not attempt to explain. For what was the act done, against which this protest is entered? To obtain peace. By whom is the proposition submitted? By a gentleman whom, personally, I respect—but, sir, by a gentleman belonging to a party professing to be the exclusive friends of peace. A party whose daily business is to clamor against the continuance of the war, and to present every possible impediment to its successful prosecution. I leave the comment to the American people.

The further consideration of the resolutions was postponed until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, April 1.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate of the death of JOHN DAWSON, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Virginia; and that his remains will be interred this day at three o'clock.

Resolved unanimously, That the Senate will attend the funeral of JOHN DAWSON, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Virginia, this day at three o'clock, and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go into mourning, and wear a black crape round the left arm for thirty days.

SATURDAY, April 2.

Executive Appointments.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. GORE, as is stated on the 7th of March.

Mr. HORSEY, of Delaware, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: It is my misfortune to differ upon this occasion with the honorable mover of the resolutions; at the same time I beg leave to assure him that I am not insensible to the respect and deference which I owe to his opinion, and particularly to the precedents he has cited.

How it may be proper for one department of the Government to claim the right of interpreting the constitution for another co-ordinate department, by way of abstract resolution or otherwise, is a question which I submit to the consideration of the honorable mover. Is it a claim compatible with the great political maxim which requires that several departments of power ought to be separate, distinct, and independent of each other, so far as it regards the exercise of the powers devolved upon them?

The several departments of the Government derive their powers, not from each other, but from the same source of authority—the constitution. The one, I apprehend, cannot justly claim an exclusive superior right to settle the power of the other.

It is of the utmost importance that the constitutional balance of power should be maintained, in order to preserve the equilibrium of the Government. The way to do this, is by a tenacious adherence to all those salutary checks which the constitution has wisely put into the hands of the several departments, in order that the one may defend itself against the encroachment of the other. This is the only mode by which the weaker branches can restrain the stronger within their constitutional limits.

Executive Appointments.

The main check is the power of the negative. If both branches of the Legislature pass a bill violating, in his opinion, the rights of the Executive, he may interpose his qualified negative, and, if this does not shield him, he must yield to the constitutional majority of the Legislature. It would be presumptuous in him to claim the right to judge for them, after he had passed his negative, as it would be idle for him to express his opinion in the form of an empty protest. So, if the House of Representatives pass a bill infringing, in the opinion of the Senate, their rights, the Senate may interpose their absolute negative, and thereby defend themselves and the constitution. But could they do more? Could they take it upon themselves to censure the House of Representatives, when that branch is co-ordinate and wholly independent of this?

So too as it regards the general power of appointment. The wisdom of the constitution has placed this in the hands of the President and the Senate. It has given to the President the sole power of nomination—to the Senate simply the power of concurrence and of the negative. If, therefore, the President submits a nomination which in the opinion of the Senate, is improper or unconstitutional, the Senate through their controlling power of the negative may reject the nomination. But can they do more? Has not the President the right to determine for himself with regard to the expediency and constitutionality of the nomination, as the Senate undoubtedly have to decide for themselves, when the nomination is submitted for their advice and consent?

While the constitution has given to the President and the Senate the general power of appointment, it has also given to the President alone a qualified and modified power of appointment, during the recess of the Senate. At the same time, however, it has placed this power under the strictest guards or checks. First, it can only be exercised in the recess of the Senate; secondly, the commission creating the appointment shall expire at the end of the next session of the Senate. These are the checks which the constitution has placed over this power. If it be abused, the President alone is responsible. It is a power complete in itself, and that belongs solely and exclusively to the Executive. To be sure, if the Executive afterwards submit the appointment to the Senate, as he must do, if it is to continue beyond their session, it is in the nature of a new appointment, and the Senate may reject or affirm it. But as it regards the intermediate act of appointment, it is perfect in itself for the limited time, and, in my humble conception, the Senate have no more right to interfere with regard to it than they have to interfere with the House of Representatives in the choice of their Speaker and other officers; no more right than they have to advise and control the Executive in the exercise of his undoubted powers to grant reprieves and pardons, to receive foreign Ministers, or to use his qualified veto.

As it relates to appointments connected with the treaty-making power, the Senate have, it must be admitted, a remote or indirect controlling power over the power to make temporary appointments, upon the ratification of a treaty. And this may be considered a third, though not perfect, yet important check over the qualified power of appointment.

Thus, sir, it appears to me, so far as respects the exercise of the qualified power of appointment, lodged by the constitution with the Executive, that the Senate have no right to meddle with it. It is not subject to their control, but to the control only of the three important checks to which I have adverted, and to that responsibility which the President owes to the power of impeachment and to his country. As to the general power of appointment, the salutary control of the Senate, through their absolute power to negative, is effectual—it is perfect. Not empty and unavailing as are the resolutions in questions; which if adopted we have no power to enforce; which in their nature are not susceptible of any beneficial or practical result. Send them to the President; he reads them, and is of the same opinion still. And can these resolutions constrain him to alter his opinion? After the maturest deliberation he adheres to his opinion, and sits down and writes a counter protest in support of it. Then, sir, we shall have protest against protest, and the whole amount of the matter will be, that a question is raised between one department and another co-ordinate department of the Government, to decide which no competent tribunal exists.

If there be any force in these preliminary remarks, the propriety of the course taken by the honorable mover may, to say the least, be doubted. If doubtful, ought a measure so extraordinary to be adopted? A measure, acknowledged to be without precedent. To justify one department, if it can be justified at all, to pass a vote implying censure upon the conduct of another department, the case ought to be clear, the conduct gross. Not a point about which intelligent men may fairly entertain opposite opinions. Where the construction, even if wrong, may have been nothing worse than an error of judgment; an error into which the party may have been led by a practical interpretation of the constitution for more than sixteen years, if not from the commencement of the Government.

The honorable mover, sir, has touched upon delicate ground. The relations subsisting between the President and the Senate are near and highly important. We ought to do nothing calculated to endanger that harmony and dignity which should always characterize this body in their intercourse with the Executive.

In this the public as well as ourselves have an interest. The utmost delicacy and deference I should hope would always be observed towards each other, consistently with a fixed and firm purpose to maintain all the rights and powers belonging to great and independent branches of the Government.

Mr. President, I have said, if the point were doubtful, even if the President were in the wrong, it is to my mind very questionable whether we ought to pass the resolutions. But I humbly think the question is not doubtful. I believe, verily believe, that the President has given the just and true, and at the same time the most fit and practicable construction to the constitution. This, to my mind, is susceptible of the clearest and most conclusive demonstration.

An instrument drawn with so much brevity and in such general terms as the Constitution of the United States, could not specify every power which might be necessary and indispensable to a due and practical administration of the Government. Indeed, to have made such specifications, would have required attributes with which it has not been the pleasure of the Deity to endow imperfect man. The Government, therefore, and the several departments, in the execution of their powers, of necessity resort in many instances to the doctrine of construction. Hence the powers of the Government are either specified or constructive. The power of the President to displace from office is not a specified, but a constructive power—a power of greater magnitude and much more doubtful construction than the one in question. The power of the Congress to establish a National Bank, is not an express but a constructive power. The power of the Executive to recall or supersede at pleasure a public Minister, without consulting the Senate, though but just appointed by their advice and consent, is also a very extraordinary power. The power of the President to issue instructions to all public Ministers, to direct the time, the place, the manner, and the temper of the negotiation—to continue or break it off—are all constructive powers, involving the relations of peace and war. The powers of the President to dismiss a foreign Minister—to acknowledge the Government and independence of a foreign nation—are powers of the greatest magnitude, involving the best interests of society, and yet mere constructive powers. It is, therefore, sir, apparent that the constitution is an instrument which in practice does not admit of that strict and literal interpretation which the honorable mover contends for. You cannot give it life or effect if you interpret it, like a penal statute, according to the dead letter. Indeed, there are parts of the constitution which will not bear a literal construction. Take, for instance, article 4, section 1—“Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may, by general laws, prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved and the effect thereof.” Congress has undertaken to prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved, but they have not undertaken, and probably never will undertake, to prescribe the effect they are to have. What is the true import of the words “full faith and credit,” is a question that has puzzled the bar and the bench, and about which a contrariety of opinion exists among the learned in the law. But the word “effect,” take it literally and it conveys a most extraordinary power to Congress. A power which would swallow up the State sovereignties. An act of the Legislature of any one State is a public act, and by this section Congress has the power, by a general law, to declare what effect such an act shall have in another State. The Legislature of Virginia, for instance, pass an act limiting the rights of suffrage to freeholders; take this section literally, and Congress may declare that such act shall have the same effect in Pennsylvania or Massachusetts as it has in Virginia, and vice versa. An effect which I am sure would not be very kindly received either in Pennsylvania, or Massachusetts.

To give a liberal and beneficial construction to the constitution has ever been a favorite doctrine with me, especially in relation to the powers of the Executive, which in ordinary times is the feeblest branch of the Government. The common rules of equitable construction applicable to statutes and other instruments, apply with greater force to the Constitution of the United States, because it is more general in its terms and less specific in its provisions. I hold it, therefore sir, that we ought so to construe the constitution as will best answer the intention which the makers had in view. That whatever is within the intent or equity of the constitution, is within the constitution, although it be not within the strict letter. And e contra, whatever may be within the letter, if it be not within the intent and spirit, is not within the constitution. These rules are founded upon the imperfection of the human mind, which cannot foresee and set down every case in express terms; upon the laws of nature and reason; upon the experience of man; and apply in all cases, except only where there is a manifest technical positive rule of law to the contrary.

I now, Mr. President, approach the main question. It arises under the second section of the second article of the constitution.

“The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session."

It is manifest, from the first cited clause of this section, that the President and the Senate possess conjointly the general power of appointment. It is equally manifest, from the second cited clause of the section, that the President alone possesses a modified power of appointment.

The main question then is, had the President an authority, under the modified power, to issue the commissions, during the recess of the Senate, to the Ministers named in the resolutions, to continue in force to the end of the next session of the Senate and no longer.

First. Is the authority within the letter of the constitution?

Second. Is it within the intent and policy of the constitution?

I beg gentlemen to remember that it has been the wisdom of most Governments to intrust the management of their foreign affairs to the head or chief. That, under this Government, the President, as the supreme executive officer, is charged with this subject. That a Minister is no more than an agent through whom these concerns are managed. That, to manage them with success and advantage, secrecy and immediate despatch are oftentimes necessary, in negotiations particularly.

The office then of a public Minister is the medium through which the Executive is enabled to manage our foreign relations, and particularly to conduct negotiations. It is an office wholly different from the ordinary offices created by the constitution or by law. It is an office without limitation as to number, or duration of tenure, with regard to which neither the constitution nor laws have prescribed the duties. It is without limitation as to number, because the nature of the office renders it necessary that the number should depend upon the emergencies of the Government; upon the particular state of your foreign affairs; upon the number of the foreign nations with whom you have intercourse, either political or commercial. It is an office without limitation of tenure, because no one can tell how long it may be necessary to continue it. A negotiation may last a week, or it may last six months. Your intercourse with any foreign power may be interrupted in various ways, by a misunderstanding or by a sudden rupture. It is an office to which neither the constitution nor laws have prescribed the duties, because the duties must necessarily depend upon the course of events and the particular state of our foreign relations. The duties are left with the discretion of the Executive. In short, it is an office not created by the constitution, nor by any municipal law, but emanates from the laws of nations, and is common to all civilized Governments. The Minister is subject to these laws, and he is under the protection of these laws. The constitution barely directs the modes in which the Minister shall be appointed. But when appointed, when he shall depart, how long he shall continue, what duties he is to perform, the nature of his instructions, in short, every thing that is vital, depends solely upon the Executive and the laws of nations.

It is an office, if it may be so called, sui generis. The number may be multiplied to any extent, or diminished. It is brought forth with the occasion, and disappears when the occasion ceases. When not filled, if it exists at all, it is only in contemplation. Where is the office which you, Mr. Vice President, and your associates filled, when Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary to the French Republic? Can the honorable mover lay his hand upon it, or can the powers of man reproduce it? In short, where are all the offices which our Ministers respectively have filled at the Court of London, anterior to the declaration of war? They have merged and can never again be called into action. When the relations of peace shall be restored, we shall have new appointments and new offices.

The office of a public Minister, therefore, depends upon events, upon the state of foreign affairs, and is authorized by the laws of nations. Any Government may use it, which recognizes these laws, and none can which does not. For it is an office which requires the assent of foreign powers, and depends upon the common laws of nations for protection.

Upon the whole, it is an office not durable and permanent, as are the ordinary offices established by the constitution and by law—but ephemeral, existing no longer than the occasion which gave birth to it, and dependent upon the transitions of time and events. The office in truth attaches whenever the occasion arises to use it, and the act of appointment is the consummation of the law.

If therefore the occasion arises whilst the Senate are in session, the office must be consummated by the concurrent act of the President and the Senate. If it arises during the recess of the Senate, it may be consummated by the act of the President alone, subject however to expire at the end of the next session of the Senate.

If this view be correct, and the occasion for the office happens during the recess of the Senate, then the office attaches during the recess, and of consequence the vacancy happens during the recess, which would bring the power of the President to fill it up strictly within the letter of the constitution.

To apply the argument to the case before us: On the 8th of March, 1813, in the recess of the Senate, M. Daschkoff, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Majesty the Emperor of Russia, by letter addressed to the Secretary of State, communicates to the President, officially, the disposition of His Majesty the Emperor to offer his mediation to His Majesty the King of Great Britain and the United States of America, and at the same time declares that he, M. Daschkoff, is charged to propose it to the President of the United States. On the 11th of the same month, the Secretary of State writes to M. Daschkoff, informing him that the President willingly accepts the offered mediation, to promote peace between the United States and Great Britain, and, further, that such arrangements would be made, without delay, as would afford His Imperial Majesty the opportunity he invited, to interpose his good offices for the accomplishment of so important an event. This then is the occasion for instituting the mission to Russia. It happened in the recess of the Senate. The office then attached, and with it the vacancy, which was filled and the office perfected by issuing the commissions which must have expired with this session of the Senate. As the office and the vacancy happened during the recess, necessarily the office could not have been before full, as the first resolution would seem to require, as a pre-requisite to a vacancy happening.

Whether the letter of M. Daschkoff, of the 8th of March, conveyed the first official information to the President of the offered mediation—whether there was any preconcert to delay the official letter till the Senate had closed their session—whether it was expedient or inexpedient to accept the proposed mediation—whether it comported with the honor and character of this Government to appoint and despatch the Commissioners, upon the mere presumption that Great Britain would accept the mediation, and also appoint commissioners to meet ours, are questions not involved in this discussion. If they were, they are questions which rather concern the abuses, than the rights of power.

I am aware, sir, that the ground which I have discussed, is not without its difficulties. To bring the case within the dead letter, is a task of no very easy performance. But, in my view, all difficulties and doubts vanish before the second ground, which I am about to enter upon, and upon which I principally found my opinion.

The primary objects of the constitution are, the public peace and general welfare. Whatever interpretation may be calculated to insure the one and promote the other, ought in my humble judgment to be given, provided it be within the rules of a liberal and equitable construction. Provided it be within the intent and policy of the constitution.

What, sir, is the intent and policy of the constitution upon this subject? The general power of appointments is given to the President and the Senate. But from the peculiar constitution of the Senate, a body composed of members coming from every State in the Union however distant, a body not permanently in session, but out of session in common times eight months in the year, the framers of the constitution at once saw, that the power, as a general power of appointment, was defective. Hence it became necessary to provide a modified power to remedy this defect, and to represent the general power, when the general power was not in a condition to act. This was indispensable, or else the mischiefs and embarrassments resulting to the Government and the public must have been intolerable. The modified power was therefore intended as a substitute for the general power, when the general power was not in session, and unable to perform its functions. In constituting this modified power, however, the convention was extremely guarded by placing over it the important checks to which I have before adverted, namely; first, that it shall be exercised only when the general power is not in session; secondly, that the commissions issued by it shall endure no longer than necessary to give the general power an opportunity to act upon them. All I contend for is, that we ought not so to restrict the modified power as to defeat the remedy or render it short of its object; that the modified power ought to be able so to act, as to supply the defect of the general power, and that whatever authority is necessary fairly to this purpose is within the intent and equity, if not the letter of the constitution. A case, not within the letter of a statute, is sometimes holden to be within the meaning, because it is within the mischief for which the remedy is provided. It is an established rule of law that such a construction ought to be put upon a remedial statute, as will tend to suppress the mischief intended to be remedied.

Let us now test the construction contended for by the honorable mover, by these rules and principles. Let us see if, according to his construction, the remedy is calculated to suppress the mischief. Illustrations to show its inadequacy are innumerable.

Take the case of the ordinary offices established by the constitution and by law. Suppose any one of them to become vacant by death during the session of the Senate, and that no account of the death reaches the President before the Senate close their session. Here the vacancy does not happen during the recess, but during the session. Suppose the Collector of the port of New Orleans to die on this day, and that the intelligence of his death does not reach this place before we adjourn. In this case the vacancy surely does not happen in the recess. What is to be done? The Collector is an officer whose services are necessary to the daily operations of the Government. Are the Senate to be convened? Well. The Senate are convened from all parts of this extended empire, at great expense to the nation and personal inconvenience to the members. To do what? To appoint a Collector! Well. The Collector is appointed and the Senate are adjourned; but, before many of the members get to their distant homes, it is announced that the District Judge in the State of Vermont is dead, and that he died while the Senate were in session appointing the Collector for New Orleans. Sir, where is this expense and perplexity to end?

APRIL, 1814.]

Executive Appointments.

[SENATE.]

Mr. President, if these ordinary occasions illustrate the incompetency of the remedy, as the honorable mover would restrict it, the extraordinary offices of public Ministers still more forcibly and irresistibly illustrate it.

In the management of the foreign affairs of a great commercial nation, having intercourse with all the commercial powers of the earth, in order to keep up this intercourse to advantage, and to preserve the relations of peace and friendship, many agents, diplomatic and consular, are necessary. In the appointment of these the utmost secrecy and despatch are oftentimes of vital importance.

In seasons of war every thing may depend on time. The event of a single battle may present a happy moment for negotiation. Great and sudden changes are perpetually taking place in the affairs of nations. A sudden war may break out between one nation and another, between a foreign power and the United States; and will the honorable mover have it that there is no power in this Government competent to act with all the secrecy and promptitude which such an emergency might require?

Sometimes it may so happen that the time for instituting a negotiation may not depend on ourselves, but other powers. Suppose a General Congress, to treat of a general peace, be agreed upon, and the United States are invited to join. The delay incident to the invitation would be long enough, but if the preparatory steps are to be retarded until the Senate could be called, it is more than probable that the other powers concerned would not have the patience to wait for us. Indeed, their views and situation might not admit of it.

Take the doctrine of the honorable mover, and if a decisive battle be fought in Canada, resulting in our favor, and the enemy offer peace on our own terms, there is no power to appoint a commissioner even to conclude the preliminary articles, without a delay of at least two months, if the Senate happen not to be in session! In the mean time the enemy may be reinforced, or other changes happen, and the advantageous moment to end the war be lost, perhaps, forever.

If the late despatch from Lord Castlereagh had arrived in the recess of the Senate, as it well might have done, was the President to wait till the Senate could be convened, without taking even a preparatory step? Must the war be waged two months longer, and must the enemy wait our own time?

Suppose England had in good faith accepted the offered mediation of Russia, and that the acceptance had been announced with the offer to us, were we to wait until the Senate could be got together? Were two precious months to be lost?

If your citizens are in captivity in Algiers—if your seamen are unjustly and cruelly confined in a foreign port, and the intelligence happen to arrive during the recess, the President has not even the power to appoint even a Consul to go to their immediate relief!

Surrounded as we are with Indian tribes, if a war suddenly break out, in the recess of the Senate, there is no power to send a commissioner to make explanations or to treat with the hostile tribe—nor to make friends with the neighboring tribes, but we must wait until the Senate are summoned; and in the mean time those we might have gained over to us are by the delay turned against us.

Sir, the construction contended for by the honorable mover, is fraught with mischievous consequences, with evils and embarrassments incalculable. There is a passage in one of the numbers of the Federalist (by Mr. Hamilton) so applicable to this subject, that I will, with the permission of the Senate, trouble them while I read it—

“It seldom happens in the negotiations of treaties, of whatever nature, but that perfect secrecy and immediate despatch are sometimes requisite. They who have turned their attention to the affairs of men, must have perceived that there are tides in them. Tides very irregular in their duration, strength, and direction, and seldom found to run twice exactly in the same manner or measure. To discern and profit by these tides in national affairs, is the business of those who preside over them; and they who have had much experience on this head inform us that there frequently are occasions when days, nay, when even hours are precious. The loss of a battle, the death of a Prince, the removal of a Minister, or other circumstances intervening to change the present posture and aspect of affairs, may turn the most favorable tide into a course opposite to our wishes. As in the field, so in the cabinet, there are moments to be seized as they pass, and they who preside in either should be left in capacity to improve them. So often and so essentially have we heretofore suffered from the want of secrecy and despatch, that the constitution would have been inexcusably defective, if no attention had been paid to those objects. Those matters which in negotiations usually require the most secrecy and the most despatch, are those preparatory and auxiliary measures which are not otherwise important, in a national view, than as they tend to facilitate the attainment of the objects of the negotiation.”

I contend for no more than, that the President, in the absence of the Senate, should possess the power to adopt those preparatory and auxiliary measures, without which, to use the language of the accomplished statesman just quoted, the constitution would have been inexcusably defective. The mere appointment of an Ambassador or Minister is but a preparatory and auxiliary step towards negotiation. The material and most essential part is the treaty. It is this which is the most important in a national view. This cannot be finally ratified and confirmed, without the advice and consent of the Senate, and that too with the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present. If the Senate are not in session when the treaty is concluded, they must be convened; and in most instances the President, who is always advised of the progress and probable issue of the negotiation, may so manage as to call the Senate and have them in session at or about the time the treaty arrives. At any rate, after a treaty is signed, a reasonable time is always allowed for its ratification and exchange, and in fixing this time regard would always be paid to the distance and nature of ratifying powers.

It appears to me, then, that the construction for which I contend, to continue the language of the same author just quoted, gives to negotiations every advantage which can be derived from talents, integrity, and a deliberate investigation on the one hand, and from secrecy and despatch on the other. It is a construction founded in fitness and convenience, and supported by contemporaneous interpretation.

It has been the practical construction of the constitution from the earliest stages of the Government, and upon experience was found to be essential to its due administration. It commenced with General Washington, was continued by Mr. Adams, and became much more prevalent with Mr. Jefferson, as appears by the numerous cases to be found in the Department of State, and upon the Executive Journal of the Senate.

The honorable mover has cited the case of Mr. Monroe while Minister at the French Republic, from the Life of Washington by Marshall. The conduct of Mr. Monroe had not been satisfactory to General Washington; at the same time he did not wish to recall him, but rather preferred sending another minister to be associated with him. The difficulty was, inasmuch as Mr. Monroe was in the office, there could be no vacancy, so as to authorize the President to fill it up during the recess of the Senate. This seems to have been the opinion of General Washington, and therefore, to obviate the difficulty and create the vacancy, Mr. Monroe was recalled and a successor appointed in the recess. The case therefore does not apply.

As to the form of the commissions which issued to the commissioners named in the resolution, I do not attach so much importance as the honorable mover has done. The objection is, that these commissions were not limited to expire at the end of the next session of the Senate, but are general and without limitation. And the honorable mover has read some commissions issued by General Washington, to show that he had always introduced the limitation.

But it seems that the honorable mover was mistaken; for, upon a more particular search, commissions are found wherein General Washington has omitted the limitation.

But what to my mind is a conclusive answer to this objection is, that there is no form prescribed by the constitution or law, in which commissions are to issue, and therefore the form depends upon the pleasure of the Executive, who alone is authorized to issue them.

Can the addition or omission of the limitation vary the nature of the commission? If a commission issue to A, appointing him Chief Justice of the United States, is it material to say, to hold the same during good behavior, or that A is invested with all the powers and entitled to all the emoluments of right belonging to a Chief Justice of the United States? I apprehend not.

I am aware, sir, that commissions usually issue in some such form, but the greater part is empty verbiage. Does the judge derive the tenure of his office from the commission? No. But from the constitution. Does he derive his powers and emoluments from the commission? Surely not. But from the constitution and the laws. He derives nothing from the commission but the mere appointment, which can be made as well in three lines as thirty.

So if a commission issue in the recess of the Senate, whether it express the limitation or not, it necessarily expires at the time limited by the constitution; for it is the constitution, not the commission, that is operative as to the limitation.

Mr. President, it appears to me that most of the arguments of the honorable mover proceed from the abuse, rather than a just and proper exercise of the power. These are arguments which prove too much, and, if admitted, would go to take away from the Government all power. An argument against the abuse of a thing is no argument against the use of it. If such arguments are admitted, there is no power, no institution, however sacred, which may not be assailed. Religion, the altar itself, would not be exempt. For we know that they afford masks for hypocrites and impostors.

You have already, sir, given a construction to the constitution, conferring upon the Executive a power infinitely more liable to abuse than the one in question, and a construction, too, give me leave to say, vastly more doubtful than that for which I contend. I refer, sir, to that power by which the President undertakes to remove an officer, at his pleasure, without consulting the Senate. This we know was not Mr. Hamilton's understanding of the constitution; and we believe that such a construction would never have been put upon the constitution, but for the unlimited confidence, in General Washington. This construction has opened the door to an abuse which if practised, would virtually destroy the controlling power of the Senate over appointments. The President nominates A, Minister to the Court of St. Petersburg, to-day, and the nomination is approved by the Senate. The Senate will close their session in a few days. The President then supercedes A, and, it being in the recess, appoints B, his particular favorite, but who would not have passed the Senate. B.'s commission is good to the end of the next session of the Senate. Just before the end of the next session the President nominates C, who is approved by the Senate, but, as soon as the Senate have adjourned, he supersedes C, and renews the commission to B. Thus, by an abuse of this power to supersede or remove, the President may virtually deprive the Senate of their undoubted right to participate in the general power of appointment.

Sir, what is the power for which I contend compared to this power? A power of all others the most susceptible of abuse; and when abused, a most cruel engine of proscription and oppression. What is it, compared to the power to recall your foreign ministers at pleasure; to receive all foreign ministers; to dismiss foreign ministers; to acknowledge the sovereignty and independence of foreign Governments; to instruct your own ministers;—what is it, compared to the power to reject a treaty?

These are all powers which the President confessedly possesses. Powers involving the relations of peace and war, and every interest which depends upon foreign connection and intercourse. Powers compared to which the one in question sinks into utter insignificance.

And does it follow that the President ought not to have these extraordinary powers, because, in the hands of wicked and unprincipled men, they may be abused? Does it follow, because the President may rashly reject an honorable and advantageous treaty, and thereby involve the nation in restrictions and war, that therefore the President ought to have no concern in the treaty-making power? Does it follow, because a President may petulantly dismiss a foreign minister, and thereby break off an important negotiation, that therefore he ought not to be intrusted with such a power? If he will not receive a foreign minister, and acknowledge a foreign Government, in every case where the public interest requires it, does it follow that he ought not to have the power to do so at all? What is the power for which I contend? A mere power to make temporary appointments when the general power is not in capacity to act. This is denied. But, when the agent is once appointed, it is admitted that when he is to act, how he is to act, what he is to do, his instructions, his correspondence—all depend upon the Executive pleasure. In short, when the agent is once constituted, you surrender him up to the President, with every thing else that is vital on the subject of negotiation or foreign intercourse.

Before I conclude, Mr. President, permit me to remark, that the constitution has wisely divided the powers of the Government among the several departments, taking care to adapt each department to the powers assigned it; that it is highly important that every department should maintain its powers free from encroachment, and unimpaired.

While, therefore, it is the duty of the Senate to defend their rights and powers, let the Senate take care that they do not encroach upon the rights and powers of the Executive. Let it be remembered that the Executive is constitutionally the feeblest branch of the Government. I speak not, sir, in reference to the present disordered state of the body politic, when even Congress seem to have forgotten themselves, and surrendered their powers (and even more) into the hands of the President—when they have made him almost as absolute as a dictator. But, I speak of those rights and powers which legitimately belong to him, according to the great principle of the constitution.

The Senate, as an integral branch of the Government, are more permanent and independent. The individual members are chosen for a longer term. If the President abuses his powers in a manner amounting to a misdemeanor, he is liable to impeachment, and this body constitutes the High Court which is to try him, and, if convicted, which is to remove him from office. When, on the other hand, the Senate are permanent and independent, as an integral body, they are answerable to no power on earth, but a revolutionary power.

In ordinary times, therefore, the danger is, that the Senate will encroach upon the Executive, and not the Executive upon the Senate; that the stronger will trench upon the weaker, and not the weaker upon the stronger power.

Mr. President, I would be the last man upon this floor, knowingly to surrender any one power which the constitution has deposited here. I am too deeply impressed with the importance of this branch of the Government. I believe it to be the sheet anchor of the constitution and the bulwark of our liberties. It is this nation's best and last hope. When the other ramparts of the constitution shall have been broken down, here will be made the last stand against the assaults of party spirit and the storms of faction.

SATURDAY, April 16.

Retaliation.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, complying with their resolutions of the 2d of February and 9th of March.

JAMES MADISON.

APRIL 16, 1814.

The following is the report:

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred several resolutions of the Senate of the 2d of February and 9th of March last, has the honor to submit to the President the following report :

Although these resolutions are of different dates, and refer to subjects in some respects distinct in their nature, yet, as they are connected in others of considerable importance, which bear essentially on the conduct of the parties in the present war, it is thought proper to comprise them in the same report.

The first of those resolutions calls for the names of the individuals who were selected from the American prisoners of war and sent to Great Britain for trial; their places of residence in the United States; the times when and the courts by which they were admitted to become citizens; the regiments to which they belong; when and where they were taken; with copies of any official correspondence respecting the treatment of the prisoners of war, and of any orders for retaliation on either side.

The other resolutions request information of the conduct of Great Britain towards her native subjects, taken in arms against her, and of the general practice of the nations of Europe relative to naturalization, and the employment in war, each, of the subjects of the other; of the cases, with their circumstances, in which any civilized nation has punished its native subjects taken in arms against it, for which punishment retaliation was inflicted by the nation in whose service they were taken. And, lastly, under what circumstances and on what grounds Great Britain has refused to discharge native citizens of the United States impressed into her service; and what has been her conduct towards American seamen on board her ships of war, at and since the commencement of the present war with the United States.

The paper marked A contains the names of the American prisoners who were sent to England for trial by the British commander in Canada; of the corps to which they belong; of the times when and of the places where they were taken. Of their places of residence in the United States; of the times and the courts in which they were admitted to become citizens, there is no evidence in this Department, nor is there any to show whether they were naturalized or native citizens of the United States. This paper contains also a copy of the orders of both Governments for retaliation, and of the correspondence between their respective Commissioners concerning the treatment of prisoners.

The paper marked B states various grounds on which the British Government has refused to deliver up American seamen impressed into the British service, on the application of the agents of the United States, regularly authorized to demand them, with the correspondence relating to the same. It communicates, also, such information as this department has been able to obtain of the conduct of the British Government towards American seamen on board British ships of war, at and since the commencement of the present war. Among the causes assigned for their detention, the following are the most deserving of notice :

1. That they had no documents, or that their documents were irregular.
2. That they were released from prison in Gottenburg.
3. That they were exchanged as British subjects.
4. Were said to be impostors.
5. To have married in England.
6. Did not answer the descriptions given of them in their protections.

7. Had attempted to desert.

8. Were sent into the service for smuggling.

9. Were not to be found on board of the ship stated.

10. Had voluntarily entered into the British service.

11. Were natives of foreign countries—Prussia, Sweden, Italy, &c.

It is probable that some of the seamen, whose discharges were demanded, may not have been native citizens of the United States, but very presumable that the greater part were. Indeed, the pretext assigned for their detention seems to admit it. Had they been native subjects of England, being there, their origin might have been traced. But that is the ground in few instances only. In urging that some had no protections, or that their protections were irregular; that others had been exchanged as British prisoners; were impostors; had attempted to desert; did not answer the protections given them; were natives of Prussia, Sweden, &c., it is fairly to be inferred that the public authority in England, to whom this duty is assigned, sought rather to evade the application than to justify the refusal. The pretext that some were natives of Prussia, Sweden, &c., deserves particular attention. On this circumstance the Secretary will remark only, that, in extending impressment in American vessels to persons who could not be mistaken for British subjects, and refusing to surrender them, on application, to the voluntary service from which they were taken, it is evident that the recovery of British seamen has not been the sole object of the practice.

By the report of the American Commissary of prisoners in England, it appears that a considerable number of our seamen had been transferred from British ships of war to prisons; that their exchange for British seamen taken in battle was demanded, in the first instance, but that that claim seems to have been since waived. It might have been expected that the British Government, on being satisfied that these men, or that any of them, were American citizens, would have liberated and sent them home at its own charge. They are, however, still held prisoners in confinement. That many of them, if not all, are native citizens, cannot be doubted, for had the proof not been irresistible, it cannot be presumed, while so many others are detained on board British ships of war, that these would have been exempted from that service. That many are still detained on board British ships of war may be fairly inferred, even without other evidence, from the indiscriminate manner of British impressment; from the distant service in which the men thus impressed are often necessarily employed, depriving their friends of an opportunity to communicate with them; and from the inconsiderable number discharged compared with that which has been demanded. Without relying altogether on the reports heretofore made to Congress by this Department, the letter of Commodore Rodgers, hereunto annexed, affords data from which an estimate may be formed. On this point, the correspondence between General Taylor and the Captain of the British ship the Dragon, and Commodore Decatur and the commander, Capel, deserve also particular attention. If the British Government would order a strict search to be made, through the British navy, for American seamen, it would then be seen how many of our native citizens have participated in the lot of the unfortunate men mentioned in the correspondence referred to.

The contrast which these documents present, in the pretensions and conduct of the United States, cannot fail to make a deep impression in favor of the latter. The British Government impresses into its Navy native citizens of the United States, and compels them to serve in it, and, in many instances, even to fight against their country, while it arrests as traitors and menaces with death persons suspected to be native British subjects, for having fought under our standard against British forces, although they had voluntarily entered into our Army after having emigrated to the United States and incorporated themselves into the American society. The United States, on the other hand, have forced no persons into their service, nor have they sought, nor are they disposed to punish, any who after having freely emigrated to any part of the British dominions and settled there, may have entered voluntarily into the British army.

The remaining inquiries relate to objects other than the immediate conduct of the parties in the present war. They demand information of the conduct of Great Britain, and of other powers in past times, without limitation in the retrospect, in circumstances bearing on the question of retaliation. The information required relates to the following points:

1. The conduct of Great Britain and the other nations of Europe, as to naturalization, and the employment in war, each, of the subjects of the other.
2. As to the punishment of their native subjects taken in arms against them, in the service of other powers.
3. Examples of retaliation by the latter in such cases.

These inquiries necessarily involve an extensive research into the history and jurisprudence of the nations of Europe. For so important a task the other duties of the Secretary of State have altogether disqualified him since the call was made. The approaching close of the session does not leave him time for more than the following observations:

That all the nations of Europe naturalize foreigners; that they all employ in their service the subjects of each other, and frequently against their native countries, even when not regularly naturalized; that they all allow their own subjects to emigrate to foreign countries; that, although examples may be found of the punishment of their native subjects taken in arms against them, the examples are few, and have either been marked by peculiar circumstances, taking them out of the controverted principle, or have proceeded from the passions or policy of the occasion. Even in prosecutions and convictions, having the latter origin, the final act of punishment has, with little exception, been prevented by a sense of equity and humanity, or a dread of retaliation. It is confidently believed that no instance can be found in which the alleged purposes of the enemy against the twenty-three prisoners in question, under all the circumstances which belong to their case, even though any of them may not have been regularly naturalized, are countenanced by the proceedings of any European nation; that, if no instances occur of retaliation in the few cases requiring it, or in any of them, by the Governments employing such persons, it has been, as is presumed, because the punishment which had been inflicted by the native country might be accounted for on some principle other than its denial of the right of emigration and naturalization. Had the Government employing the persons, so punished by their native country, retaliated in such cases, it might have incurred the reproach either of countenancing acknowledged crimes, or of following the example of the other party in acts of cruelty, exciting horror, rather than of fulfilling its pledge to innocent persons in support of rights fairly obtained, and sanctioned by the general opinion and practice of all the nations of Europe, ancient and modern.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 14, 1814.

The Message and accompanying papers were read.

The Senate adjourned to 5 o'clock this evening.

MONDAY, April 18.

Retirement of the Vice President.

The President having informed the Senate that they had passed on all matters, Legislative and Executive, on their files, and that nothing remained on his table, expressed a desire to be heard a few words, on what, by some gentlemen, was viewed in an interesting light.

He observed that, at the last session of Congress, several gentlemen of the Senate had intimated a wish that he would retire from the Chair two or three weeks before the time of adjournment, and would thus give to the Senate an opportunity for choosing a President pro tempore. That other gentlemen expressed a contrary desire, and thought that the President should remain in the Chair, and adjourn the Senate. That, in support of these propositions, precedents were urged on both sides. That, on considering the subject, the President had conceived, as a war existed and had produced a special session of Congress, he was differently circumstanced from any of his predecessors, and was under an obligation to remain in the Chair until the important business of the session was finished. At this period, an honorable member, who had favored an early retirement of the President, expressed an opinion, that it would be best for him to adjourn the Senate, and he adopted the measure. The President further observed that, during the present session, the subject had been revived, and had induced him cursorily to look into it; the result of which he would communicate to the Senate. He then proceeded to observe that the constitution provides, "the Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate;" and that an act passed the 1st of March, 1792, "relative to the election of the President and Vice President," &c., in the ninth section provides, "that in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice President of the United States, the President of the Senate pro tempore; and in case there shall be no President of the Senate, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the time being, shall act as President of the United States, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected." If, then, he stated, it should happen that during any session, the President should die, the Vice President would fill the Chair of State, and the Senate would appoint a President pro tempore, who would succeed the Vice President, in case of his death, during the next ensuing recess of Congress. And the same would happen in case of the death of the Vice President, in any session, and of the President, in the next ensuing recess of Congress. But, if both the President and Vice President should die in any such recess, and the Vice President should have previously adjourned the Senate, then there would be no President pro tempore, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives would fill the Chair of Government, according to law. He further observed that, on this view of the subject, it might be said, that the constitution did not contemplate the appointment of a President pro tempore, because the words being, "the Vice President of the United States shall," and not may, "be President of the Senate," are imperative, and leave no discretion on his part, to quit the Chair before he had adjourned the Senate. And that, in regard to the law, it having provided for the deficiency of a President pro tempore, favors the construction mentioned of the constitution, and considers the Vice President as being under the necessity of remaining in the Chair until he shall have adjourned the Senate. That, on the other hand, may be urged, the high station and dignity of the Senate, resulting from its various important powers, and its other qualities, and establishing a claim, that an officer representing it should, in the events mentioned, succeed to the Chair of State. The law, also, giving a preference to the President pro tempore, when in competition with the Speaker, appears to establish a principle, which the practice of the Senate, under that law, has, in a certain degree, carried into effect; for, from the passing that act to the present time, there are but one or two instances in which the adjournment of the Senate has not been by a President pro tempore. As, then, the dignity of the Senate, its rights and privileges, (all of which the President conceived himself bound and was disposed to support,) seemed to be involved in the question of appointing, in each session of the Senate, a President pro tempore to adjourn it; and as it may also happen that there may be no

Speaker, the Vice President said he should hereafter retire in time for the appointment of a President pro tempore. But he wished always to be understood, that this determination would be in conformity with his sense of duty to the public, in respect to legislative proceedings; and that, on every occasion, he should retain his seat whilst any important bill or measure was pending, and was to be finished at that session.

Having made these observations, and others, in regard to his views of the obligatory nature of laws, on all persons in Government, on those who had opposed, and on those who had supported the laws, whilst pending as bills, as well as on the community at large, particularly alluding to the law which had declared war and increased his responsibility; and the tendency of a contrary conduct to prostrate the laws and Government; he said, if the Senate had no objection he would now retire, with an assurance that his best wishes would follow the Senate and every member of it; and his sincere hopes that, on their return to their homes, respectively, they would find their families and friends in health, and be happy in their affectionate interviews.

In the absence of the VICE PRESIDENT, on motion, by Mr. KING, the Senate proceeded to the choice of a President pro tempore, as the constitution provides; and the Hon. JOHN GAILLARD was elected.

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States, and acquaint him that the Senate have, in the absence of the VICE PRESIDENT, elected the Hon. JOHN GAILLARD, President of the Senate pro tempore.

Ordered, That the Secretary make a similar communication to the House of Representatives.

The Senate adjourned until five o'clock P. M.

Five o'clock in the Evening.

Adjournment.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House, having finished the business before them, are about to adjourn.

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate, having finished the legislative business before them, are about to adjourn.

Agreeably to the joint resolution, the PRESIDENT adjourned the Senate, to meet on the last Monday in October next.

THIRTEENTH CONGRESS.—SECOND SESSION.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

IN

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 6, 1813.

The SPEAKER (Hon. HENRY CLAY, of Kentucky) took the Chair at a few minutes after 12 o'clock.

Having stated the severe indisposition of the Clerk of the House, (P. MAGRUDER,) which disabled him from attending, the SPEAKER intimated that, if no objection was made to the procedure, the Assistant Clerk (Mr. G. MAGRUDER) would act until the Clerk should be sufficiently recovered to attend to his duty in the House.

No objection being made to the proposition, the Assistant Clerk proceeded to call over the roll by States; when it appeared that the following gentlemen were present:

From New Hampshire—Roger Vose.

From Massachusetts—William Baylies, Abijah Bigelow, Daniel Dewey, Levi Hubbard, Cyrus King, John Reed, Nathaniel Ruggles, and James Parker.

From Connecticut—Epaphroditus Champion, John Davenport, jr., Lyman Law, Jonathan O. Mosely, Timothy Pitkin, and Lewis B. Sturges.

From Vermont—William C. Bradley, Ezra Butler, Richard Skinner, and Charles Rich.

From New York—Daniel Avery, Oliver C. Comstock, Jonathan Fiak, James Geddes, Thos. P. Grosvener, Moses Kent, John Lefferts, John Lovett, Jacob Markell, Morris S. Miller, Moses Moffit, Ebenezer Sage, William S. Smith, John W. Taylor, and Elisha I. Winter.

From New Jersey—Lewis Condict, William Cox, Jacob Hufty, James Schureman, Richard Stockton, and Thomas Ward.

From Delaware—Thomas Cooper.

From Maryland—Stevenson Archer, Joseph Kent, Alexander McKim, Nicholas R. Moore, and Philip Stewart.

From Virginia—William A. Burwell, John Dawson, John W. Eppes, Thomas Gholson, Peterson Goodwyn, John P. Hungerford, John Kerr, Joseph Lewis, jr., William McCoy, Hugh Nelson, Thomas Newton, John Smith, and Francis White.

From North Carolina—Willis Alston, John Culpeper, Peter Forney, Nathaniel Macon, Joseph Pearson, Israel Pickens, and Bartlett Yancey.

From South Carolina—Samuel Farrow, Theodore Gourdin, John Kershaw, and William Lowndes.

From Georgia—William Barnett, Bolling Hall, and George M. Troup.

From Kentucky—Joseph Desha, William P. Duval, Samuel McKee, Thomas Montgomery, Stephen Ormsby, and Solomon P. Sharp.

From Tennessee—John H. Bowen, Thomas K. Harris, Perry W. Humphreys, and John Rhea.

From Ohio—John Alexander, Rezin Beall, James Caldwell, William Creighton, jr., and John McLean.

From Louisiana—Thomas Bolling Robertson.

It appearing that a majority of the whole House, forming a quorum thereof, was present, the SPEAKER announced the readiness of the House to proceed to business.

The following new members were qualified, and took their seats:

From Pennsylvania, DANIEL UDREE, in the place of Mr. Hyneman, resigned; and EDWARD CROUCH, in the place of Mr. Gloninger, resigned.

JONATHAN JENNINGS, the Delegate from the Territory of Indiana; EDWARD HEMPSTEAD, the Delegate from the Territory of Missouri; and SHADBACK BOND, the Delegate from the Territory of Illinois, severally appeared, and took their seats.

WILLIAM LATTIMORE appeared, and produced his credentials, as the Delegate from the Territory of Mississippi, was qualified, and took his seat.

TUESDAY, December 7.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, TIMOTHY PICKERING and LABAN WHEATON; from Vermont, WILLIAM STRONG; from Rhode Island, RICHARD JACKSON, jr.; from Connecticut, BENJAMIN TALLMADGE; from New York, THOMAS J. OAKLEY; from Maryland, ALEXANDER C. HANSON; from Virginia, JOHN CLOPTON and HUGH CAPEERTON; from North Carolina, RICHARD STANFORD and MESHAACK FRANKLIN; from South Carolina, JOHN C. CALHOUN; and from Tennessee, JOHN SEVIER, severally appeared, and took their seats.

President's Message.

A Message from the President was then received; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

[For this Message see Senate Proceedings of this date, ante, page 75.]

WEDNESDAY, December 8.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, WILLIAM ELY and ELIJAH BRIGHAM; from North Carolina, WILLIAM KENNEDY; and from Tennessee, FELIX GRUNDY, severally appeared, and took their seats.

THURSDAY, December 9.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, SAMUEL TAGGART; and from New York, JOTHAM POST, jr., and ZEBULON R. SHIPARD, severally appeared, and took their seats.

FRIDAY, December 10.

Several other members, to wit: from Pennsylvania, JAMES WHITEHILL; from Maryland, ROBERT WRIGHT; from Virginia, DANIEL SHERFFEY; from North Carolina WILLIAM GASTON; and from South Carolina, JOHN J. CHAPPELL, severally appeared, and took their seats.

Missouri Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. HEMPSTEAD,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the speedy and final confirmation of all grants of land, or orders of survey, lawfully made and completed, by the proper officer, in the late District of Louisiana, now Territory of Missouri, during the time the said Territory was in the actual possession of Spain or France, and while either of those powers exercised the sovereignty therein.

Resolved, That said committee inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, for granting all such claims to land, in said Territory, not exceeding six hundred and forty acres to each claimant, where the claimant, or the person under whom he claims, had actually cultivated the same, prior to the 20th of December, 1813.

Resolved, That said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, to enable persons claiming lands in said Territory, and which shall not be confirmed or granted, under the laws of the United States, to contest the legality of such decisions in a court of law.

Resolved, That said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the right of pre-emption to actual settlers on the public lands in said Territory, and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, for the appointment of an additional Judge of the Supreme Court, in the Territory of Missouri, exclusively for the District of Arkansas, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

SATURDAY, December 11.

The doors being opened, Mr. BOYD of New York, Mr. REA of Pennsylvania, Mr. KING of North Carolina, and Mr. CHEVES of South Carolina, severally appeared, and took their seats. And the House then adjourned.

MONDAY, December 13.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, GEORGE BRADBURY; from Rhode Island, ELISHA R. POTTER; from Virginia, JAMES PLEASANTS, jr.; and from Georgia, THOMAS TELFAIR, severally appeared, and took their seats.

TUESDAY, December 14.

Two other members, to wit, from Georgia, JOHN FORSYTH, and from Kentucky, JAMES CLARKE, appeared, and took their seats.

WEDNESDAY, December 15.

Several other members, to wit: from New York, ABRAHAM HASBROUCK, and from Virginia, THOMAS M. BAYLY and JAMES JOHNSON, appeared, and took their seats.

THURSDAY, December 16.

Another member, to wit: from South Carolina, DAVID R. EVANS, appeared, and took his seat.

MONDAY, December 20.

Three other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, JOHN WILSON; from New York, SAMUEL SHERWOOD; and from Virginia, JAMES BRECKENRIDGE, appeared, and took their seats.

TUESDAY, December 21.

Retaliation.

Mr. LOVETT moved that the House do come to the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House, if, in his opinion, it will not be inconsistent with the public welfare, all the evidence in his possession relative to the commencement, progress, and present state or the system of retaliation upon prisoners of war, to which the Governments of the United States and Great Britain have lately resorted. Also, that the President of the United States will cause to be laid before this House the names of those prisoners of war who have been sent as criminals to England for trial. Also, evidence when and where those prisoners were captured; at what time they emigrated from the British dominions to the United States; when, and in what manner, they had incorporated themselves into our political society; also, whether any or all of said prisoners have been naturalized agreeably to the laws of the United States, and when; and all other evidence which may serve to show and define the national character of said prisoners of war.

2. Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House, if, in his opinion, it be not inconsistent with the public welfare, any documents, papers, evidence, or information, tending to show that naturalized subjects of Great Britain are, by her, employed in war against their native country, and that they are, by her, protected from punishment, either by means of retaliation, or otherwise, when taken by their native countrymen in arms against them, or in arms invading their territories.

3. Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House, if, in his opinion, it be not inconsistent with the public welfare, such evidence as he may have in his possession, relative to the orders, regulations, and proclamations, which, since the commencement of the present war, have been issued and promulgated in the provinces of Canada, by the Governor General of those provinces, or any other officer or agent of the British Government, relative to the state, condition, rights, and duties, of the native citizens of the United States, residing in those provinces; also, the number of such native citizens of the United States as have, during the present war, borne arms against the United States, within their limits, and what is the present situation of such citizens.

Mr. LOVETT observed: It cannot be necessary for me, sir, to occupy much of the time of this House in avowing the motives which have induced me to submit these resolutions to the consideration of the House; both the motives and the object must be palpable.

It is a fact as notorious as lamentable, that the Government of the United States has entered upon a broad system of retaliation upon prisoners of war; that rapid strides in that system have already been made towards a very serious, and possibly, fatal result. By the progress made in this system many individuals are already deprived of their personal liberty, and, in strong solicitude, are awaiting an uncertain fate. In every point of view the subject of retaliation is important. The lex talionis is bottomed upon necessity and policy; it is the ne plus ultra of civil warfare.

It is the solemn duty of the House to examine, with profound attention, the ground we are advancing upon. The President, in his Message, has called our attention to it; the voice of the nation and of humanity call us to it. We have already so far acted upon the subject as to refer that part of the Message to a select committee. The evidence required will be indispensable for that committee. Let them have it, and thoroughly investigate the business. If we have adopted untenable principles, the sooner they shall be abandoned the better; if questionable ones, the sooner they shall be examined the safer. I would equally avoid the too bold assertion of a doubtful right, as the pusillanimous surrender of an undeniable one. But, sir, if the principles of the lex talionis, as settled by the laws of nations, will bear us out in this system, then out let us go, even if we festoon the borders of our country with halters.

The resolutions were read, and ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

WEDNESDAY, December 22.

Two other members, to wit: from Delaware, HENRY M. RIDGELY; and from Ohio, JAMES KILBOURN, appeared, and took their seats.

THURSDAY, December 23.

Another member, to wit, from Massachusetts, ARTEMAS WARD, appeared, and took his seat.

FRIDAY, December 24.

AYLETT HAWES, from Virginia, appeared, and took his seat.

TUESDAY, December 28.

Petition of General Alexander Smyth.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of Alexander Smyth, of the State of Virginia, praying to retain his rank in the line of the Army as a Brigadier-General. The petition is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The petition of Alexander Smyth, a citizen of Virginia, respectfully represents: That having, in 1807, written to an honorable member of the House of Representatives, that, in case of war with Great Britain, he was desirous to enter into the regular service, he received, in 1808, an appointment as colonel of a regiment of riflemen. That, although war had not commenced, yet the event being probable, he abandoned his profession which was then lucrative, left his family, vacated his seat in the Senate of Virginia as the representative of thirteen counties, and joined the Army of the United States. That your petitioner had the good fortune to give the utmost satisfaction to his superiors, General Wilkinson, General Hampton, General Dearborn, and the late Secretary of War, while acting under their immediate orders; was promoted to the rank of Brigadier and Inspector General in July, 1812; given the command of a brigade in September, and of one of the Armies of the United States in October, in the same year. That, at the expiration of five weeks, during which period he made every exertion in his power to serve the nation, he found it necessary to put his troops into winter quarters. Having determined on that measure, as your petitioner had been absent from his home the last eight winters, much the greater part of the last five years, and the whole of the last fourteen months, and had been refused leave to visit his family in the month of July preceding, and calculating that it was probable the campaign of 1813 might terminate his existence, he, without resigning his command, asked for leave of absence, which was granted until the 1st of March, 1813, at which time your petitioner was ordered to report himself to the Secretary of War. That your petitioner left his troops in cantonments, under the command of an officer of thirty-six years' experience; and in February, 1813, reported himself by letter to the Secretary of War, and solicited orders; and, as the failure of your petitioner to take Fort George, York, and Kingston, and to winter in Canada, as he was instructed, had created some clamor, your petitioner proposed that an inquiry into his conduct should take place, which the Hon. Secretary, through the medium of the Adjutant General, was pleased to promise; since which time, your petitioner has not had the honor to hear from the War Office.

Your petitioner would further represent, that he has heard that some members of your honorable body are of opinion that, by an act of the last session regulating the staff of the Army of the United States, your petitioner has become a private citizen; and, with this opinion, his own might perhaps accord, were it not impossible to believe that the Congress of the United States, at their last session, could have intentionally committed an act of injustice.

Your petitioner affirms that he has not done or omitted anything to the injury of the nation; that his chief, if not his only error, has consisted in expressing too freely his indignation against those who had done injuries, or omitted to perform duties, to the nation. The motives which led astray, he conceives, might procure for this error forgiveness. That this affirmation is true, he believes he can satisfy a committee or committees of your honorable body on short notice.

Your petitioner has essayed to engage again in the pursuits of civil life; but he finds that, while the din of war continues, it is impossible for him to give the necessary attention to any peaceful pursuit. He desires to serve, to die, if Heaven wills it, in the defence of his country; a country that has protected his infancy, given him a family, and at times distinguished him with considerable honors; from whose Government no act of wrong, personal to himself, will force his esteem, while it maintains, with steady perseverance, that country's rights.

Your petitioner confidently trusts that, in deciding on his prayer, you will be mindful of the rule of justice: "To others do, the law is not severe, what to thyself thou wishest to be done;"—and of the rule of policy:—"The social body is oppressed, when one of its members is oppressed."

The prayer of your petitioner is, that you will revise the act organizing the staff of the Army of the United States, and by a declaratory act preserve the rank of your petitioner, as a Brigadier General in the line, abolishing only his authority as Inspector General.

And your petitioner, &c.

A. SMYTH.

Referred to the Secretary of War.

Relations with France.

Mr. HANSON, of Maryland, announced his intention to offer a resolution to the House. He said that the information to be called for by at least one of the resolutions which he should presently offer, was of a nature to require it to be placed before this body as early as possible. One subject excepted, perhaps no information in the power of the Executive was more important to both sides of the House. He did not, he said, mean to be understood as intimating that some, perhaps many, if not all of the political elect, of those initiated into the mysteries of Government, did not possess a minute knowledge of what was only known to him and others as being buzzed about by faint report. To be sure, said he, we who are political heretics, and of course under judgment of fiery condemnation—we, political unbelievers in the true faith, have no right to expect to be initiated into the ceremonies and mysteries of Government. But, sir, until you let into our minds the light of revelation, I beg we may not be cursed and condemned for what we are not permitted to know and comprehend. It had been said, Mr. H. remarked, by an eminent divine, of evangelical piety and much intellectual information, "that where mystery begins, there true religion ends." This observation, and in quoting it he meant no invidious allusion to any religious sect, applied with much more aptness and force to political than to religious or moral concerns. With all the acknowledged forecast and sagacity of the Chair, Mr. H. observed, the Speaker might not, from what little he had perhaps unnecessarily said on this subject, anticipate the nature of the information he was about to move for. He would therefore quote from the President's Message a passage which appeared to him to render the adoption of the first of the resolves he had before him perfectly proper, and indeed necessary. Mr. H. then recited the passage from the Message, which recommended the adoption of legal provisions for reciprocating the admission into our ports of vessels of friendly nations, who admit within their waters our public and private armed vessels. This part of the Message, he said, although the word France was nowhere contained in it, related exclusively to that Government, her dependencies and allies. Now, this part of the Message had been referred to a special committee; and as, in his judgment, an alliance essentially in fact, though not in form, already exists between our country and France, he begged, before the cords which bind us together are drawn closer, that Congress may be enabled to legislate intelligently and with wisdom on this subject. At this day, he said, after the very mortifying disclosures of facts in respect to our relation with France, it would not be disputed here that many humiliating injuries had been heaped by her Chief on this country. It would not be disputed that he had surprised, seized, and confiscated millions of our property perfidiously drawn within his grasp—to so great an amount as that, to use the language of our Minister, its very magnitude destroyed all hopes of its restitution. To say nothing of the very alarming evils which might ensue, the admission into our ports of French vessels of war and privateers, it was certainly proper that this House, before legislating on this subject, should be apprised distinctly of the state of our relations with France. The second resolution he should offer he was perfectly content to let rest on its intrinsic merits; holding himself, however, bound to prove, if the House should let him, all the material facts connected with the subject, and out of which it had grown. Mr. H. then read in his place the following resolutions:

DECEMBER, 1818.]

Conduct of the War.

[H. OF R.]

1. Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to this House any information in his possession, and which may not be improper to divulge, in relation to the omission or refusal of the French Government to accredit the Minister Plenipotentiary sent by the United States to that Court; or, of his reception if accredited; of the time when he was so accredited; and of the progress of his negotiation.

2. Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to cause to be laid before this House any correspondence with, or communication in writing from, the late Minister of France, resident at Washington, on or about the 14th of June, 1809, or subsequently with his successor, M. Serrurier, prescribing or declaring the terms and conditions upon which their Sovereign would consent to treat of amity and commerce with the United States, if any such correspondence or communication be in the possession of the Executive; and, if none such be in the possession of the Executive, that the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House, unless the public interest forbid such disclosure, whether there has not been such a correspondence or communication, which was withdrawn from the archives of the Department of State, and, if so, when and how the same was so withdrawn.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, called for the yeas and nays on the question of consideration; when it appeared there were—for consideration 124, against it 21.

WEDNESDAY, December 29.

Four other members, to wit: from New Hampshire, WILLIAM HALL and DANIEL WEBSTER; and from Massachusetts, SAMUEL DAVIS, and ABIEL WOODS, severally appeared, and took their seats.

Missouri Territory.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for appointing an additional judge in the Missouri Territory.

In the course of the sitting, Mr. HEMPESTEAD, of Missouri, explained the circumstances under which he had been instructed by the Legislature of Missouri to move this measure. The settlement of Arkansas, for which an additional judge was asked, was situated, he said, at the distance of two hundred miles from New Madrid, where the courts are now held, and, since the late earthquakes, the road has become so nearly impassable, that a circuit of three hundred miles was required to pass from one place to the other. So great a distance from the seat of justice obviously constituted, in matters of small amount, a denial of justice, and required the remedy now proposed, &c.

The bill was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

FRIDAY, December 31.

Conduct of the War.

Mr. BRADLEY, of Vermont, said it was well known, that late in the last session of Congress he had offered a resolution for inquiring into the causes of the disasters on our frontier, which had not received the approbation of the House. The objections to the course which he then proposed to pursue appeared now to have lost much of their force, whilst the reasons which recommended its adoption had daily gathered strength. He now again proposed to offer a like resolution to the House, under the persuasion that under any circumstances it was necessary. If a change were even likely to take place in the state of our present relations to foreign powers, justice to the parties concerned required the adoption of the motion. If the war continued, the inquiry was doubly necessary, that it might be made more efficient for the future. Mr. B. said he would not anticipate any objections to his resolution, but would content himself with observing, that it was founded in a sense of justice to the Executive, and not inconsistent with that confidence justly due to it. He had adopted a phraseology, too, which he believed would remove many of the objections urged to it at the last session. Under these impressions he proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House any information in his possession, not improper to be communicated, which may tend to illustrate the causes of the failure of the arms of the United States on the Northern frontier.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, expressed his hope that the gentleman from Vermont would permit his resolution to lie on the table for a day or two—not that he was opposed to it, for he was zealously favorable to its object, but because he wished to move some amendments to the resolution, which would require more time than would be now afforded for reflection on the subject.

Mr. BRADLEY declined assenting to a postponement.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, submitted to the mover, whether the fact was, as stated, that our army have failed? Such was not his impression.

Mr. MURFEE, of North Carolina, required the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, said that if an inquiry of this sort was expedient at all, the shape of the proposition was perhaps as little exceptionable as could have been given to it. But a military inquiry, under any circumstances, was a matter of so much delicacy, that it ought to be well weighed and entered into with much caution and circumspection. This arose from the nature of such inquiries. Secrecy was the soul of military operations. Their details ought to be known to those concerned only; for, if imparted to others, perchance they might find their way to the enemy. It was very well known that military investigations frequently took place in the British House of Commons; but the invariable object of them was to turn out the Ministry. Such an inquiry, however, rarely was instituted even there; and whenever successfully urged, it had invariably been when the object of an expedition or campaign had been abandoned. Mr. T. said he should have liked to have heard from the mover of the resolution something like argument; that much more advantage would result from the adoption, than of evil that might ensue from it. Suppose any possible result of the inquiry—suppose, for instance, that by the communication, in answer to this resolution, it should be shown that General Wilkinson had been prevented by bad weather from commencing his operations in due season; that, when he reached St. Regis, General Wilkinson, without forming a junction with General Hampton, had proceeded on Montreal; or that, even having formed such a junction, it would have been unnecessary for him to proceed onwards; suppose it should turn out that there had been the best military conduct possible on the part of all our Generals; or, that the object of the campaign failed to be accomplished in consequence of the misconduct of either of them, or was the result of cowardice or treason; suppose any result, probable or improbable, and where is the constitutional remedy? How would the gentleman lay his hand on the delinquent? An investigation, it appeared to him, could not properly be made by a tribunal which had not the power to apply the remedy. The investigation, as well as the remedy, rightfully belonged to another department of the Government. Martial law was the only proper corrective to be applied to misconduct of military men. Not, Mr. T. said, that he was opposed to every species of military inquiry. Far from it. There were certain species of such inquiry which it might be perfectly proper to institute. For the purpose of new modelling an army, abolishing certain descriptions of force or grades of office, such inquiries might be necessary. But, said he, for the purpose of reaching any particular military commander, who is supposed to have forfeited the confidence of the people, the remedy is not yours; it belongs to the Executive. Not having the remedy in our hands, the inquiry cannot be productive of any advantage to the public concerns. But with respect to some evils which may result, Mr. T. said he would add a few words. What description of evidence would be necessary to the intelligent prosecution of such an inquiry? Nothing short, certainly, of the plan of the campaign, the correspondence between the General, and the correspondence of the Generals with each other, &c. Mr. T. dwelt on the evils which would result from exposing to the enemy a plan of the campaign, &c. Unfortunately as the termination of this campaign might have been, it would become more so by exposing to the enemy the official details of its plans and progress. Wherever we had experienced during the war any thing of disaster or defeat, it was attributable to our ignorance of the force of the enemy. It was therefore obviously important to us to follow the example of the enemy in this respect, and keep him as much as possible in ignorance of our military operations. He may occasionally derive information from a traitor or deserter; but information so acquired bore no comparison to the injury which would result from affording the enemy official information on these matters; and such official information, he presumed, would alone satisfy the object of the gentleman's motion. He hoped therefore it would not pass.

The question on the passage of the resolution was then decided in the affirmative—yeas 187, nays 13.

So the resolution was passed, and a committee was appointed to wait on the President with the same.

MONDAY, January 3, 1814.

Amendment to the Constitution.

On motion of Mr. PICKENS, of North Carolina, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, so as to establish a uniform mode of election of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. PICKENS said: Mr. Chairman, the object of the resolution is to establish a uniform mode of choosing Electors of President and Vice President of the United States; and that mode to be by the free, fair, and direct vote of the people in single districts; qualifying the right of suffrage by the same rules which the States have respectively prescribed for the choice of representatives—an object only to be attained by amending the constitution.

I am sensible of the delicacy of changing any important features of this great charter of our Government. I believe it would be better to suffer minor evils than to lay our hands rashly upon it; so much sanction will it derive from the length of usage, as well as from a recollection of the pure day when it was framed. Considering, however, that the instrument embraces a provision of its own amendment, in such instances as experience might prove it to be defective; believing, moreover, that in this particular, the reasons in favor of the amendment are so imperious as to outweigh every countervailing consideration, I have felt it my duty to offer this proposition to the House. I will endeavor to assign such reasons in favor of the measure as appear to me most forcible; though I fear I shall not be so fortunate as to be able to present them in such form as to entitle them to a favorable consideration.

That some uniform method of appointing Electors should be adopted, the reason of the case as well as our own short experience demonstrates. This will secure a just equality in the relative weight of the States. Otherwise one State having a regard to the feelings and sentiments of the minority will divide in its vote in proportion as political opinions are divided; giving only a fair balance in the elec-total scale; while a sister State, equally if not more divided in opinion on national politics, will give an undivided vote in the opposite scale. It requires no calculation to see that in this way a man may be elected to the first office of the nation by a minority of votes of the people, while an opposing candidate with two-thirds of the weight of public sentiment in his favor will be rejected. That this is unjust, is as evident as that the rights of man are equal. I am aware of the answer which may be made to this: that the inequality may be prevented by each State imitating the example of those States that adopt a mode of giving a united vote. This may be done; and from this idea of self-defence, rather than from any belief of its abstract propriety, many of the States have been driven into the measure. The question again returns: if the States are obliged to resort (as some of them will reluctantly, I know) to a system of preserving their proportional weight, why not establish at once a fair, equal, and uniform rule upon this subject?—a rule which every man's justice and good sense will approve, and which will appear most congenial with our free form of Government. If by this rule any State will gain or lose in relation to its present comparative weight, it will lose only what in justice it ought.

It illy comports with the dignity or the real interests of this great Confederacy to suffer this struggling among the States for the advantage over each other. Yet so long as the subject is left at large, contending parties will resort to it for present purposes. Ought we not then to fix a regular system which shall overlook the little interests of the moment, and such as will be just and fair under any change of circumstances, and in the remotest times?

We must expect much agitation in the public mind at the approach of each period of election, as well from contending parties in the same State, as from the States themselves. The majority will endeavor to secure an individual vote to the candidate they may espouse, and to have the minor divisions unheard in the College of Electors; while this will be resisted with all the art and insinuation a minority can command, even to the hazard of losing the vote of the State entirely. This will be the ground of much crimination and recrimination, which naturally produce an irritation in the public feelings, always unpleasant and often dangerous.

At the eve of our elections sudden changes will be made, or attempted, to answer the emergency. One instance will be used as a precedent for others less justifiable, until the people will have lost all confidence in the exercise of this important suffrage. We need only look back to our late election for evidence of this. In the State of New Jersey, at the moment when the people were about to exercise their long-accustomed rights of voting for the Electors, the General Assembly met, and deeming it not prudent to trust the election to the vote of the people, repealed the law on the subject, and vested that power in their own body, and accordingly appointed the Electors. When these cases occur at this day, what may we expect when parties are more virulent, and men less virtuous? About the same time this subject was long disputed between the two branches of the Assembly of Massachusetts. After much disagreeable jarring, it happened that a compromise was effected between the Houses, each having insisted on the best terms which it could get for the purposes of their respective parties. I have been informed that a similar difference existed between the two Houses of the Pennsylvania Legislature on a former occasion, and that it was not until the time had nearly elapsed that a compromise was effected, and the votes of the State saved. It is not pretended that these compromises were settled on the fair principles of public sentiment. They were mere bargains, in which the parties were only influenced by a view to their own purposes.

While this election is left to the regulation of the State Legislatures, it will have a necessary tendency to intermix State and general politics. In most States the regular duties of legislation are of a different character from the subject of national politics, and therefore should not be confused together. A State will better attend to its internal affairs where its Legislature is as little as possible engaged in forming electoral tickets or planning modes of election favorable to political views.

In inquiring what mode will be most advisable to establish as a uniform rule for the appointment of Electors, but three plans present themselves: that by the vote of the people in the districts, as proposed; an election by a general ticket; an appointment by the vote of the State Legislatures. These are the only modes, one or the other of which the several States have had in use.

The plan now presented appears to me most congenial with the free spirit of our Government, and the most fair and simple in its operation; if we still maintain our first political maxim, that "all legitimate power is derived from the people," it must result that the most direct channel through which this power can be conveniently communicated is to be preferred. No method is so direct as that by which a man makes his own ticket, and votes it—no mode is more convenient than that by a single district. No qualification of suffrage will be so reasonable as that which adopts the rule which the States have prescribed.

In the district plan, no caucus or self-appointed committee will be required to form a ticket for the State, which is indispensable in any other more general mode of popular election, for otherwise a general concert in selecting could not well take place. The people will be free from the imposing influence of a nominated ticket, and will be able to fix on their own candidates with a fair prospect of success. Nor will they be liable to imposition by spurious tickets, where every man will know the person for whom he votes; very different will be the case where a collective number of candidates are named on the same ticket, with all of whom very few individuals in any one section of the State will be acquainted; then a ticket will gain currency by the title that may be endorsed on it, or the name of some prominent character placed at the head of the list. From this circumstance much fraud may be practised with effect; as it will be very difficult to detect impositions that may be offered at the various election grounds in a State. This kind of imposition was, if my information is correct, practised in the State of Ohio at the last Presidential election, by which two separate tickets were introduced, purporting to be for the same candidate, which had the effect of diverting from him a part of his support, though to a small extent.

Elections will be best secured against intrigue and corruption where this power is exercised by the scattered freemen at large. Where this trust is centered as it were in a single point, as by a legislative vote, designing men will have more inducement to offer corrupt influence: and in times less virtuous a few powerful men may be able to effect the elevation of an individual whom the nation may believe to be unworthy.

The proposed method will arrive the nearest at a fair equality between the relative weight of the States, respect being had to the proportional division of political interest that may prevail. I admit that, at first view, this would seem to give an advantage to the small States, inasmuch as the balance of votes in a small State may be equal to, or may exceed that of a large one. This however will never exist but where the equality of political parties in the latter will be such as nearly to neutralize the State, when it will be just. Where a State is precisely divided in its votes, it stands neutral, and no man can say it ought not. If this be just, then in proportion as the equality diminishes even until it approaches a unanimity, in that proportion only ought the majority to prevail in the College of Electors.

In the mode of appointment by a Legislative vote, this privilege is unnecessarily removed a degree farther from the people, who are the fountain of political power. And in the election by general ticket the power is virtually removed still more remotely from them. For this ticket must of necessity be formed by a caucus of the State Assembly, or by some other collection of individuals. This nomination in a State, though not obligatory, yet, it is not in the power of the people to oppose it successfully, though a part or the whole of the persons named should be obnoxious, unless by a similar concert of other individuals who may take upon themselves to manufacture a ticket in opposition, and in reality the only alternative with the voter, is either to decline his right of vote with possibility of effect, or give his aid to one or other of the manufactured tickets.

A reason against any mode of giving the undivided votes of the States, of all others the most important, and most affecting the vital existence of the Union, is its tendency towards a geographical severance of parties. By the principle of self-defence all the States must adopt such a mode, unless a uniform plan is established; indeed, they have nearly all so acted at the late election as to give unanimous votes; and by this means a whole section of the Union, with a small exception, voted for one individual, while the opposite section supported his opponent, and these sections are divided by regular State lines. Now, does a Chief Magistrate so elected appear to represent the whole Union? And will not a small number of repetitions of such events naturally draw the opposite parties, in looking toward their opponents, to look directly across this divisional line? The States North and East of Pennsylvania and Maryland, with the exception of one small State, were, by the manner of voting, unanimously opposed to the election of the candidate who succeeded; while the States South and West were entirely unanimous in his favor. This seems evidently a direct advance towards a separation of parties by geographical boundaries; for the irritation occasioned by mutual charges and recriminations will gradually lead to settled hatred and jealousy of each other.

Mr. FINDLAY spoke for a few minutes in opposition to the resolutions.

Mr. GASTON said, that after the pertinent and judicious observations of his colleague (Mr. PICKENS) in support of the proposed amendment to the constitution, he had indulged the hope that some of the gentlemen who were averse to its adoption would have fully stated the grounds upon which their opposition was founded. He should have attended to their remarks with pleasure, and had they failed to produce conviction on his mind, would have endeavored, according to his opportunity and ability, to give them a suitable reply. Although this hope had been disappointed, and it might appear superfluous to add any thing to an argument which remained yet unanswered, he must be excused for trespassing on the patience of the committee for a few minutes. The proposition merited a deliberate examination. It related to one of the most important features of the constitution. His best judgment had convinced him that it ought to be adopted. As a member of the Legislature of North Carolina he had cordially united in recommending it to the notice of Congress. He could not reconcile it to his feelings or to his sense of duty if he did not contribute to its support an aid more efficacious than the mere expression of his vote.

The proposed amendment owed its origin to an occurrence which had excited an extraordinary interest in the State which he had the honor in part to represent. Electors of President and Vice President had been uniformly chosen in North Carolina by the people, voting in convenient and legal districts. But at the eve of the last Presidential election the Legislature of that State abolished the ancient and well-approved mode, and directed the appointment to be made by the succeeding Legislature. Although, in favor of this innovation, it was urged, certainly with plausibility if not with force, that it was proper for North Carolina, in self-defence, to adopt some mode which would enable her to bring out her entire strength in the appointment of a President; and although it was morally certain that the effect of the change would be to promote, in a very decided manner, the election of the candidate who was the favorite with the majority of her citizens, yet this inroad upon the elective franchise created almost universal dissatisfaction. Without stopping to vindicate the propriety of this discontent, said Mr. G., I cannot but regard it with complacency. It is an indication that there exists among my countrymen a quickness of perception and intensity of feeling in relation to a subject upon which dulness or indifference might be fatal. I am rejoiced at this sensitive shrinking at the approach of whatever savors of usurpation. It augurs well—it is a proof that even State pride and the spirit of party may be addressed in vain, when they are wooed to the sacrifice of a fundamental right.

Such was the effect of the excited temper of the people, that their next Legislature re-enacted the accustomed mode of appointing Electors, and divided the State into districts. But, at the same time, reflecting upon the many evils which resulted from the want of a uniform mode of appointment throughout the Union, they came to the unanimous determination of proposing the amendment to the constitution which is now under consideration. Its great principle is, that each State shall be divided by its Legislature into equal districts, in each of which the people entitled to vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature shall appoint an Elector. As the details have not been objected to, I shall confine my remarks to the support of this principle.

Sir, there breathes not a man who views the sacred character of Federal Union with more reverence than myself. No one can more sincerely or ardently deprecate any innovation on its principles. If the proposition under discussion embraced such an innovation, however advisable it might seem—however clear of all objections that I could anticipate—I should tremble at the attempt to introduce it. But, when we come to examine the constitution, and compare with it the proposed amendment, we shall find that the object is not to introduce new, but to invigorate old principles: to give a practical operation to the instrument which consists with its designed effect—to rescue it from perversion and abuse.

It is well known, that no part of the plan of a Federal Government presented greater difficulties to the illustrious men who framed it, than that which relates to the appointment of the Executive. Dangers exhibited themselves on every side; from within they had to apprehend the successful operation of all those bad passions that were connected with the acquisition or control of an office, from which flowed patronage, and profit, and power; from without they could not but dread the intrigues, and arts, and corruptions, consequent upon the efforts of foreign nations to regulate the choice of an individual who was to direct the measures of a great people in relation to them. The outlines of their plan were sketched with a masterly hand. Each State was to choose a number of Electors, upon the combined principles of population and State sovereignty, equal to the number of Senators and Representatives. These Electors were to be called into existence, for the special purpose of voting for a President, and were to exist only during that special conjuncture. They were to meet in each State and on the same day throughout the Union. No Senator or Representative, or person holding an office under the General Government, could be a member of the Electoral College. These outlines were indeed wise, yet they were but outlines. How the Electors themselves should be chosen, the constitution did not provide; it left this part of the process of appointing a Chief Magistrate of the Union to be regulated in each State by its respective Legislature. Why this discretion was left to the State Legislatures it is not for me to decide; I should presume, however, that the Convention supposed, that in each State it would be so managed as best to suit the convenience of its citizens. It was not easy to foresee whether a choice by the people, voting in districts or in States, would best effectuate the objects of the Convention. In large States the former might be desirable, in smaller States the latter might be preferred. For the present, and until experience could be consulted, it was deemed most prudent not to fix the method. That which should ultimately be found most judicious, it was presumed would generally be adopted. The amendment now before us is perfectly in character with the symmetry of this plan. It oversteps none of its outlines; it alters not the ratio of Electors, their duration, their mode of voting, nor the materials of which they are to be composed. It directs only a uniform mode of appointing them, and proposes the only mode, as will be hereafter seen, which practically corresponds with the views of the Convention.

Is it not desirable, sir, that some uniform mode should obtain? Unless the constitution should prescribe, in definite and imperative terms, the process by which Electors shall be taken from the mass of their fellow-citizens, it will be liable to perpetual fluctuation, according to the varying notions of eighteen distinct State Legislatures, each of them subject to frequent, in general to annual changes. Nothing can contribute more effectually to the permanence and stability of any institution, than that its essential forms should be permanent and stable. The omnipotent force of habit over individuals loses none of its power when extended to communities. Time and custom have an effect upon opinions and feelings, and modes of action, which alone can render them distinctive and characteristic. Thus it is that they become intimately associated with the affections, and are converted into what is emphatically called a second nature. It is the part of political wisdom to create and strengthen this union between the affections of the people and the forms of their Government. You thus consecrate these forms in their estimation, and establish a solid basis on which the Government itself can rest. May I not be permitted to say, too, without an attack upon any political party, that the honor of the country demands that we should prevent the recurrence of those scenes which, on the return of every Presidential election, are exhibited in some one or more of the States? I mean, sir, the struggles between contending parties to render the mode of appointment subservient to their immediate views. This subject has not charms enough to induce me to examine it in detail. Every gentleman has witnessed such scenes. No party can claim to be guiltless of such designs—"Peccatur et intra mœnia et extra." In one State we behold the same class of political believers contending strenuously for a mode of appointment, which in another they as zealously oppose.

An eminent advantage which I believe likely to flow from this fair expression of the sentiments of every portion of the people, in the choice of a President, will be found in the security which it affords to the minority in each State against the intolerance of the majority. In Republican Governments the majority must indeed rule, but it is of vast importance that the majority should be compelled to respect, not only the rights, but the opinions, feelings, and even prejudices of the minority. Unless it feel this sentiment, nature and history prove that it will be unjust and overbearing. When the Electors of President are chosen by States, the minority in each State is utterly without weight. As to this purpose it has no political power. Its opinions are treated with arrogance. The individuals who belong to it are viewed as a class that is arrayed against the cause of the State. They must either forbear from all interference in its concerns, or be subjected to the jealousies and malignant tyranny of intolerant power—never more intolerant than when backed by the physical force of the community, or when exerted upon those who are without the ability to retaliate. Let the voice of every part of the nation be heard in the appointment of the Chief Magistrate, and the minority in each State acquires an importance, which insures to them respect and political freedom. If they can give but one vote, it is worth the attention of the majority to conciliate that vote; for, joined with the suffrages of other portions of the people in other States, it may weigh heavily in the balance.

Sir, I conscientiously believe, that a remedy like that proposed, is essentially necessary to effectuate the objects which the framers of the constitution designed to secure in the election of a President. He who in his heart loves that constitution, cannot view, but with bitter regret, the contrast which, in the choice of this Magistrate, the practice under the constitution opposes to its pure and chaste theory. It was contemplated, that the people from each State should select from among the wisest and most virtuous of their neighbors, the persons best qualified to vote for a President. The original primary act was to be theirs—spontaneously theirs. They were free to choose whomsoever they pleased, except those who, from their situation, might have too great a leaning towards the President actually in office. Of this description were Senators and Representatives. Whatever might be their individual virtue or intelligence, these were too near the Palace to be safely trusted with the power of declaring who should occupy it. The Electors thus chosen, thus free from all irregular impulse, convening in each State on the same day, and under circumstances the most favorable to deliberation, were to vote for a President, and immediately afterwards to mingle with their fellow-citizens, from whom they had been called forth but for that special purpose. Every practicable obstacle was supposed to be thus thrown in the way of "cabal, intrigue, and corruption." There was no "pre-existing body of men who might be tampered with beforehand to prostitute their votes." No sinister bias could be presumed to exist "from too great devotion to the President in office." The "transient existence" of the Electors, and their "detached situation," seemed to render cabal and combination impracticable, and to remove all opportunity of corruption. The voice of the people operating fairly and fully in the appointment, the President would feel himself indebted to them for his office, and independent of all but them for his continuance in it.

Thus beauteous smiled the theory. How hideous the deformity of the practice! The first step made in the election is by those whose interference the constitution prohibits. The members of the two Houses of Congress meet in caucus, or convention, and there ballot for a President and Vice President of the United States. The result of their election is published through the Union under the name of a recommendation. This modest recommendation then comes before the members of the respective State Legislatures. Where the appointment ultimately rests with them, no trouble whatever is given to the people. The whole business is disposed of without the least inconvenience to them. Where, in form, however, the choice of Electors remains with the people, the patriotic members of the State Legislature, vying with their patriotic predecessors, back this draft on popular credulity with the weight of their endorsement. Not content with this, they benev-olently point out to the people the immediate agents through whom the negotiation can be most safely carried on, make out a ticket of Electors, and thus designate the individuals who, in their behalf, are to honor this demand on their suffrages. Sir, this whole proceeding appears to be monstrous. It must be corrected, or the character of this Government is fundamentally changed. Already, in fact, the Chief Magistrate of the nation owes his office principally to aristocratic intrigue, cabal, and management. Pre-existing bodies of men, and not the people, make the appointment. Such bodies, from the constitution of nature, are necessarily directed in their movements by a few leaders, whose talents, or boldness, or activity, give them an ascendancy over their associates. On every side these leaders are accessible to the assaults of corruption. I mean not, sir, that vulgar species of corruption, only, which is addressed to the most sordid of human passions, but that which finds its way to the heart, through the avenues which pride, ambition, vanity, personal resentment, family attachment, and a thousand foibles and vices open to the machinations of intrigue. Their comparatively "permanent existence," and concentrated situation, afford the most desirable facilities for the continued operation of these sinister acts. It is not in nature that they should long operate in vain; nor is it in nature that the individual elected by these means should not feel his dependence on those to whom he owes his office, or forego the practices which are essential to insure its continuance, or its transmission in the desired succession. Thus, in practice, do we find all the advantages frustrated which, in the choice of a President, the Convention so anxiously sought to secure, and all the evils realized against which barriers were so sedulously erected. Who can recognize, in the object thus exhibited, any of those features which its early friends contemplated with admiration, and joy, and hope? If a single trace remains of its former charms—

"Tis but that loveliness in death,
Which parts not quite with parting breath;
Expression's last receding ray,
A gilded halo hovering round decay."

Mr. Chairman, I dare not promise that the adoption of this amendment by the States will put an end to cabal, intrigue, and corruption, in the appointment of a President. No human means can be adequate to that end. But I believe it demonstrable that this amendment will deprive cabals of facility in combination, render intrigue less systematic, and diminish the opportunities of corruption. I cannot say that it will insure to this high and important office pre-eminent ability and virtue, but I am convinced that it will exclude from the appointment all who have not succeeded in establishing that character with the great body of their fellow-citizens. The President may yet have his favorites and partisans, who will yield support and receive patronage, but the voice of the people will be heard and respected, notwithstanding all efforts to suppress or control it. Faction cannot but exist, but it will be rendered tolerant. State attachments must yet continue, (ever may they continue,) but they will not swallow up all attachment to the General Government. States may endanger the perpetuity of our Confederacy by their combinations or their quarrels, but these dangers will be stripped of half their terrors when our citizens feel that they have a common country, and are linked together by the strongest bond of connection. Under the hope and belief that this amendment will impart vigor to the constitution, re-establish it upon its true basis, and perpetuate its duration, I avow myself its warm and decided friend. The earthly wish nearest my heart is, that, amidst the storms which threaten the submersion of all that is precious in civilization or refinement, we may cling to that constitution as the mariner to the floating spar which Providence throws in the way of his preservation.

When Mr. GASTON had concluded, the committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 4.

JOHN G. JACKSON, from Virginia, appeared, and took his seat.

Honors to Captain Lawrence.

Mr. LOWNDEA, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested to present to the nearest male relative of Captain James Lawrence, a gold medal, and a silver medal to each of the commissioned officers who served under him in the sloop of war Hornet, in her conflict with the British vessel of war, "the Peacock," in testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of the gallantry and good conduct of the officers and crew in the capture of that vessel: and the President is also requested to communicate to the nearest relative of Captain Lawrence, the sense which Congress entertains of the loss which the Naval service of the United States has since sustained in the death of that distinguished officer.

The said resolution was read, and referred to the Committee of the whole House on the resolutions from the Senate, relative to the brilliant achievement of Lieutenants Burrows and McCall, and expressive of the sense entertained by Congress of the conduct of Captain Perry, his officers and men, in the capture of the British fleet on Lake Erie.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Daniel Boone was read a third time, and passed.

Naval Exploits.

Our motion of Mr. LOWNDEA, of South Carolina, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolutions expressive of the sense of Congress of the merits of several of our naval heroes, who particularly distinguished themselves during the past Summer.

Mr. LOWNDES said that he should be inexcusable if he were long to detain the committee from the vote—he hoped the unanimous vote—which they were prepared to give upon the resolutions. The victories to which they refer were, indeed, of unequal magnitude and importance; but, the least important of them, if it had been obtained by the subjects of any Government on the Continent of Europe, would have been heard with admiration, and rewarded with munificence. The action between the Enterprise and the Boxer, from which the public eye appears to have been withdrawn by the greater magnitude and the confessedly superior splendor of a more recent victory—this action has shown, as conclusively as a contest between single ships could show, the superiority of American officers and seamen over those of the nation which the continued success of a century has proved to be superior to all the rest of the world in naval warfare. Although Lieutenant Burrows was mortally wounded, early in this action, yet the skill and gallantry with which he commenced it, leave no doubt, that if he had been longer spared to the wishes and the wants of his country, the same brilliant success which resulted would have been obtained under his command; while the ability with which Lieutenant McCall continued and completed the contest, assures to him as distinguished a fame as if he had carried the vessel into action. The loss of a commander, indeed, may fairly be considered as rendering a victory more honorable to a successor, because it must render it more difficult: it may be expected to confuse, though it does not depress. But, the victory, which was achieved in forty minutes, with a disparity in the effect of the fire of which there are other examples in American history—such a victory could only have been achieved by men who did not lose for a moment their confidence, or their cool intrepidity.

Of the victory of Lake Erie, Mr. L. said that it was more difficult to speak. It was impossible for him to speak in terms which could convey any adequate conception of the importance of the victory—of the unrivalled excellence of the officers—of the gratitude of the country. The documents referred to the committee sufficiently prove that superiority of force on the part of the enemy which would have insured their victory, if it were not the appropriate character of military genius to refute the calculations which rely on the superiority of force. Nor was the victory obtained over an unskilful or a pusillanimous enemy. The English officers were brave and experienced, and the slaughter on board their vessels, before they were surrendered, sufficiently attests the bravery of their seamen. They were skilful officers, subdued by the ascendancy of still superior skill. They were a brave foe, who yielded to one yet braver.

There was one characteristic of this action, Mr. L. said, which seemed to him so strongly to distinguish it, that he could not forbear to ask the attention of the committee to it for a few moments. He knew not an instance in naval or military history in which the success of the contest appeared so obviously to result from the personal act of the commander as in this. When the crew of Captain Perry's vessel lay bleeding around him; when his ship was a defenceless hospital; if he had wanted—not courage, which in an American officer forms no distinction—but, if he had wanted that fertility of resource which extracts from disaster the means of success and glory, he did not say, if he had surrendered his ship, but if he had obstinately defended her; if he had gone down wrapped in his flag; if he had pursued any other conduct than that which he did pursue, his associates might have emulated his desperate courage, but they must have shared his fate. The battle was lost.

Now examine any other victory, however brilliant. If, in the battle of the Nile, Lord Nelson had fallen even by the first fire, does any man believe that it would have affected the result of the contest? In the battle of Trafalgar he did fall, and victory never for a moment fluttered from what was then her chosen eyry—the British mast. And, not only in this view was the victory of Captain Perry unrivalled, but, in the importance even of its immediate consequences, he knew none in the modern history of naval warfare that could be compared with it. An important territory immediately rescued from the grasp of English power—uppermost, Canada conquered, or prepared for conquest; an ocean secured from the intrusion of every foreign flag; a frontier of a thousand miles relieved from the hostility of the most dreadful foe that civilized man has ever known! Nay, further, Captain Perry and his gallant associates have not only given us victory in one quarter, but shown us how to obtain it in another yet more important. How deep is now the impression on every mind that we want but ships to give our fleet on the Atlantic the success which has hitherto attended our single vessels! We want but ships; we want, then, but time. Never had a nation, when first obliged to engage in the defence of naval rights by naval means—never had such a nation the advantages or the success of ours. The naval glory of other States has risen by continued effort—by slow gradation; that of the United States, almost without a dawn, has burst upon the world in all the sudden splendor of a tropical day. To such men we can do no honor. All records of the present time must be lost—history must be a fable or a blank—or their fame is secure. To the naval character of the country our votes can do no honor, but we may secure ourselves from the imputation of insensibility to its merit—we can express our admiration and our gratitude.

Mr. L. concluded by saying that the resolution respecting the capture of the Peacock, proposed by the committee of the House, was the usual expression of approbation which, in similar instances, had never been omitted; it was an inadequate memorial of the merit of an officer who voted his life to the honor of his country.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, (Speaker,) said that, before the question was put, the Chairman must allow him an opportunity of expressing the high satisfaction he felt at the very handsome and eloquent manner in which the gentleman from South Carolina had acquitted himself in the observations he had just made. It would, indeed, have illly become the Representatives of the people, when every city on the continent had almost literally blazed with joy on the occasion of these victories, to have remained silent on this subject. Our ships on the ocean, commanded by the most gallant officers in the world, had already shown what American tars could do, ship to ship. It remained for the hero of Erie to exhibit to them an awful lesson of our capacity to fight in a squadron against, not only an equal but superior force. If he were to relate the circumstances which, in his opinion, most distinguished the hero of that battle, Mr. C. said he should certainly refer to that mentioned by the gentleman from South Carolina. Imagine to yourself, said he, this valuable officer in the hour of peril, his vessel a wreck, her deck strewed with the mangled bodies of his dead and dying comrades, and admire with me the cool intrepidity and consummate skill with which he seized the propitious moment, changed his station, and, aided by his gallant second in command, and only second in merit, pressed forward to fame and to victory. Such an action, it has been well said, has scarcely its parallel in history. The importance of victory can be more readily realized, when we look at its consequences. It led to the victory on land, by which a territory was delivered, and a province conquered. No longer is the patriotic soldier, whose safety ought to be guarded by all the principles of honor and of modern warfare, to be delivered over in cold blood to the merciless tomahawk. No longer the mother wakes to the agonizing spectacle of her child torn from her breast, and immolated to savage brutality. Here, sir, said he, the consequences of that victory are most conspicuous; and, coming from a country in the vicinity of the scene of action, and so sensibly alive to its consequences, I could not forbear expressing my high satisfaction at giving my vote in favor of these propositions. Mr. C. could not sit down, he said, without expressing his pleasure at finding that the name of Elliott was coupled with that of Perry. Lieutenant Elliott had given, in the capture of the British brig Detroit, last Winter, a promise of future greatness in the line of his profession. The admirable manner in which he had in the battle of Erie seconded his brave commander, attested the propriety of connecting his name in their resolve with that of the hero of the Lake.

The committee then rose and reported the resolutions; which were, by the House, ordered to a third reading to-day.

They were accordingly read a third time, and unanimously passed.

Amendment to the Constitution.

On motion of Mr. PICKENS, of North Carolina, the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on Mr. PICKENS's resolutions to amend the constitution, so as to establish a uniform mode of election of Electors of President and Vice President.

Mr. WRIGHT spoke in support of the resolution, and Mr. SHIPARD against it. Mr. PICKENS made a few remarks in reply.

The question was then taken on the resolution. The vote was—for the resolve 57, against it 70.

The committee rose and reported their disagreement to the resolution, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 5.

Amendment to the Constitution.

The House resumed the order of the day on the report of the Committee of the Whole on the proposed amendment to the constitution, for making uniform the mode of choosing Electors of President and Vice President. The report of the committee is against the resolution.

Mr. GHOLSON said, in substance, that as he expected to vote on the question before the House differently from a large majority of his colleagues, he would beg permission very succinctly to assign some of the reasons by which he was governed. The reasons which operate on my mind, said Mr. G., are not such as have been resorted to in the debate. I shall support, sir, the proposition submitted by the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. PICKENS,) because it will tend to nationalize the institutions of the country to which it relates, and will give to them a more federative republican form. At present the electors of the Chief Magistrate of the nation are chosen by the various modes of eighteen distinct independent State sovereignties. In some States the choice is by the Legislatures thereof; in some by general ticket; in others by districts, &c. Now, it is perfectly manifest, that where those who are to appoint the President are themselves thus selected, the election of a President may not be substantially and unequivocally by the people. There is no certainty or assurance that Electors chosen by the State Legislatures, for instance, would select the same person for President as would the people, or persons immediately appointed by them for the purpose.

Under the present mode, the fact cannot be concealed, and I am far from attempting to disguise it, that recourse must of necessity be had to the agency of bodies called caucuses—and I do not know, sir, under the present arrangement how they could be avoided. The custom, for example, in the States choosing electors by general ticket, is for the Legislatures of such States to meet informally, that is in caucus, and to designate and recommend to the people certain persons for the most part unknown to them, to be Electors; and these persons are accordingly uniformly chosen by the people. In this case the right of election is virtually exercised by the Legislatures, and only formally by the people. This is obvious to every gentleman. It would be uncandid to deny it. Here then, not intentionally, but from the very nature of our institutions, there is an encroachment on the privileges of the citizen. Now, sir, without any previous nomination, or recommendation in this way of electors to the people, I would prefer that the people themselves should select by districts, and within their acquaintance, their own immediate responsible agents for the purpose of appointing a President. Thus we should have a system at once uniform and national, and referring directly to the people for their decision. And in all cases I would prefer a decision by the people, where it is practicable and can be fairly expressed.

Let it not be understood that I am fond of an innovation, or that I would encourage frequent constitutional amendments. No, sir; on the contrary, I have with much reflection adopted it as a fixed principle, that, in a Government whose form is a pure representative democracy, I would make no change in the constitution except such as should be suggested by practical experience. I never would alter a Republican Constitution merely for the sake of theorizing. Testing the operations of our constitutional provision on the subject now before the House by this maxim, the question arises whether any partial inconveniences have resulted. It is perfectly notorious that such inconveniences have taken place, and they require to be remedied. They need not be recited. I am justified by experience in saying I would take as little power out of the hands of the people as possible. I would restore it to them in this case—I would not deprive them of the important privilege embraced and secured to them by the amendment before us. There is no necessity for withholding it, and it is at least as likely to be exercised with safety by the people as in any other way. I therefore hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. MACON, and Mr. ALSTON, spoke against the report; when the further consideration of the report was postponed to to-morrow, on the suggestion of Mr. GASTON, that he had understood that some gentlemen who had voted against the amendment were friendly to the principle of the proposed amendment, but opposed to its detail; and that, being desirous that the principle should be fairly tried, he wished time to prepare an amendment which should place the principle directly before the House.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 10.

Lieutenant General Proposed.

Mr. MURFEE offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of empowering by law the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one Lieutenant General to command the Armies of the United States, with such powers and emoluments as may be deemed expedient.

Mr. M. said, in his opinion the result of the last campaign had disappointed the expectations of every one. That opinion had been decidedly expressed by this House, in its recent vote for inquiry into the causes which led to the failure of our arms. However general might be the opinion in this House, it was still more so in the nation. He hoped and trusted the inquiry embraced in the resolution just alluded to, would be so prosecuted as to show where the blame really rests; that, if misconduct has taken place, it may be laid at the door of the person by whom it was committed; for, as the matter now stands, no two persons in the House would agree on the causes whence this unexpected result has proceeded. But the inquiry, desirable as it is, though it may point out the cause of recent failures, cannot operate any beneficial effects on the next campaign. The time, Mr. M. said, was fast approaching when that campaign ought to commence, and, as far as he had seen, no measures, the tendency of which was to render the ensuing campaign more successful than the last had been adopted. In every age, and under every government, it had been found necessary to have some officer appointed who should be responsible for the conduct of the army, so that it should not require an investigation of two or three years to ascertain who was to blame for any particular error or misconduct. Previous to the war with France in 1798, it was thought necessary to have a person of that character. At that period, Mr. M. said, there were a great many more of the officers of our Revolutionary army living than there are now, many of whom held seats in Congress. He should be justified in saying, there was at least as much military talent in the nation at that time as there is now; and if it was at that day expedient, on a mere prospect of war, to appoint a Lieutenant General, he could not for his own part conceive that the same step was not equally necessary at this day, when war actually exists. It must, indeed, be admitted on all hands, to be more necessary now than it was then. It was a fact, he said, of which no gentleman in the House could be ignorant, that the Secretary of War had been absent from the seat of government for some months, for the purpose, as report said, of giving effect to the operations of the campaign. If such was his object, what was that but assuming upon himself the office of Commander-in-chief? If it was necessary such an office should exist, he conceived it highly proper that another officer should be appointed to execute its duties, and that they should not devolve on the Secretary of War, in addition to the important duties prescribed for him to perform.

Lieutenant General Proposed.

It was true, Mr. M. said, that he himself had no pretensions to military knowledge; but, without making any pretension to it, he might be permitted to presume that the same men and the same measures would, in the next campaign, produce the same result as in the last; and he offered the above resolution under the hope that some benefit would result from any change whatever.

Mr. WRIGHT said he did not rise to oppose the reference of this subject to the military committee; but he rose to put the gentleman right as to the feeling of the House and of the nation, which he appears so much to have misunderstood. Have the arms of the United States failed in the campaign? Have we not, on the contrary, been marvellously successful? We have gained a province taken from us. Is that nothing? Lake Erie, a great inland sea, occupied by the enemy at the commencement of the campaign, and all its shores, are ours. We conquered and took the army of the enemy in that quarter; we reduced all the Indian tribes under the yoke of the United States, and compelled them to beg for subsistence for their wives and children from us. Here there is a whole country emancipated from the British sway. Yes, sir, we regained a province we had lost, and conquered all Canada to the east end of Lake Ontario. Under a Pike, did we not succeed in taking York? Did we not succeed entirely in every thing previous to the close of the campaign? On Lake Ontario the great Yeo, who was to conquer us with so much facility, was driven into port, and we were in possession of all the waters of the Lake, with the exception of the water in the vicinity of the harbor of Kingston. Three weeks' storm and rain washed our troops into general sickness and debility, and yet they proceeded on, and are even now lying at the key of Canada, and ready to descend to Montreal the moment the season permits. True it is, said Mr. W., that public expectation was raised to a high pitch. What man could do we could achieve; but it was impossible to war against the elements, or we should long ere now have been in possession of Montreal. For his part, Mr. W. said, he attached no blame to any one; and it was cruel, on such a subject as this, to anticipate judgment before the evidence necessary to enable them to decide was submitted to the House. It was a calumny to say our arms had failed. We had never directed a blow that had not its due effect. But it was said the Secretary of War assumed the command. If a Lieutenant General be appointed, Mr. W. said, he would be as much subordinate to the Secretary of War as the present officers of the army were. When the last session of Congress ended, and he could without disadvantage leave the seat of Government, the Secretary of War had left his ease here, and voluntarily encountered all the toil and fatigue of a camp life, to contribute his best efforts to the success of our arms; and was there any man in the nation who would disapprove his conduct? We do injustice, said Mr. W., to the characters we thus censure, and not much credit to ourselves. The man who undertakes to give an opinion without evidence, is not qualified to decide on it when he has it before him, for he must be too prejudiced to judge correctly. Mr. W. observed he had objected to the resolution passed the other day, because there had been no failure of our arms. No officer had deserved condemnation until evidence appeared against him; and there was no evidence against the courage or conduct of our army, which had displayed, not Roman, but American valor; so conspicuous, indeed, had been the courage displayed, both by our army and navy, that he hoped the man who should hereafter speak of Roman valor, on this floor, would be considered as speaking in the second degree, and not the first.

Mr. FISK, of New York, said, before the question was taken on this resolve, he should prefer to see the House engaged in raising an army calculated to require the command of an officer of so high a grade. For, after all that might be said, and all the inquiry that could be had, it would be found to be owing to want of soldiers more than want of officers that our army had not accomplished all that was expected of them during the last campaign. With a desire that Congress should first organize a force large enough for the command, before they instituted an office of this grade, Mr. F. moved that this resolution lie on the table.

This motion was agreed to without a division, and the resolution lies over for further consideration.*

* The grade of Lieutenant General has existed in all armies from the time of the Romans to the present day, and grows naturally out of our constitution. It is the grade which is next under the Commander-in-chief, and fills his place in his absence, or when in the immediate command of divisions. By our constitution the President is Commander-in-chief; but he has other duties to fulfil which will generally keep him out of the field. A Lieutenant General is his proper representative, and if not provided for by law, some Major General becomes, from the necessity of the case, his substitute, but without the authority which the rank would give. Besides flowing regularly from our constitution, the efficiency, order, and harmony of the service requires such a rank wherever two or more Major Generals' commands act together. Our rule, that the senior is to command, though sufficient to designate the commander, is not sufficient to put him above the imputation of favoritism among corps of which one is his own, nor sufficient to give him due authority over Generals whose grade is equal to his own. In all commands, from the battalion up, there should be a superior when two bodies act together—whether two companies, two battalions, two regiments, two brigades, two divisions. The organization of the provisional army in 1798, when Washington was appointed Lieutenant General on that principle, was right; and the rank was abolished in his person, afterwards, not because it was wrong, but because it was lower than he had held during the Revolution. On the same principle, the grade of Admiral should be established in our navy; for, without advocating a great navy, there will always be officers enough of the present highest grade to require the imposing authority of a common superior.

Projected settlement at Sierra Leone—Memorial of Paul Cuffe.

MR. WHEATON presented a petition of Paul Cuffe, a free colored man, who states, that, from motives of religion and humanity, he hath been induced to attempt the civilization and amelioration of the condition of the inhabitants of the African Continent, and praying permission for a vessel to depart from the United States to Sierra Leone, for the purpose of carrying a number of families of free colored people, to effect the object of his undertaking. Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures. The memorial is as follows:

To the President, Senate, and House of Representatives of the United States of America.

The memorial and petition of Paul Cuffe, of Westport, in the State of Massachusetts, respectfully sheweth, that your memorialist, actuated by motives which he conceives are dictated by the philanthropy which is the offspring of Christian benevolence, is induced to ask the patronage of the Government of the United States, in affording aid in execution of a plan, which he cherishes a hope may ultimately prove beneficial to his brethren of the African race within their native climate.

In order to give a complete view of the object in contemplation, it may not be considered trespassing too much on your time, to premise some of the leading circumstances which have led to the present application. Your memorialist, being a descendant of Africa, and early instructed in habits of sobriety and industry, has gratefully to acknowledge the many favors of a bountiful Providence, both in preserving him from many of the evils which the people of his color too often have fallen into, and also, by blessing his industry with such a portion of the comforts of life as to enable him in some degree not only to commiserate, but to relieve the sufferings of his fellow-creatures; and having early found implanted in his heart the principles of equity and justice, he could but view the practice of his brethren of the African race in selling their fellow-creatures into a state of slavery for life as very inconsistent with that divine principle; and, in his mature age, having been greatly interested in the abundant labor of many pious individuals, both in this country and in England to produce a termination of the wrongs of Africa, by prohibiting the slave trade, and also to improve the condition of the degraded inhabitants of the land of his ancestors, he conceived it a duty incumbent upon him, as a faithful steward of the mercies he had received, to give up a portion of his time and his property in visiting that country, and affording such means as might be in his power to promote the improvement and civilization of the Africans.

Under these impressions he left his family, and with a sacrifice of both time and money visited Sierra Leone, and there gained such information of the country and its inhabitants, as enabled him to form an opinion of many improvements that appeared to him essential to the well-being of that people. These he had an opportunity of communicating to several distinguished members of the Royal African Institution in London, and he had the satisfaction at that time to find that his recommendations were approved by the celebrated philanthropists, the Duke of Gloucester, William Wilberforce, Thomas Clarkson, William Allen, and others, and has since learned that the institution have so far acceded to his plans as to make some special provision to carry them into effect. One of these objects was to keep up an intercourse with the free people of color in the United States, in the expectation that some persons of reputation would feel sufficiently interested to visit Africa, and endeavor to promote habits of industry, sobriety, and frugality, among the natives of that country.

These views having been communicated by your petitioner to the free people of color in Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, they, with a zeal becoming so important a concern, have manifested a disposition to promote so laudable an undertaking, and several families, whose characters promise usefulness, have come to a conclusion if proper ways could be opened, to go to Africa, in order to give their aid in promoting the objects already adverted to. Your petitioner, still animated with a sincere desire of making the knowledge he has acquired, and the sacrifices he has already made, more permanently useful in promoting the civilization of Africa, solicits your aid so far as to grant permission that a vessel may be employed (if liberty can also be obtained from the British Government) between this country and Sierra Leone, to transport such persons and families as may be inclined to go, as also, some articles of provision, together with implements of husbandry, and machinery for some mechanic arts, and to bring back such of the native productions of that country as may be wanted.

For although pecuniary profit does not enter into calculation in the object in contemplation, nor does it afford any very promising prospects, yet, without a little aid from the trifling commerce of that country, the expense would fall too heavy on your petitioner, and those of his friends who feel disposed to patronize the undertaking. Your petitioner therefore craves the attention of Congress to a concern which appears to him very important to a portion of his fellow creatures, who have been long excluded from the common advantages of civilized life, and prays that they will afford him and his friends such aid as they in their wisdom may think best.

With much respect, I am your assured friend,

PAUL CUFFEE.

Westport, 6th month, 1813.

Claim of Rebecca Hodgson—Burning of the War Office.

MR. ARCHER, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Rebecca Hodgson, which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The report is as follows:

That by virtue of a lease dated on the 14th day of August, 1800, the house of a certain Joseph Hodgson, in the city of Washington, was let to Samuel Dexter, the then Secretary of War, for the term of eight months; in which lease the said Dexter covenanted, for himself and his successors, to keep the said premises in good and sufficient repair, ordinary decay and inevitable casualty excepted: and the same so kept in repair at the expiration of the term to deliver up to the said Hodgson: That, in pursuance of the lease, Mr. Dexter took possession, in the name of the United States, of the building and premises, and occupied the same as a public office: That, on the evening of the 8th day of November,

JANUARY, 1814.]

Post Office Patronage.

[H. OF R.]

1800, a fire communicated itself to the house, by which it was destroyed: That, after the expiration of the term for which the house had been leased, Joseph Hodgson instituted a suit against Samuel Dexter for an alleged breach of the covenant contained in the lease, in not delivering up the premises in good and sufficient repair. But the Supreme Court of the United States, at February term, 1803, gave judgment against the plaintiff, on the ground, that as Dexter was a public agent of the Government, he was not responsible in his personal and individual capacity. The court, however, in their decision in this case, gave no opinion on the liability of the United States.

The present petitioner is the legal representative of Joseph Hodgson, and claims of the Government damages equal to the value of the house, in consequence of its destruction by fire.

In determining on the legality of the petitioner's claims, it becomes necessary to examine the signification and true construction of the words "inevitable casualty," and to ascertain whether the destruction of this house took place by such an inevitable casualty as exonerates the lessee from the operation of the covenant, for a breach of which damages to the lessor would necessarily result. The acts of God, which may be defined to be such occurrences as could not happen by the intervention of man, as storms, lightnings, earthquakes, and tempests, are very properly denominated inevitable casualties. But the expression cannot be confined to those accidents alone which human efforts cannot control; for it has been applied by eminent authority to those occurrences which may be checked or subdued by the exertion of man. Lord Mansfield, the uniform correctness of whose administration of civil jurisprudence has been often eulogized, considers a fire which originates without negligence or design, as an inevitable accident; and Sir William Jones, whose style is universally admired for its purity and precision, in different passages in his elementary treatise on bailment, calls a fire happening under the same circumstances of accident, an inevitable accident, and an inevitable mischance. By these two distinguished jurists, a fire happening without negligence or design, is considered as an inevitable casualty equally with storms, lightning, or tempests. The true definition, then, of the term "inevitable casualty," may be taken to be such an accident as cannot be avoided by ordinary care and diligence.

The next inquiry which presents itself for consideration is, whether the fire by which the house of Hodgson was destroyed, took place by negligence, accident, or design. In making their determination upon this subject, your committee conceived themselves bound to examine, not only the evidence adduced by the petitioner, but other testimony, which, from an examination of the journal of the House, they found to be in existence, and to be applicable to the case. On the 10th of February, 1801, a committee was appointed to investigate the causes of the late fires in the War and Treasury Departments, who, on the 28th of the same month, reported to the House a variety of depositions which they had taken in relation to the subject of their inquiry. From all of which there results a strong probability that the fire in the War Department (Hodgson's house) was communicated from the fire-place of the adjoining building, and that there is no evidence whatever on which to found a suspicion of its having originated from negligence or design. If, then, the view which your committee have taken on that clause in the lease which bears upon the present claim, and the conclusion which is drawn from the testimony, be correct, it necessarily follows that the petitioner can have no claim against the United States for compensation or damages, until other evidence shall be adduced, which, by outweighing that already in existence, shall prove the destruction of the house to have been produced by negligence or design. Your committee, therefore, conclude with submitting the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petition of Rebecca Hodgson, administratrix of Joseph Hodgson, ought not to be granted.

Post Office Patronage.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Pennsylvania, said he rose to submit a resolution, which he trusted would be generally acceptable; because it was intended, and he believed calculated, to correct one of the most unwarrantable abuses that pervades and violates the principles of the Federal Constitution. I mean, said Mr. I., a resolution for inquiring into the expediency of so amending the laws now in force for the regulation of the General Post Office Establishment as shall render appointments under that establishment more conformable than they are at present to the provisions existing for other appointments under the Government. It has always been an objection urged by many respectable individuals against the Constitution of the United States, from the time of its adoption down to this moment, that the Executive Chief Magistrate is entrenched behind too formidable a barrier of patronage and influence. Yet that officer can make hardly an appointment without submitting the nomination to an ordeal in the Senate; an ordeal well known to be of the most trying kind—for very recently it would occur to everybody that, after being tested in the Senatorial crucible, some distinguished individuals not answering the assay, had been rejected as found wanting and thrown back upon the President. The War Department cannot make an officer, from a major general to a cornet, without the intervention of the Senate. Nor can the Navy Department. Within a few years an honorable member, now in his place in the Senate, had, very meritoriously, introduced and carried into operation a provision for depriving the Secretary of the Navy of the privilege of appointing pursers at his will without the necessity of a Senatorial supervision.

If, then, sir, said Mr. I., neither the President nor any one of the Executive Secretaries enjoys such a field of irresponsible patronage, I submit it to every man attached to the principles of the constitution, to consider whether the head of the General Post Office should be allowed, without control, without appeal, without question, to command the services of a band of agents consisting, unless I am incorrectly informed, of not less than three thousand individuals, distributed throughout the territories of this extensive continent. Though rotation in office is not a principle embodied in the constitution, yet it is well known to be held so sacred by many that certain eminent personages had deemed it becoming them to afford it all the illustration in their power, by consecrating it in practice and example. Now, sir, it is not the least alarming feature of the abuse I complain of, that the gentleman at this time presiding over the General Post Office Establishment has remained at that post during a long period of years—I cannot say exactly how long, but I believe during nearly four several Presidential terms of office—during all of which period the number of his subalterns has been increasing, until they have reached three thousand persons, who, under another head of this department and another order of things, might be planted as the worst of emissaries, for the worst of purposes, over the United States of America. I am not now prepared to say, and I desire it to be distinctly understood that I do not mean to say, that this great trust has been abused in practice by the present Postmaster General;* though I cannot deny myself leave to remark, that if no abuses have taken place, it is a proof that that gentleman is a purer one than I ever knew, or heard, or read of. This patronage extends not merely to the uncontrolled appointment of inferior deputies. He has, moreover, within his gift places which, in that particular unfortunately too seductive, that is, in point of emolument, are better worth having than any one of the honorable stations occupied by the Secretaries immediately about the person, and in the Cabinet of the Executive. While therefore I disown any view to implicate the General Post Office in culpability at present, I cannot help apprehending that other masters and other times may come, when honorable Senators or other elevated men may be diverted, perverted possibly, from their duties, by hopes allowed to be entertained that a Postmaster may be prevailed on to translate them from their public places to others of less dignity but more emolument. It does appear to me that unless some remedy be applied to this evil, and that without delay, we are in danger of a new order of Jesuits in this country, with an unlimited General at their head, to dictate his orders, and enforce them, under all the pains and penalties of removal from their deputations. All that I require is, that the Post Office Establishment should be put on the footing of all the other departments of the General Government; that this should be done as soon as possible, and that an effectual remedy should be applied to this great and dangerous evil. With these views, and the object which he had avowed, Mr. I. offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of revising the laws regulating the General Post Office Establishment of the United States, and of so amending them as to render them more conformable than they are at present to the principles of the constitution, as regards appointments to office under that establishment.

* Gideon Granger, Esq.

The vote on the resolution was as follows—for the motion 73, against it 53.

So the resolution was passed, and a committee ordered to be appointed. Mr. INGERSOLL, Mr. BAERNETT, Mr. ROANE, Mr. HUMPHREYS, and Mr. SHIPARD, were appointed the committee.

MONDAY, January 10.

Another member, to wit, from Massachusetts, WILLIAM M. RICHARDSON, appeared and took his seat.

National Bank.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on the petition of sundry inhabitants of the city of New York; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.—The report is as follows:

That the power to create corporations within the Territorial limits of the States, without the consent of the States, is neither one of the powers delegated by the Constitution of the United States, nor essentially necessary for carrying into effect any delegated power.

Duties on Licenses.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on the resolution instructing them to inquire into the expediency of amending the first section of the act laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next. The report is as follows:

"That, in many parts of the United States, where the population is dispersed over an extensive country, and but few retail stores established, the provisions of the law, as it now stands, will subject to inconvenience those who purchase spirit in less quantities than five gallons. For the accommodation of the great mass of the community, however, the privilege to sell in quantities not less than five gallons will be sufficient, and will also enable the small distiller to dispose of the spirit he has been accustomed to sell in his immediate neighborhood, without paying a retail license. The tax on stills must ultimately fall, not on the distiller, but on the consumer. It does not appear, therefore, that the payment of this tax, in the first instance, ought to exempt the distiller from the retail tax, where, from any peculiarity of situation, with a view to profit, he may add the occupation of retailer to that of distiller. Fearful that the proposed amendment might tend to introduce frauds, and diminish the revenue, and considering it impolitic to recommend any change which may narrow our resources at the present time, the committee consider it more safe to leave the law as it now stands, and to apply in future a remedy, if experience shall pronounce against its provisions. They, therefore, submit the following resolution.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient, at the present time, to authorize the sale, without license, of spirits, in less quantities than five gallons, at the place where the same shall have been distilled."

Punishment of Treason.

Mr. WRIGHT, after some observations, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a Committee of the whole House

Punishment of Treason.

be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the 2d section of the act for the establishment of rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States, relative to spies, to the citizens of the United States."

Mr. STOCKTON hoped that the House would not sanction the resolution so far as to deliberate upon it. The principle contained in it, said Mr. S., is so monstrous that I do hope no reference will be made of it. The amount of it is simply this, whether the citizens of the United States, who are entitled to all the benefits and privileges of the constitution, are to be placed under the jurisdiction of a court martial, and subject to military law. This appears to me a monstrous principle, without the least necessity for its exercise. Whence, sir, is the necessity of subjecting our citizens to martial law? If any citizen is found aiding and assisting the enemy, in the language of the constitution adhering to the enemy, giving them aid and comfort, he is guilty of treason, and can be tried for the same in our courts of justice, where he will be entitled to the inestimable privilege of a trial by a jury of his country. This resolution strikes at the fundamental principles of liberty. It strikes at that great bulwark of the citizen, the trial by jury, and I do hope that this House will not even so far sanction such a resolution as to deliberate upon it. I do not come here, sir, to defend spies, and I hope I shall not be charged with being the defender of any violators of the laws of my country. I am the defender of the rights and liberties of the people of these United States, and by the help of God I will defend them while I have a seat on this floor. This resolution goes to subvert every principle of civil liberty, to place the citizens under the ban of martial law, to prostrate courts of justice and the trial by jury, which is guaranteed by the constitution, and I hope the House will not so far sanction it as to refer it to any committee.

Mr. YANCEY moved that the resolution lie on the table.—Lost.

Mr. TROUP observed that he thought the present subject as worthy of being referred to the Committee on Military Affairs as some others which had been referred. He had understood that there were a number of cases which occurred in which citizens of the United States had given information to the enemy. He mentioned a case where he understood the only good spring used by the American army had been poisoned twice, no doubt by some person who had been lurking about the camp.

Mr. MACON said that this question appeared to him one that could be better settled by referring the subject to a Committee of the whole House, than by a reference to any other committee, because, let the latter make any report, it must finally be settled in a Committee of the Whole. If it is now referred to a Committee of the Whole, the question will be settled at once. The question to be decided was, whether a civil or military law should prevail. This was the real question, and it could be better settled by a reference to a Committee of the whole House, than by a reference to the Committee on Military Affairs; he would, therefore, suggest to the mover the propriety of so modifying it.

Mr. WRIGHT agreed to modify the resolution so as to instruct the Committee of the whole House to inquire into the subject.

Mr. STOCKTON said he was more opposed to a reference of the resolution to a Committee of the Whole, than he was to a reference to the Committee on Military Affairs, because, if they referred it to a Committee of the whole House, it would be an acknowledgment that the resolution was worthy to be debated. It has, said Mr. S., been well observed by the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON,) that there is but one question to decide on in this resolution, that is, whether civil or military law is to be the law of the land. Upon such a question I hope, that, as the representatives of freemen, we shall decide without hesitation, that we will not debate or deliberate on the subject. I again repeat, there is no necessity for this resolution. The Constitution of the United States—that ark of our safety—has defined treason, and whoever is guilty can be tried by a jury, and be punished according to the laws of the land. Every case mentioned by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. TROUP) amounts to treason if the facts be as stated, because they came within the provision of the constitution, which declares treason to consist in adhering to our enemies, giving them aid and comfort. The law of treason in this country has been settled by various decisions, and there is no doubt that giving intelligence to the enemy is treason. If any of the circumstances mentioned by the gentleman from Georgia are correct, why have not the persons been tried for their offences? There is then no necessity to deliberate on this resolution, and I hope it will not be referred.

Mr. GROSVENOR did suppose that Congress never would seriously take into consideration any subject, the passage of which would be a violation of the constitution. If, said Mr. G., we advert to the constitution, we there find treason defined to consist in levying war against the United States, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort; and, by an amendment to the constitution, it is declared that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or other infamous crime, except by a presentment by a grand jury, except the military or militia in the actual service of the United States. If Congress can provide for the punishment of the cases mentioned by military law, they can do so by the civil law. And, sir, without the least necessity, will we put our citizens under martial law? Shall we expose our citizens to military punishment, and deprive them of the right of the trial by jury? But will gentlemen reflect that this resolution is in direct opposition to the constitution? What, sir, are we told by the mover? That the constitution requires in the case of treason two witnesses to the overt act, in order to convict the accused, but that a spy might be tried by martial law and convicted on the testimony of one witness. What, sir, is this but evading the provisions of the constitution? Treason is defined by the constitution to be adhering to our enemies, giving them aid and comfort, and two witnesses are required. But call it by another name, although the crime is treason, and try the accused by martial law, and but one witness is required. What is this, sir, but a violation of the letter and spirit of the constitution? Again, sir, no citizen can be tried by martial law except those belonging to the military or militia in actual service, every other citizen is entitled by the constitution to the inestimable privilege of a trial by a jury. Congress possesses no power to pass a law in conformity to the resolution, and I wish gentlemen, if they can, to explain the provisions of the constitution, which I have read, and show where exists the power. If they have no power, why refer the subject to a committee, or why deliberate on it? There can be no doubt but that a spy found in our camps is guilty of treason, for he is thereby adhering to the enemy, and you cannot by calling the offence by any other name, prevent him from having the benefit of a jury trial, or convict him on the testimony of one witness.

Mr. MACON said that he was in favor of the reference, because he thought it an important question, and was willing to have it discussed. He was at present against the resolution, but he thought it a matter of courtesy to give gentlemen an opportunity when they wished to discuss any question. He was for granting that indulgence to others which he should wish granted to himself. The gentleman from New York had spoken of this resolution as a violation of the constitution, but it would be recollected, that it was not the reference which violates the constitution, but the passage of the law; and even if an unconstitutional law were passed, we had judges who no doubt would declare it null and void. The judges had once declared a law unconstitutional and void, and he trusted they would do so again whenever unconstitutional laws were passed.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that if the proposition were to consider whether it was necessary to provide additional legal punishments for any description of offences, he should see no objection to the reference of the subject to a committee. If illegal intercourse existed with the enemy, he should go as far as any one in applying constitutional remedies to that evil. But this resolution proposes, in effect, to consider whether it is not expedient to try accusations for treason before military instead of civil tribunals. However glaring may be the idea, yet such is in truth the real nature of the proposition. It is to change the forum for the trial of treason. The mover of the resolution, and the gentleman from the State of Georgia, (Mr. TROUP,) have not left any doubt on this subject. They have alluded to cases which they suppose the resolutions to embrace, and for which they deem it necessary to provide military punishment. But what is the nature of those cases? Are they not cases of treason? It is said information has been communicated to the enemy, very material to him, respecting the operations of our own forces, by citizens of the United States. Signals are said to have been made for this purpose on the St. Lawrence and elsewhere. Do gentlemen suppose that the act of communicating to the enemy important intelligence, whether by signals or otherwise, whereby he is the better able to defend himself, or attack his adversary, is not treason? Is not this giving to the enemy aid and comfort? May it not be in many cases the most important service which can be rendered him? Certainly, sir, all such offences as gentlemen have mentioned are provided for by law, and adequate penalties annexed to the commission. The simple question before us is, whether we will consider the propriety of taking the power of trying for these offences from the courts of law, where the constitution has placed it, and confer it on the military. Sir, the proposition strikes me as monstrous. I cannot consent to entertain the consideration of it even for a moment. It goes to destroy the plainest constitutional provisions. If it should prevail, I should not hesitate to pronounce it a most enormous stride of usurpation. Nothing, in any Government called a free one, even in the worst of times, has exceeded it. I am utterly shocked at the arguments offered in favor of it. When the mover was asked why, in the cases he mentioned, the offenders could not be punished for treasonable practices, I understood him to answer, that on trials for treason in the courts of law, the testimony of two witnesses is required; but if the trial could be transferred to a military tribunal, the two witnesses could be dispensed with. Are we now gravely to consider upon a proposition, of which this is among the professed objects? The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. TROUP) observed, that when persons had been apprehended for offences, they had been rescued by habeas corpus, issued by the civil magistrate. And are we to deliberate whether it be not proper for us to prevent the delivery of the citizens of this country from illegal arrests and imprisonment by the interposition of their great constitutional remedy, their writ of habeas corpus? The constitution contains no provision more valuable, it makes no injunction more direct and imperative than those respecting trials for treason, and the benefits of the habeas corpus. Treason is not left to be defined, even by the highest courts of law. It was foreseen that, in times of commotion, victims might be sacrificed to constructive treason; that doctrine which, in other places and other times, has shed so much innocent blood, and which brought Algernon Sydney to the scaffold. The constitution, therefore, defines treason, and prescribes the mode of proof. But what is there in the worst cases of construction of treason that can be compared, in point of enormity, to the proposition now before us? This is not to give a latitude of construction to the judge; it is to take the cause away from the judge, and carry it to the camp. Instead of indictment, arraignment, and trial, it proposes the summary process of martial law. If the proposition should pass into a law, it takes away the constitutional definition of the offence; it takes away the prescribed mode of proof; it takes away the trial by jury; it takes away the civil tribunal, and establishes the military. On a resolution of this sort, I cannot believe the House will consent to deliberate.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, and determined in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 77.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the resolution was made the order of the day for Friday next.

Relations with France.

Mr. HANSON withdrew his resolutions submitted by him on the 28th ultimo, and submitted the following in lieu thereof:

1. Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to this House any information in his possession, and which it may not be improper to divulge, in relation to the omission or refusal of the French Government to accredit the Minister Plenipotentiary sent by the United States to that Court, or of his reception, if accredited; of the time when he was so accredited, and of the progress of his negotiation.

2. Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether Mr. Turreau, late Minister of France, did or did not, on or about the 14th of June, 1809, write a letter to the Secretary of State, setting forth the terms and conditions upon which his Government would treat of amity and commerce with the United States, and urging certain complaints against this Government, and requiring certain political sacrifices to be made as an indispensable pre-requisite to the formation of such a treaty, and whether the said letter was not withdrawn from the archives of the Department of State, and how and when it was so withdrawn; and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

And, on the question that the House do now proceed to consider the said resolutions, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 69.

TUESDAY, January 11.

Relations with France.

The House resumed the consideration of the two resolutions yesterday submitted by Mr. HANSON. A division of the question having been required, the question was first stated on the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to this House any information in his possession, and which it may not be improper to divulge, in relation to the omission or refusal of the French Government to accredit the Minister Plenipotentiary sent by the United States to that Court, or of his reception, if accredited; of the time when he was so accredited, and of the progress of his negotiation.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, said that his object in yesterday calling for a division of the question, was to separate this from that which was connected with it. To this resolution he could see no objection; it was drawn up in respectful language and in the usual form. It asked for information in a proper manner, and he hoped the House would not refuse it.

The question was taken on this resolution, and decided in the affirmative, without a division.

The question was then stated on the second resolution in the following words:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether M. Turreau, late Minister of France, did or did not, on or about the 14th of June, 1809, write a letter to the Secretary of State, setting forth the terms and conditions upon which his Government would treat of amity and commerce with the United States, and urging certain complaints against this Government, and requiring certain political sacrifices to be made as an indispensable pre-requisite to the formation of such a treaty, and whether the said letter was not withdrawn from the archives of the Department of State, and how and when it was so withdrawn; and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. CALHOUN said it was a good rule generally in cases of this kind that inquiry be granted, where it is moved in a proper manner. On such motions a very great liberality had usually prevailed in this House, which had been displayed in the vote just taken. But as to the particular resolution before us, it is of that class which ought not to be passed in the present stage of its existence. To induce the House to pass this resolution, there ought to be three things stated. He need not suggest that this inquiry was of an unprecedented character, and varying from all usual calls on the Executive for information. To warrant the adoption, a specific object ought to be first stated: secondly, what was expected to grow out of it; and thirdly, that the object was of a character to warrant the investigation. Such inquiries as that now proposed, without these three pre-requisites, would, he conceived, violate the spirit of the constitution. By that instrument, diplomacy was confided wholly to the Executive. This House had indeed the power to require information, but it was through the Executive Department that it ought to be sought for, and not through inquisitorial committees of this House, or on such vague statements as had been made. The unofficial mode of inquiry now proposed was a departure from the legitimate province of this body, to which he hoped the House would not accede.

Mr. HANSON, of Maryland, said he had flattered himself, when he had the honor to make a statement a few days ago on this subject to the House, that his object would be distinctly understood. As to the proceeding which this House in its wisdom might think proper to ground on this resolution, it was not for him to dictate. Certain it was, that if any high and responsible officer had done any act for which he was amenable to the constitutional authority, it was the duty of this House to lay the foundation to an inquiry. The statement which he had made, was of itself, he conceived, sufficient foundation for the House to proceed upon. He entertained no wish on his part to examine the Department of State, as the gentlemen appeared to suppose, or any officer of the Government, in relation to the object of the inquiry; on the contrary he pledged himself to be able to prove the statement he then made, without resorting to any department of the Government. He denied in toto the principle laid down by the gentleman from South Carolina on the subject of the grounds necessary to authorize inquiry. Do we not know, said he, that it is the practice in this House, as well as in the British Parliament, that information given by any member rising in his place may be made the foundation of an inquiry? The gentleman had said, Mr. H. observed, that a committee ought not to be appointed on this matter; that an inquiry ought not to be granted in the present state of vague information. Now, Mr. H. said, the information given had been as precise and explicit as could be. It had been stated in this House, that a letter of a most insulting nature, requiring of this Government the most degrading political sacrifices, a letter striking at the honor of the Government, had been transmitted by the French Minister to the Secretary of State, and placed on the files of that Department. And what constituted the files of that office? he asked. If such a letter had been transmitted to the Department of State, and suffered to remain in that office, was it not on the files of the Department? was it necessary that it should be recorded, to constitute its admission? It had remained in the office sufficiently long to give it an official character. What was the nature of this document? As far back as the year 1809—and gentlemen would recollect the state of our foreign relations at that time; when a Minister coming from England with full powers to negotiate a treaty of amity and commerce was momentarily expected—the French Minister addresses to this Government a letter, to be held as a rod in terrorem if we presumed to negotiate with Britain. This letter set forth certain pretended grievances, and required particular political sacrifices of our Government, on the presumption that it was going to make a treaty with Great Britain. It appeared from that letter, Mr. H. said, that France set forth certain disgraceful and dishonorable conditions on which alone it would remain at amity with this Government. Now, call this document public or private, the question was: had it been received by our Government? The views and feelings of the French Government had been spread on paper, and could be as well known through a private as through a public document. As to the objection stated on a former occasion, the letter was a private letter, addressed to the gentleman who held the office of Secretary of State, but not in his official capacity. Mr. H. said that this objection was perfectly frivolous. The letter was addressed to Robert Smith, Esq., as Secretary of State; it treated of nothing but public business, and the Minister said he felt himself thus called upon to explain to the American the views of the French Government. Not to go fully into the subject at this time, but merely to show that this House was already possessed of sufficient information to act on this subject, it was enough to say that a document of immense importance to the nation had been concealed and suppressed from public view; that whilst we have gone on to consider France as a friendly power, yet, as far back as 1809, our Government perfectly well knew that it had nothing to expect from the justice of France. And, after having made those political sacrifices, one after another, and thus done every thing required of us by this tool of a despot, what had we received in return? Had there been any restoration of the millions on millions of property stolen from us, or did the House know to this day, even, that our Minister had been accredited at the French Court? It was of the utmost importance, Mr. H. said, that such matters should be inquired into. It was a radical principle of our Government that information should be as widely as possible diffused among the people; that they should not be kept in a situation of delusion; that they should not be hoodwinked and blinded to the real state of our affairs with foreign nations—and it could not be denied that an impenetrable veil had heretofore been spread over our relations with France. Was it not of importance to this House and to the nation to know in what manner we had been involved in a war, which one-half of this community knew to be unjust and unnecessary, and felt to be oppressive? At the period when this letter was transmitted, this House at least had pledged itself to a system of neutrality. Gentlemen on the Committee of Foreign Relations at that day might be able to say why it was, after taking a stand on the report of their committee, they were induced to change their neutral ground. But why call on the Executive, as was suggested, for this information, when the very foundation of the inquiry was, that the President had done an act this House ought to inquire into; and for which, if satisfied of his guilt, the President ought to be proceeded against? Gentlemen may smile, said Mr. H., but if the document which I produced yesterday (Mr. Graham's translation of the letter) is substantiated, and all the facts said to be connected with it are proved, then I say that a high misdemeanor has been committed. Let me ask gentlemen, if in the days of Adams's Administration a letter of this description had been written by Mr. Liston or any other foreign Minister to our Government, and it had been concealed from public view, and the people had never heard of it till it had been dragged forth like this letter, what would gentlemen have said? Sir, said Mr. H., I want an opportunity to prove facts; and, if gentlemen then pronounce a verdict of acquittance, let them do so. But do not suppress an inquiry; do not, by smothering investigation, attempt to give impunity to such conduct. Gentlemen appeared to him, Mr. H. said, to take offence, as if they had a fee simple in the Government, or a lease of power for ninety-nine years, renewable forever, whenever any investigation was proposed which struck at the character of the Executive. They must expect, said he, and if they do not they ought, that we shall use every fair and honorable means to oust them from the possession of power, which we feel they have abused. This House has pledged itself to the people, by implication, that this subject shall be investigated; and let me ask them, what will be the impression if this motion be rejected? As to the impression I wish to produce, sir, the rejection of this motion will be tantamount to a positive proof of all that I have alleged.

Mr. CALHOUN said he now hoped the House would refuse the inquiry proposed. He had asked for a specification of the object, and had received none. He asked for practical consequences to result from it, and had received none. Mr. C. pronounced the resolution extraordinary in its character, and unprecedented in its form. The resolution went to break into the Executive offices, to call ex parte witnesses before the House; for what purpose? For the highest purpose in the power of the House? No; for a mere inquisitorial and vexatious procedure, which is, as no such purpose is avowed, to lay no foundation for impeachment, the only object which would justify the application of such means. Suppose it were proved that this letter was in fact written by General Turreau, and that all the other circumstances relating to it were true, which for himself he did not credit, what did it prove? Merely that an impertinent letter had been written by a foreign Minister. Did the Executive sanction it? No. What view the Executive ought to take of such a letter, or how to treat it, depended on a variety of circumstances on which this House had not the means to form any opinion. Mr. C. said he hoped this House would not grant what was in his view a direct violation of the spirit of the constitution. He went on and adverted to the nice sensibility displayed by the whole phalanx of the other side of the House, yesterday, on a mere proposal for inquiry into the constitutional power of Congress to punish spies. Mr. C. said he had thought, for his part, we had the constitutional power to inquire into that subject. He hoped on this occasion to see gentlemen consistent, and exhibit the same commendable zeal as on yesterday, and join with him to secure the constitution against an invasion of its spirit. Mr. C. expatiated on the vexatious nature of inquiries of this description, tending to no practical result, &c. As to all the insinuations of French influence, and the vague declamation which the House had heard, he did not deem fit subjects of inquiry, or of so much importance as to constitute ground on which to put the Chief Magistrate under a committee of this House. Mr. C. repeated the three requisites he had before stated as necessary to justify this inquiry. If gentlemen could show that a crime had been committed by the Executive of such a character as to make him amenable to the constitutional authority of this body, then, and not till then, would he consent to an inquiry which was equally a novelty in this House and in the history of legislation.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, said the gentleman last up did no more than justice to the motives of those with whom he acted, in supposing they would oppose the resolution if he could establish the doctrine that its adoption would involve a violation of the constitution. But he could not agree with him on that point. The gentleman from Maryland had recommended to the adoption of the House a resolution having for its object the attainment of a document which must be allowed to be of considerable importance; a document stating the conditions on which alone we could retain the amity of France, and in which the views of that Government were declared. If this document were indeed in possession of the Executive, the House might with great propriety apply to him to lay it before them, to afford them the information necessary to their correct decision on our foreign affairs. But we know, said Mr. G., if any credit is to be given to the information which the gentleman from Maryland has received and believes to be true, that there is no vestige of this document in the possession of the Government. If this information, said to exist, be of importance in our future legislative proceedings, how are we to come at it? Only by the mode designated in the resolution. And would it be denied that this document ought to have an important influence in the deliberations of the House? It was not expected, he said he hoped, that this session was to pass over without Congress coming to some conclusion in respect to our relations with France. If, by the verification of this document, it could be ascertained that the relations of amity were not to be maintained with that nation but by the sacrifice of great political rights, or by an accession to the maritime confederacy, conditions which he presumed this people was not prepared to accept, all hopes of an accommodation with that country must be at an end—for no man who possesses an honorable feeling would consent to such amity on such conditions. There was no other way in which the House could obtain the requisite information but by raising this committee. Mr. G. explained the difference between such an inquiry as this, and one directed to the Executive. The opposition to the resolution, he conceived, proceeded from an over-sensitive delicacy on the part of the majority in respect to the Executive. The information he considered important in respect to the legislative proceedings of the House—and he believed the mode proposed the only one in which it could be obtained.

Mr. ROBERTS, of Pennsylvania, said it was the right of this House, and of each of its members, to move an inquiry on the subjects relating to their constitutional functions, and it was sufficient to justify it that common fame warranted it. Of this right it was more usual for a minority than a majority to avail themselves; but whether a call by them for information was proper, expedient, or necessary, it was for the majority to determine. As to the conduct of the Executive, no call upon it could be made which this House ought to feel any hesitation in granting. Mr. R. therefore disclaimed, in offering his objections to the resolution, any intention to shield the Executive. But he meant to exercise his right, as a member of this House, to judge of the expediency of the course proposed. The gentleman who moved the resolution, had looked around and said, gentlemen might smile, but that should not deter him from his course. Mr. R. said he might retort, that gentlemen might frown, and use great vehemence of language, but they could not swell into importance what was merely the breath of common fame, and rested on no better than newspaper evidence. The gentleman, in substituting the motion under consideration, for that first moved, had assigned delicacy towards the Executive as his motive. There was no need of it, Mr. R. said; if called on, the Executive would freely have given him all the information he could have asked for—which he had acknowledged he expected thus to attain. But now the principle of the motion was changed, and a committee was to be raised to send for persons and papers, to any extent, at the option of the committee. If they could show ground to believe the conduct of the President to be criminal, Mr. R. said he had no objection to the inquiry. But if such was the object, why not openly and fairly march up to it? The gentleman from Maryland, however, had not been content with the strongest insinuations that the conduct of the Executive had been criminal, but had avowed his determination to drive the men now in office from that power which he says they have abused. If such were his object, the most direct way would be at once to disqualify them by impeachment. It had not been very long since, at a former session, the gentleman himself had alleged a delay to have existed on the part of the Government to accept the mediation of Russia; now common fame, who was the gentleman's authority on that occasion, reports that the President invited Mr. Daschkoff, without authority from his Government, to offer the mediation. If the gentleman was then so far mistaken in allegations equally positive with those now made, it was not unlikely that he was as much in error on this occasion. Be that as it might, the fact of this letter having been written had nothing to do with our present relations with France. The letter being declared inadmissible, the withdrawal of the obnoxious paper was a disavowal of it. If addressed to the Government, on the statement of gentlemen themselves, reparation was made for the wrong done by withdrawing the offensive letter. Mr. R. viewed this motion, he said, in connection with other things, as intended as a bugbear, to drive men from power, which the gentleman says they abuse. We have had much prediction, and much augury, said Mr. R., on the subject of the popular feeling. Gentlemen have told us the people are not with us, and now we are informed one-half the people are against us. What is the fact, sir? Have we not had elections in all the States recently; and do they prove any indisposition on the part of the people to support the war? On the contrary, notwithstanding every obstacle has been opposed to the measures of the Government, and not a few disasters have occurred, the popularity of the war increases. In order to abridge debate, which he believed would be the effect of the motion, Mr. R. moved to amend it so as to change it to call on the Executive for the information proposed to be obtained through a committee.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, assigned the reasons why he should vote to amend the resolution as proposed by Mr. ROBERTS; because, as it stood, the resolution implied a strong censure on the Executive, to whom at least so much respect was due from this branch of the Government as to inquire what he had to say on the subject in question before they raised a committee to inquire into his conduct.

Mr. OAKLEY said, among other things, that this House ought never to call on any department for the cause of the failure of its own measures—which principle he assigned as a motive for having voted a few days ago against the inquiry into the causes of the failure of our arms, and as a reason why he was opposed to the motion, as originally proposed some days ago, of his friend from Maryland, (Mr. HANSON.) A sufficient specification had been given, he contended, as cause for this motion, in the statement of facts made by Mr. HANSON, which Mr. O. briefly repeated. If these facts were established, they proved, he said, on our Government the charge of subserviency to the views and influence of the French Government. If the facts were fully established, the most condign punishment ought to await those implicated in the accusation. The practical result then of successful inquiry would be to prove the Executive to have been guilty of a high crime or misdemeanor, and subject to impeachment. As to the form, if information were merely wanted as the foundation of legislative acts, it might well be required of the Executive; but when the result of the information was to implicate the Executive officer, it would be futile to call on him for it.

Mr. ALSTON, of North Carolina, followed in opposition to the resolution, partly on the same grounds as occupied by others in opposition to it. If every fact alleged were proved, he said, it would prove nothing against the Executive. This subject originated in ifs and wherefores, and, prosecute any inquiry to the utmost, there it would end. Mr. A. adverted to the sensibility gentlemen yesterday displayed on the proposition to prevent spies, toryism if you will, said he, from stalking abroad—and expressed his astonishment at the inconsistency of their conduct to-day on a matter of much more doubtful propriety.

Relations with France.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, adverted, somewhat harshly, to what had fallen from Mr. ALSTON on the subject of yesterday's debate, and proceeded to speak in support of the resolution, which he warmly advocated on grounds before occupied, declaring, in substance, that if the facts were proved, the President merited impeachment for concealing them—and appeared to conceive the permission of the withdrawal of the letter to be no less an offence than he considered its concealment to have been; because the same rule extended would sanction the destruction or giving away of any public document at any time, or even of all the papers in the Department of State.

Mr. CALHOUN again rose and took a rapid view of the variety of objects avowed by the supporters of this extraordinary motion, upon which he separately remarked. On the subject of French subservency, which had been designated as one of the subjects of inquiry, Mr. C. ridiculed the idea of an inquiry by this House into that baseless accusation, and on a document, too, which on the face of it proved, if it were permitted to prove any thing, that no such subservency existed. The very document by which gentlemen wished to prove a French influence, cut up by the roots the fanciful absurdity—being predicated on the supposed existence of an influence of a very different character. The motion could have no other reasonable or probable object than that avowed by one of its advocates, to put down the majority—and of the weight of such a motive for such a course the House would judge. Mr. C. recapitulated his objections to this measure, and concluded with expressing his hope of a speedy decision, as too much time had been already occupied.

Mr. SHARPE opposed the resolution. He could not, after all the consideration he could give it, view it otherwise than as a position taken by the minority, from behind which to assail, with insinuations and surmises, and attach odium to officers whose characters were impregnable to direct attack. Mr. S. contended, that, supposing all facts stated to be true, the retraction by the French Minister of his letter was a retraction of and apology for the insult it contained—and compared the case to a difference in private life between two gentlemen, in which a retraction of the offence given is always considered reparation of the offence. But how were the facts, he asked? When any gentleman stated facts of his own knowledge, on the honor of a man, he was bound to believe him; but when he stated facts which he could not know unless he had access to the Office of State—facts which he could not know unless by collateral and indirect means of information, he felt bound to ask of him what those means were? Gentlemen say, such things are facts. If they know them to be so, what more do they desire? If they are not certain of them, why do they state as facts what they do not know to be so? If the facts, as they say, are sufficient ground for further proceeding, why not assert them at once, and boldly predicate proceedings on them forthwith? They will not venture to do it. The honorable mover had told the House the other day that he had in his possession the only authentic copy of the letter, translated in the handwriting of one of the clerks in the Department of State. How came it into the gentleman's possession? How does he know it to be authentic, or to have been translated in that manner? Mr. S. called upon gentlemen to let the House know what they know, and let the House predicate any proceeding thereon it thought proper.

The main question on the adoption of the resolution was taken, at a late hour, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Dewey, Ely, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Hanson, Hufty, Hungerford, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Macon, Markell, Miller, Moffitt, Mosely, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Ridgely, Ruggles, Schureman, Sheffey, Sherwood, Shipard, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stockton, Stuart, Sturges, Tallmadge, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Winter—60.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Bayly of Virginia, Beall, Bowen, Bradley, Brown, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Cheves, Clark, Clopton, Comstock, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Davis of Pennsylvania, Dawson, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Glasgow, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hubbard, Humphreys, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irwin, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Richardson, Ringgold, Roane, Roberts, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Sharpe, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Whitehill, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey—100.

So the resolution was rejected.

WEDNESDAY, January 12.

Relations with France.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, said he hoped the resolution (Mr. ROBERTS') would be adopted, and that wish arose entirely from circumstances which had transpired during the discussion on yesterday. Before the commencement of the session, Mr. McL. said, he had discovered, through the medium of the public prints, this famous letter of M. Turreau. How, or in what manner it had been communicated to the public he did not know; but he considered it a perfectly harmless paper, and one to which no one could ever have supposed any considerable consequence would be given. It was true that it had afforded a subject for newspaper ebullitions, and even in the gazettes of the day, exclusively devoted to the dissemination of correct principles, that letter itself made a conspicuous figure. He had supposed this would have been the end of its existence, and indeed that it had been a favorite of fortune to meet with so much distinction. Judge of my surprise, then, said Mr. McL., when a gentleman in this House arose in his place, and with much gravity said he was about calling for information more important than any other within the Executive reach, the subject of retaliation excepted; and that this information was certain facts relating to Turreau's letter! But it afterwards appeared, Mr. McL. said, that this letter had not yet arrived at the zenith of its consequence; and he was still more surprised than at first when he discovered the same gentleman again to rise in his place, recall his first resolution, and substitute the very extraordinary one which had yesterday been rejected. This letter, it appeared, was to be no other than the stone cut out of the mountain, which comprised the hopes of gentlemen in opposition; which was to smite the image with destruction, and in itself become an exceeding great mountain, and the importance of which it would be presumption to suppose the discussion of yesterday had in any degree checked. Now, Mr. McL. said, not the importance of this subject, but the progress of the debate yesterday, had excited in his mind a curiosity to inquire into its origin, and the circumstances connected with its existence; he therefore hoped the House would consent to the adoption of this motion.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, avowing a wish that, if the inquiry was made, it should be effectual, which he conceived it could not be under the present motion, moved to amend the motion by substituting therefor that which was yesterday rejected, viz:

Strike out from the word "Resolved," to the end thereof, and insert the following:

"That a committee of this House be appointed to inquire into the manner in which, and time when, a paper purporting to be a letter from the French Minister to the Secretary of State, dated on or about the 14th of June, 1809, was withdrawn from the possession of the Department of State, and how it came into the possession of a member of this House; with powers to send for persons and papers, and that they report the evidence to the House.

Mr. W. said that gentlemen had attempted to diminish the importance of this inquiry, and cast a character of lightness and indifference on the subject. The force of ridicule has been tried, but that weapon must be used by rarer talents, and a more powerful hand than this occasion has called into exercise, before it can affect the intrinsic importance of this subject. If the preservation of national character and national spirit; if the cherishing of manly, independent, and elevated sentiments in the Government and in the country are matters of any moment, then this inquiry is important.

It was not, however, his intention to go into the subject generally, but to confine his remarks to the amendment proposed. The present question is, as to the manner of investigating the business. The resolution proposes an inquiry of the Executive. The amendment proposes to inquire by a committee of the House, with directions to report the evidence. What are the circumstances which call for inquiry? A member of the House states, in his place, that he has evidence which induces him to believe, that a letter, affrontive and insolent in its object and character, was written by the French Minister to the Department of State; that the Government received that letter, and, instead of repelling the affront with becoming spirit and dignity, undertook to solicit and supplicate the author that he would take it back; that he decisively refused to do so, saying that he had written the letter with great deliberation; that it was registered in the records of the Embassy; that a copy had been despatched to his Government, and that the letter could not be retracted. That afterwards, when certain political purposes were supposed to be answered, this letter, in some way or another, was withdrawn from the office of State, and that no traces of it now remain there. The gentleman even produces the letter, as translated in the office, and offers it to the view of the House. Of the facts here stated, the honorable gentleman declares his readiness to procure evidence, and wishes the House to obtain it, through a committee clothed with proper powers.

The mover of the present resolution, manifesting by his resolution his sense of the importance of some inquiry, speaks with emphasis of the necessity of ascertaining the manner in which this letter was obtained from the Department of State. He speaks of it as a purloined paper. He does not, indeed, intimate that the gentleman from Maryland did not come into possession of it in a manner altogether correct and honorable, but he seems to suppose that it must have escaped from the office of State, originally, in some unjustifiable manner; by improper disclosures of the official secrets, or breach of trust in somebody.

This being the present state of the case, may not every one see the delicacy of a direct inquiry of the Executive? Must not every one, also, see the perfect futility of such an inquiry? What answer but one can be expected, when the Executive is asked whether this letter was taken back by the author in consequence of any such request as has been mentioned? Certainly, the House can hardly think of inquiring into such a fact or such a question; nor would it consist with the sense of justice which actuates the House to prepare such an inquiry, for the purpose of giving an opportunity of exculpation by inculpating others. The House ought to adopt a course which shall obtain the whole evidence fully and fairly. We do not need official commentaries and glosses, nor the panacea of an Executive report. It ought to adopt a course that shall bring to its own view an undisguised state of the case, and spread out all the facts, unmixed with opinions. To this end, what course so proper as the appointment of a committee with full powers to collect the evidence and report it? Such inquiry will exclude nothing. Any document, or proof of any kind which the Department can afford, will be received. And if the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROBERTS) is serious in his determination to prosecute a thorough inquiry, why not meet the proposition contained in this amendment, which I propose with the assent of my friend from Maryland? Cannot the House trust itself? Does it suspect its own justice? Does it apprehend that any man's reputation might suffer in its hands? If not, on what ground can an inquiry be resisted which is of a nature to lay all the evidence before the House? Such an inquiry is now offered. The gentleman from Maryland has repeatedly assured the House that evidence is ready to be tendered, if the House will authorize its committee to receive it; and that sources will be pointed out, if the House will authorize its committee to explore them. He asserts this upon the responsibility of his character and his station. He calls on the House, having received this information, out of regard to its own character and its own duty, to make an inquiry by its own means, and in strict compliance with its constitutional powers. I know nothing of the facts of the case; but I feel the force of this call, under such a statement, made in this place by an honorable member of the House. If the amendment prevail, the investigation will be something more than nominal. It will be such an inquiry, and such only, as ought to satisfy either the House or the country.

Relations with France.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. ROBERTS, in opposing the proposed amendment, took occasion to state more definitely the object of his motion, a duty he conceived he owed to the House. He did not say what were the facts—he did not apply reproachful terms to any member; but as a great deal had been said about common fame, he would state that common fame did report some dishonorable circumstances of the manner in which the paper so often mentioned had been obtained, not from the files of the office of State, where it was not, but from the private files of a member of the Government. His intention was, as the paper was before the House, to place in its proper light the production of it, and to exhibit in a proper view the conduct of the gentleman who produced it. And he should not rest in his inquiry till he had obtained a complete disclosure of all the circumstances.

Mr. BIGELOW said he did not intend to have made any remarks on the subject before the House, but the strange course which had been pursued, induced him to submit a few observations to their consideration. As he was unprepared, they would necessarily be desultory. In the wide range of debate, gentlemen appeared to have lost sight of the real subject before them. He would attempt to recall their attention. An honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. HANSON) some days since offered a resolution, requesting the President to lay before this House information relative to the letter of the late French Minister, Turreau. From evidence which came to his knowledge, after offering that resolution, and before it was acted upon by the House, he is fully satisfied, and states to the House, that a call on the President will be useless. And from the statement he has made, must it not be apparent, that a call on the President will not give us the necessary information? The honorable mover withdraws his first resolution, and offers another, proposing the appointment of a committee of this House to inquire into the facts relating to that letter, with power to send for persons and papers.

This proposition was yesterday rejected by the House, and now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROBERTS) offers the same resolution, originally introduced by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. HANSON,) and which resolution was also rejected yesterday, by a large majority, when offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania by way of amendment.

Mr. B. said he was in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. WEBSTER,) because he believed it would render the investigation more effectual. A call on the President, from the very nature of the transaction, could not be expected to furnish us with the facts called for by the resolution. But, if a committee is appointed with power to send for persons and papers, as proposed by the amendment, in all probability they will be able to obtain the necessary facts.

Mr. SHIPARD said he was not a little surprised that gentlemen should, with so much zeal, oppose the amendment offered by his honorable friend from New Hampshire, (Mr. WEBSTER,) as that amendment would have facilitated so essentially the avowed object of the honorable mover, (Mr. ROBERTS.)

That gentleman declared, when he introduced the resolution, that his design was to afford an opportunity to gentlemen on this side, to show by what means the official translation of the letter in question was obtained from the public office. If the honorable gentleman was sincere in this avowal, it seems very extraordinary that he should resist the only proper expedient to produce the wished-for result. For, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. S., this call on the President may, and probably will, fail of the intended object; but the appointment of a committee, clothed with authority to send for persons and papers—to hear proof, search and inquire for the truth, would unquestionably enable the House to arrive at that certainty which cannot reasonably be expected in the way contemplated in the resolution.

Believing this the most effectual and desirable mode of proceeding to obtain the information which is demanded in the resolution before the House, and which, Mr. S. said, he and his friends were very solicitous to obtain, he had in vain cherished the hope, that the resolution introduced by his honorable friend from Maryland, (Mr. HANSON,) which was under consideration yesterday, would have been adopted. Had it been so, the mask would soon have been stripped from the whole transaction, and the truth presented to the House in naked view. Then, sir, might proof be introduced to the committee, drawn from a source unmoved and unbiassed by interest.

From the reasoning of gentlemen on my left, said Mr. S., it is very apparent that they wish us to believe the letter of the French Minister, Turreau, to be of an indifferent and unoffending character; and, also, if the letter in the commencement of the business was reprehensible, yet, as Turreau took it back, he thus atoned for the transgression, and any inquiry into the transaction would now be useless. That gentlemen mean as has been stated cannot be doubted, because no other conclusion can be drawn from what has been said. It has been frequently stated that it was too trifling an object to occupy the time or attention of the House.

After the contemptible character given to a paper esteemed so harmless and inoffensive, it behoves the House to examine it, and then to pronounce whether its true character has been rightly understood. If the copy of the letter published is correct, the original contains more insult and indignity than was ever tamely endured by any Government, save ours, since it pleased Heaven to civilize man. In the rude, contumelious, and dictatorial style, of an unblushing French Minister, it demanded no less than an absolute sacrifice of the liberty of speech, the independence and national sovereignty of the Union, as an offering to appease the resentments of that Minister's master.

The important inquiry then, sir, is first, is this copy a correct one? and secondly, in what manner did your President receive the letter? Did he receive it as it became the Chief Magistrate of a great and free people, jealous of their honor and proud of their standing among nations? Did he solicit the writer to receive it back in the supplicating tone and language of a whipped menial? Or did he conduct correctly, and spurn it in the teeth of the insulter?

We wish to know the mode of operation; how the affair was managed; we are entitled to know it; and, for that reason, we call on the House to adopt a measure which will promptly and affectually point us to the truth.

It is not intended by these remarks to bestow absolute censure upon your President. Gentlemen on this side condemn not without proof.

Mr. S. said he did not mean then to express an opinion, whether the rumors afloat are true or false; but, if true, he said he was constrained to differ from his colleague over the way, (Mr. FISK,) that the letter, and the manner in which it had been used, was a matter of trifling consideration. For, sir, said Mr. S., if the reports in circulation are true, we ought to declare, with one voice, that the President, and his Ministers concerned, deserve severe reprobation—that they have suffered the character of the nation to be trifled with, and have not sought redress.

Sir, this paper has made a great noise among the people, and they are by no means disposed to consider it a thing of either a harmless or indifferent nature; and they will not be satisfied unless it is passed upon by this House. There may be a sort of dust-licking gentry in the nation, who believe in the infallibility of their ruling partisans, who are at all times prepared to cry hosanna—who may not, for good reasons, ask for information. Such men are not of the kind referred to, but the people of all parties who love their country, its independence, and happiness; and depend upon it, sir, such will never feel willing to pass in silence over the humiliating and degrading conduct of their rulers.

It is said by gentlemen over the way, that the receiving back the letter by Mr. Turreau, was necessarily an apology for the insult, if the letter was of a character to be insulting. I cannot believe (said Mr. S.) that an apology is a certain consequence of taking home this offensive letter. A diplomatic agent, in all his official communications, is presumed to speak and act in consonance with, and in obedience to, the directions of his sovereign; this letter, then, was virtually the letter of the French Emperor; bespoke his feelings, and contained his sentiments. Admit, if you please, sir, that the language was hatched by his Minister, the offence consisted less in the language than the odious terms dictated as conditions whereon to bottom the favor of his royal principal.

To confirm the position, that this letter sprang from the instructions of Bonaparte, Turreau urges, as a reason why he should not take it back, that it was enrolled in the archives of his Government. Now, sir, admitting, for the sake of argument, that which ought not to be admitted for any other reason, that, between private gentlemen, the receiving back an offensive letter would of course purge the insult, yet it remains to be known whether the Emperor has directed it to be unrolled from the archives of his Government.

Sir, said Mr. S., I cannot persuade myself to believe that gentlemen sincerely design to maintain the position—that the indignity which had attached to the American people, by the letter, was peeled off by receiving it back, without any apology, any explanation; whether they do or not, it would be an absurd position. It is the “quo animo,” which we hear so often over the way, with which the act is done, that must or not constitute an apology. Receiving back the letter in sullen silence would add to the first transgression, as it would be saying, “true I have insulted you, but I have no recantation to offer. The Minister of his Imperial and Royal Majesty condescend to admit he has done wrong!”

Sir, private gentlemen would ask that so gross an insult should be retracted—they would demand an ample confession of the wrong; and shall a Government do less? A Government, too, which, soon after the letter was received, was open-mouthed against the Minister of another power, who, as was said, pointed his language rather too much?

Ought it to be endured that we should be so severely chastised for trifling aberrations from perfect obedience to the Royal Dictator, and demand no other satisfaction than the taking back the rod with which the discipline was performed? Heaven forbid that my country should ever be so sunk and degraded.

Mr. WEBSTER advocated the amendment which he had proposed, at some length.

The question was then taken on his proposed amendment by yeas and nays, and negatived by a majority of 80 or 40 votes.

Mr. GASTON, after expatiating on the value of correct information on the subject of this letter to intelligent legislation on foreign affairs, &c., moved to amend the resolution by striking out from the word “requested,” to the end thereof, and insert the following:

“To inform this House whether a letter was transmitted to the Department of State by the Minister of France, addressed to Mr. Robert Smith, Secretary of State, purporting to bear date at Baltimore, June 14, 1809, whereof the following is a translation:

“SIR: The Federal Government is going to settle all its differences with Great Britain, and to make a treaty of amity, of commerce, and of navigation, with that power. You, as well as Mr. Gallatin, have manifested to me a desire, also, to make a new convention with France, to take the place of that which expires on the 30th of September next.

“I will, for a moment, call to your consideration this double object which the Federal Government proposes to itself, and the difficulties of accomplishing it in a manner advantageous for all the contracting parties. My just defence for your Government, sir, does not permit me to make any observation on the haste with which the Executive has received the first overtures of the English Ministry, yet composed of the same men who very lately discovered a very manifest aversion to every species of conciliation, and who joined to a denial of justice to the Americans, every asperity of forms, of tone, and of style, towards the agents of your Government.

“If I have supposed that this very haste was necessary to satisfy the wishes of the people, of whom foresight is not the first virtue, others may see in that political proceeding, a precipitation, perhaps dangerous; and, if it does not lessen the dignity of the Executive, may, at least, produce consequences prejudicial to the true interests of the Union. It is on these very interests, much more than on those of France, as its enlarged and liberal policy, its principles of universal justice, and the elements of which its power is composed, have placed it beyond all attacks; it is only on the interest of your country that I fix my attention, and invoke your's under a circumstance so delicate.

“My correspondence with your predecessor, is enough to convince you, sir, that I have not left him ignorant of the dangers of the crisis of Europe, and its inevitable effects on the destiny of the States of the American Union. Positive and multiplied information on the events of the other continent, and their probable results, has enabled me sometimes to reach a power who had proclaimed its contempt for the rights of nations; and, without doubt, the Americans were the people the most interested in the success of that political act. There are, however, American merchants, who, by all the means of the most shameful deception, have endeavored to elude the measures of France, and to second the efforts of the common enemy to escape them, and have, at length, by their multiplied and proven frauds, provoked the more severe dispositions of the decree of Milan. Thus, not only were the measures of France justified as measures of retaliation, but they were indispensable to free the American commerce from the yoke which Great Britain had placed on it; to cause to be respected, in future, the flag of neutrals, and to force that power to acknowledge the common right of nations, and the dominion of the seas; and the confiscation, the sale, and the burning of some American merchant vessels, having false papers, and navigating, in contempt of the prohibitions of their own Government, to favor the enemies of France, have been legal measures, conformable to the rights of war, and which, the force of circumstances, and the interest of all, imperiously required. But I appeal to you, sir, the Council of Washington, of which you were then also a member, has it given all the necessary attention to the representations made on this subject by M. Champagny to Mr. Armstrong, as well as to those which I considered it my duty to address to the Secretary of State? Has it been possible to make known through the United States, all the advantages which the American people ought to find in the accomplishment of the designs of France; to discuss its projects in the claim of impartiality; to cause the voice of reason and of principle to be heard, when the declamation of error, or of bad faith, when the influence of prepossessions and the clamors of party spirit preserved their empire over the public opinion, or, rather, received a new force from the incertitude, or the silence of the [former] ancient Executive Council? That disposition, almost general, to attribute wrongs to France, by way of weakening the outrages of England: was it foreign to the Administration of which I speak? And that Administration, has it always been willing to hear me, while I made it perceive the consequences of the conduct of the Federal Government, in regard to the French Government? Was this Administration well convinced that all Governments are not disposed to forget or to suffer injuries with impunity?

"In recalling to your recollection, sir, the wrongs of the Federal Government towards France, I only mention notorious acts which my former correspondence has established, observing to you, at the same time, that I understand, according to their class, [je comprends dans leur catégorie] the particular offences of your citizens; for every Government is bound, [est solidaire] in regard to other powers, for the acts of its subjects, otherwise it would not be a Government, and could not offer either security or guarantee for the execution of its agreements.

"Complaints were, for a long time, made to the United States of the delays which some American citizens had experienced in receiving the indemnities which were due to them, and of which the reimbursement was made from a part of the funds destined for the acquisition of Louisiana; but the affair of the heirs of Beaumarchais, who have in vain claimed for twenty-eight years a debt made sacred by his motives, proven to the last degree of evidence, and on which the declared interest of the French Government does not admit of a put-off; is it finished?

"Captain Mouessat, the bearer of a letter of marque, and commandant of an armed schooner, followed an English convoy, and was on the point of taking several merchant vessels, when two American armed brigs, and armed to protect the infamous commerce with St. Domingo, attacked him under the English flag, and not only added treachery to superiority of force, to get possession of the vessel of Mouessat, but, after having pillaged it, massacred a part of the crew an hour after they had struck; and this crime, which remains unpunished, is so much the less forgotten as Captain Mouessat never let go [quitte] his flag. But it would be too tedious to relate to you all the particular acts in relation solely to French citizens; it will be sufficient for me to say to you, that everywhere, where there are Frenchmen, (I do not speak of the small number who have abjured their country,) these Frenchmen will have a right to the protection of the Government, and will be everywhere assured [assurée] of obtaining indemnity for the damage to their persons or to their property.

"There are other grievances, yet more serious, and from which France has a right to believe that the United States has a project of giving her inquietude for her distant possessions, and for that of her allies. This has reference to the free commerce between the Americans and the revolted blacks of St. Domingo, the affair of Miranda, and to the meditated attacks on the Spaniards on the Sabine; an enterprise which would not have been given up, but for the necessity under which your Government found itself of causing its troops to fall back to guard New Orleans against an invasion by internal enemies.

"I was far from thinking, sir, that the offence of the commerce with the slaves in the revolted part of St. Domingo—the law of the embargo, confirming the prohibitory law, passed by Congress in 1806. I could not presume that the embargo would be raised, and that the law against this commerce would not be continued. What, sir, the intercourse is prohibited between the United States and all the dependencies of the Empire, under circumstances, when the commercial relations would be the most advantageous to the two States, and you tolerate them only with that one of our possessions where we have the greatest interest to proscribe them! and it is to be remarked, that it is always when France has to combat new coalitions, on the other continent, that it would seem that efforts are made to form enterprises against its possessions, or those of its allies, in this one. It is also proper to place among the number of grievances, with which France has to charge the United States, the want of opposition, or rather the useless opposition, which the Federal Government has made to the impressment of its sailors, seized in contempt of its flag, and with whom the English arm their vessels against us. I have often, sir, and often in vain, protested against this outrage of Great Britain towards your Government, and which has become a serious injury [offence] on the part of your Government, towards France. You furnish personal aid [secours personnel] to our enemies. What could you do more if you were at war with us? Without doubt, it will not escape the present Executive, that an amendment is absolutely necessary to render uniform the treatment which our sailors and soldiers meet with in this country, and that which your sailors and soldiers meet with in France.

"I have not suffered my Court to be ignorant of the abuses, without number, and extremely prejudicial to its interests, daily resulting from a want of police in the United States, in regard to this affair. I am very far, sir, from charging your Government with the means, the most shameful of seduction, which are employed to seduce our sailors and our soldiers to desert; but has it done all that it ought to have done to prevent it? and that extreme facility with which, when they wish it, [au besoin], men drawn off from their country and their Sovereign, are naturalized. Does it accord with the incontestable right of Governments to recover, even without demanding them, their subjects whom artifice or force has drawn off from their service? and France, sir, has it not given on this subject, as on many others, an example of the reciprocal respect which Governments owe to each other, and which they observe in Europe even in the midst of the horrors of war? And have I not already warned the Executive Council to put an end to these abuses? Have I not warned them that the indemnity due for the loss of the French ship the Impetuous, burnt by the enemy within a cable's length of your coast, ought to be decreed [statuée] and paid without delay? and the subterfuges, (permit me to use the expression, I know no other to convey my idea,) and the subterfuges, I say, which have been employed to delay [s'journer] that indemnity, have made of that act of violence, on the part of our enemies, a direct offence of the United States against France. What more could you do? What more could you leave undone, sir, if you had a treaty of alliance with our enemies?

"You will find it convenient, sir, that I abridge the enumeration of all the subjects of complaint which the Federal Government has given to France since my residence in the United States, and that I refer to my correspondence with the Department of State.

"I confine myself here to calling the attention, and the attention the most serious, of the Executive Council, to another grievance of the most serious kind. I know not what could more sensibly offend [offenser] the French Empire.

"I commence, sir, by agreeing, that no Government has a right to interfere with the particular or municipal laws of other countries, because it is supposed, with reason, that every Government will so far respect itself, as to circumscribe the effect of these local institutions, and to stop licentiousness, which the feebleness of laws always gives birth to, and the digressions [les écarts] of which may offend Foreign Powers. Can one suppose that it was easy to avoid the just reproaches of Sovereigns for offences of this kind, where the weakness [la vice] of the institutions, and the want of action or of power in the depositories of political authority, render useless a trial of the means of repression? You have foreseen, sir, that I am about to address you on the indefinite liberty of saying every thing, of writing every thing, and of printing every thing.

"I am very far from believing that the excesses of your press have occupied, for an instant, the thoughts of the Emperor King, my master; but, as it respects the subject, [à cet égard] I am here as the organ of the whole French Empire; and if I do not see, without pain, the ravages [ravages] which the delirium of the insolence of the greater part of your periodical writers occasions among yourselves, you will judge that I do not hear without indignation all that people permit themselves to say or to write against France, her institutions, and the sacred person of her august representative.

"You will see, sir, that on this subject, as on all others, the redress of grievances is an indispensable prerequisite to the formation of a new treaty between the two Powers.

"It was sufficiently painful to me to address you [entretenir] on the complaints of France against the United States, without laying them open to you in the form of an official note. I have thought that a simple letter, the tone of which would approach nearer to that of our conference, would produce the same effect with you, sir, whose liberal principles and loyal character are known to me. I have thought you would be afflicted, as I am, at the obstacles [intraves] which the preceding Administration has been able to place in the way of a hearty reconciliation [à un rapprochement plus intime] between our Governments, and which their mutual interest renders more necessary than ever.

"I have thought, also, that I could even on a subject so serious, [grave] and without deviating from, or with propriety, [sans blamer les convenances] adopt a mode of communication more analogous to the conformity of our views and our efforts to maintain harmony between France and the United States; and have found here, too, the satisfaction of being able to offer to your sentiments a new tribute of respect.

"Receive, sir, the homage of my high consideration.
TURREAU."

And whether, if such letter was transmitted to the Department of State, the same has been withdrawn from its archives, and if so, when and how the same was withdrawn.

Mr. PITKIN supported this motion of Mr. GASTON, and warmly entered into a view of the conduct of Government as connected with the contents of that letter, which he considered it important to verify or falsify.

The question on Mr. GASTON's motion to amend was decided in the negative by yeas and nays—for the amendment 65, against it 96, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs Baylies, of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Dewey, Ely, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Hanson, Hufty, Hungerford, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lovett, Macon, Markell, Miller, Moffit, Montgomery, Mosely, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Ridgely, Ruggles, Schureman, Sheffey, Sherwood, Shipard, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stockton, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Winter.

NAYS.—Messrs Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cheves, Clark, Clopton, Comstock, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Davis of Pennsylvania, Dawson, Denoyalles, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Findlay, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Glasgow, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harria, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hubbard, Humphreys, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irwin, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Roberts, Robertson, Sage, Seybert, Sharp, Skinner, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Whitehill, Wilson of Penn., Wright, and Yancey.

The question was then taken upon the resolution as originally proposed by Mr. ROBERTS, and passed in the affirmative, by a large majority.

Mr. ROBERTS and Mr. MOSELY were appointed a committee to present the said resolution to the President of the United States.

FRIDAY, January 14.

Encouraging of Enlistments.

The engrossed bill, encouraging enlistments, &c., was read a third time.

Mr. SHEFFEY offered the following new section by way of rider to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That the troops which shall be enlisted by virtue of this act, shall be limited, as to service, to the defence of the territory and frontiers of the United States, or such part thereof as the President may elect and determine.

After some objections on the question of order as to the admission of a rider to a bill, being contrary to practice, and a discussion on the principle of the proposed rider, the question on its passage to a second reading was decided in the negative: For Mr. SHEFFEY's motion 54, against it 103.

The bill was then put on its final passage; when Mr. WEBSTER rose, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to offer myself to your notice on this question. I have changed my purpose only in consequence of the course which the debate took yesterday, on an amendment proposed by me to one of the subordinate provisions of this bill. The observations to which that occasion gave rise, have induced me to prefer assigning my own reasons for my own vote, rather than trust to the justice or charity of the times to assign reasons for me.

The design of this bill is to encourage, by means of a very extraordinary bounty, enlistments into the regular army. Laws already existing, and other bills now in progress before the House, provide for the organization of an army of sixty-three thousand men. For the purpose of filling the ranks of that army, the bill before us proposes to give to each recruit a bounty of one hundred and twenty-four dollars, and three hundred and twenty acres of land. It offers also a premium of eight dollars to every person, in or out of the army, citizen or soldier, who shall procure an able-bodied man to be enlisted.

Before, sir, I can determine for myself whether so great a military force should be raised, and at so great an expense, I am bound to inquire into the object to which that force is to be applied. If the public exigency shall in my judgment demand it; if any object connected with the protection of the country, and the safety of its citizens, shall require it; and if I shall see reasonable ground to believe that the force, when raised, will be applied to meet that exigency, and yield that protection, I shall not be restrained by any considerations of expense from giving my support to the measure. I am aware that the country needs defence, and I am anxious that defence should be provided for it to the fullest extent, and in the promptest manner. But what is the object of this bill? To what service is this army destined, when its ranks shall be filled? We are told, sir, that the frontier is invaded, and that troops are wanted to repel that invasion. It is too true that the frontier is invaded—that the war, with all its horrors, ordinary and extraordinary, is brought within our own territories—and that the inhabitants near the country of the enemy are compelled to fly, lighted by the fires of their own houses, or stay and meet the foe, unprotected by any adequate aid of Government. But show me that by any vote of mine, or any effort of mine, I can contribute to the relief of such distress; show me that the purpose of Government, in this measure, is to provide defence for the frontiers. I aver I see no evidence of any such intention. I have no assurance that this army will be applied to any such object. There are, as was said by my honorable friend from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) strong reasons to infer the contrary, from the fact that the forces hitherto raised have not been so applied, in any suitable or sufficient proportion. The defence of our own territory seems hitherto to have been regarded as an object of secondary importance—a duty of a lower order than the invasion of the enemy. The army raised last year was competent to defend the frontier. To that purpose Government did not see fit to apply it. It was not competent, as the event proved, to invade with success the provinces of the enemy. To that purpose, however, it was applied. The substantial benefit which might have been obtained, and ought to have been obtained, was sacrificed to a scheme of conquest, in my opinion a wild one, commenced without means, prosecuted without plan or concert, and ending in disgrace. Nor is it the inland frontier only that has been left defenceless. The seacoast has been, in many places, wholly exposed. Give me leave to state one instance: the mouth of one of the largest rivers in the eastern section of the Union is defended by a fort mounting fourteen guns; this fort, for a great part of the last season, was holden by one man and one boy only. I state the fact on the authority of an honorable gentleman of this House. Other cases, almost equally flagrant, are known to have existed, in some of which interests of a peculiar character and great magnitude have been at stake. With this knowledge of the past, I must have evidence of some change in the purposes of the Administration before I can vote for this bill, under an expectation that protection will thereby be afforded to either frontier of the Union. Of such change there is no intimation. On the contrary, gentlemen tell us explicitly that the acquisition of Canada is still deemed to be an essential object, and the vote of the House within the last half hour has put the matter beyond doubt. An honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFER) has proposed an amendment to the bill, limiting the service of the troops to be raised by its provisions, to objects of defence. To the bill thus amended he offered his support, and would have been cheerfully followed by his friends. The amendment was rejected. It is certain, therefore, that the real object of this proposition to increase the military force to an extraordinary degree, by extraordinary means, is to act over again the scenes of the two last campaigns. To that object I cannot lend my support—I am already satisfied with the exhibition. Give me leave to say, sir, that the tone on the subject of the conquest of Canada seems to be not a little changed.

Before the war, that conquest was represented to be quite an easy affair. The valiant spirits who meditated it were only fearful lest it should be too easy to be glorious. They had no apprehension, except that resistance would not be so powerful as to render the victory splendid. These confident expectations were, however, accompanied with a commendable spirit of moderation, the true mark of great minds, and it was gravely said that we ought not to make too large a grasp for dominion, but to stop in our march of conquest northward, somewhere about the line of perpetual congelation, and leave to our enemies or others the residue of the continent to the pole.

Encouragement of Enlistments.

[H. OF R.]

How happens it, sir, that this country, so easy of acquisition, and over which, according to the prophecies, we were to have been by this time legislating, dividing it into States and Territories, is not yet ours? Nay, sir, how happens it that we are not even free of invasion ourselves; but gentlemen here call on us, by all the motives of patriotism, to assist in the defence of our own soil, and portray before us the state of the frontier, by frequent and animated allusion to all those topics which the modes of Indian warfare usually suggest?

This, sir, is not what we were promised. This is not the entertainment to which we were invited. This is no fulfilment of those predictions which it was deemed obstinacy itself not to believe. This is not the harvest of greatness and glory, the seeds of which were supposed to be sown with the declaration of war.

When we ask, sir, for the causes of these disappointments, we are told that they are owing to the opposition which the war encounters in this House and among the people. All the evils which afflict the country are imputed to opposition. This is the fashionable doctrine, both here and elsewhere. It is said to be owing to opposition that war became necessary; and owing to opposition, also, that it has been prosecuted with no better success.

This, sir, is no new strain. It has been sung a thousand times; it is the constant tune of every weak or wicked Administration. What Minister ever yet acknowledged that the evils which fell on his country were the necessary consequences of his own incapacity, his own folly, or his own corruption? What possessor of political power ever yet failed to charge the mischiefs resulting from his own measures, upon those who had uniformly opposed those measures? The people of the United States may well remember the administration of Lord North. He lost America to his country. Yet he could find pretences of throwing the odium upon his opponents. He could throw it upon those who had forewarned him of the consequences from the first, and who had opposed him, at every stage of his disastrous policy, with all the force of truth, and reason, and talent. It was not his own weakness, his own ambition, his own love of arbitrary power, which disaffected the Colonies. It was not the Tea act, the Stamp act, or the Boston Port bill, that severed the empire of Great Britain. Oh, no! It was owing to no fault of Administration; it was the work of opposition. It was the impertinent boldness of Chatham; the idle declamation of Fox; and the unseasonable sarcasm of Barré! These men, and men like them, would not join the Minister in his American war. They would not give the name and character of wisdom to that which they believed to be the extreme of folly. They would not pronounce those measures just and honorable, which their principles led them to detest. They declared the Minister's war to be wanton. They foresaw its end, and pointed it out plainly both to the Minister and to the country. He pronounced the opposition to be selfish and factious; he persisted in his course, and the result is in history.

This example of Ministerial justice seems to have become a model for these times, and this country. With slight shades of difference, owing to different degrees of talent and ability, the imitation is sufficiently exact. It requires little imagination to fancy one's self sometimes to be listening to a recitation of the captivating orations of the occupants of Lord North's Treasury bench. We are told that our opposition has divided the Government, and divided the country. Remember, sir, the state of the Government and of the country when war was declared. Did not difference of opinion then exist? Do we not know that this House was divided? Do we not know that the other House was still more divided? Does not every man, to whom the public documents are accessible, know, that in that House one single vote, having been given otherwise than it was, would have rejected the declaring war, and adopted a different course of measures? A parental, guardian Government, would have regarded that state of things. It would have weighed such considerations; it would have inquired coolly and dispassionately into the state of public opinion in the States of this Confederacy; it would have looked especially to those States most concerned in the professed objects of the war, and whose interests were to be most deeply affected by it. Such a Government, knowing that its strength consisted in the union of opinion among the people, would have taken no step of such importance without that union; nor would it have mistaken mere party feeling for national sentiment.

That occasion, sir, called for a liberal view of things. Not only the degree of union in the sentiments of the people, but the nature and structure of the Government; the general habits and pursuits of the community; the probable consequences of the war, immediate and remote, on our civil institutions; the effect of a vast military patronage; the variety of important local interests and objects;—these were considerations essentially belonging to the subject. It was not enough that Government could make out its cause of war on paper, and get the better of England in the argument. This was requisite, but not all that was requisite. The question of war or peace, in a country like this, is not to be compressed into the compass that would befit a small litigation. It is not to be made to turn upon a pin. Incapable in its nature of being decided upon technical rules, it is unfit to be discussed in the manner which usually appertains to the forensic habit. It should be regarded as a great question, not only of right, but also of prudence and expediency. Reasons of a general nature, considerations which go back to the origin of our institutions, and other considerations which look forward to our hopeful progress in future times, all belong, in their just proportions and gradations, to a question, in the determination of which the happiness of the present and of future generations may be so much concerned.

I have heard no satisfactory vindication of the war on grounds like those. They appear not to have suited the temper of that time. Utterly astonished at the declaration of war, I have been surprised at nothing since. Unless all history deceived me, I saw how it would be prosecuted when I saw how it was begun. There is in the nature of things an unchangeable relation between rash counsels and feeble execution.

It was not, sir, the minority that brought on the war. Look to your records from the date of the embargo in 1807, to June 1812. Every thing that men could do, they did, to stay your course. When at last they could effect no more, they urged you to delay your measures. They entreated you to give yet a little time for deliberation, and to wait for favorable events. As if inspired for the purpose of arresting your progress, they laid before you the consequences of your measures, just as we have seen them since take place. They predicted to you their effects on public opinion. They told you that, instead of healing, they would inflame political dissensions. They pointed out to you also what would and what must happen on the frontier. That which since has happened there, is but their prediction turned into history. Vain is the hope then of escaping just retribution, by imputing to the minority of the Government, or to the opposition among the people, the disasters of these times. Vain is the attempt to impose thus on the common sense of mankind. The world has had too much experience of ministerial shifts and evasions. It has learned to judge of men by their actions, and of measures by their consequences.

If the purpose be, by casting these implications upon those who are opposed to the policy of the Government, to check their freedom of inquiry, discussion, and debate, such purpose is also incapable of being executed. That opposition is constitutional and legal. It is also conscientious. It rests in settled and sober conviction, that such policy is destructive to the interests of the people, and dangerous to the being of the Government. The experience of every day confirms these sentiments. Men who act from such motives are not to be discouraged by trifling obstacles nor awed by any dangers. They know the limit of constitutional opposition—up to that limit, at their own discretion will they walk, and walk fearlessly. If they should find, in the history of their country, a precedent for going over, I trust they will not follow it. They are not of a school, in which insurrection is taught as a virtue. They will not seek promotion through the paths of sedition, nor qualify themselves to serve their country in any of the high departments of its Government, by making rebellion the first element in their political science.

Important as I deem it to discuss, on all proper occasions, the policy of the measures at present pursued, it is still more important to maintain the right of such discussion, in its full and just extent. Sentiments lately sprung up, and now growing fashionable, make it necessary to be explicit on this point. The more I perceive a disposition to check the freedom of inquiry by extravagant and unconstitutional pretences, the firmer shall be the tone in which I shall assert, and the freer the manner in which I shall exercise it. It is the ancient and undoubted prerogative of this people to canvass public measures and the merits of public men. It is a "homebred right," a fireside privilege. It has ever been enjoyed in every house, cottage, and cabin, in the nation. It is not to be drawn into controversy. It is as undoubted as the right of breathing the air, or walking on the earth. Belonging to private life as a right, it belongs to public life as a duty; and it is the last duty which those whose representative I am, shall find me to abandon. Aiming at all times to be courteous and temperate in its use, except when the right itself shall be questioned, I shall then carry it to its extent. I shall then place myself on the extreme boundary of my right, and bid defiance to any arm that would move me from my ground. This high constitutional privilege I shall defend and exercise within this House, and without this House, and in all places: in time of war, in time of peace, and at all times. Living I shall assert it, dying I shall assert it; and, should I leave no other inheritance to my children, by the blessing of God I will still leave them the inheritance of free principles, and the example of a manly, independent, and constitutional defence of them.

Whoever, sir, would discover the causes which have produced the present state of things, must look for them not in the efforts of opposition, but in the nature of the war in which we are engaged, and in the manner in which its professed objects have been attempted to be obtained. Quite too small a portion of public opinion was in favor of the war, to justify it, originally. A much smaller portion is in favor of the mode in which it has been conducted. This is the radical infirmity. Public opinion, strong and united, is not with you, in your Canada project. Whether it ought to be, or ought not to be, the fact that it is not, should by this time be evident to all; and it is the business of practical statesmen, to act upon the state of things as it is, and not to be always attempting to prove what it ought to be. The acquisition of that country is not an object generally desired by the people. Some gentlemen indeed say it is not their ultimate object; and that they wish it only as the means of effecting other purposes. But, sir, a large portion of the people believe that a desire for the conquest and final retention of Canada is the main spring of public measures. Nor is the opinion without ground. It has been distinctly avowed by public men, in a public manner. And if this be not the object, it is not easy to see the connection between your means and ends. At least that portion of the people, that is not in the habit of refining far, cannot see it. You are, you say, at war for maritime rights, and free trade. But they see you lock up your commerce and abandon the ocean. They see you invade an interior province of the enemy. They see you involve yourselves in a bloody war with the native savages; and they ask you, if you have, in truth, a maritime controversy with the Western Indians, and are really contending for sailor's rights with the tribes of the Prophet? In my judgment the popular sentiment, in this case, corresponds with the soundest political discretion. In my humble opinion, you are not only not able to travel in the road you have taken, but, if you were, it would not conduct you to your object.

I am aware, sir, that both the professed objects of the war, and the manner of prosecuting it, may receive the nominal approbation of a great majority of those who constitute the prevailing party. But I know also how extremely fallacious any inference from that circumstance would be, in favor of the real popularity of the measure. In times like these, a great measure of a prevalent party becomes incorporated with the party interest. To quarrel with the measure would be to abandon the party. Party considerations, therefore, induce an acquiescence in that on which the fate of party is supposed to depend. Gentlemen, sir, fall into strange inconsistencies on this subject. They tell us that the war is popular; that the invasion of Canada is popular, and that it would have succeeded before this time, had it not been for the force of opposition. Sir, what gives force to opposition in this country? Certainly nothing but the popularity of the cause of opposition, and the numbers who espouse it. Upon this argument, then, in what an unprecedented condition are the people of these States? We have on our hands a most popular war; we have also a most popular opposition to that war. We cannot push the measure, the opposition is so popular. We cannot retract it, the measure itself is so popular. We can neither go forward, nor backward. We are at the very centre of gravity—the point of perpetual rest.

The truth is, sir, that party support is not the kind of support necessary to sustain the country through a long, expensive, and bloody contest; and this should have been considered before the war was declared. The cause, to be successful, must be upheld by other sentiments, and higher motives. It must draw to itself the sober approbation of the great mass of the people. It must enlist, not their temporary or party feelings, but their steady patriotism, and their constant zeal. Unlike the old nations of Europe, there are in this country no dregs of population, fit only to supply the constant waste of war, and out of which an army can be raised, for hire, at any time, and for any purpose. Armies of any magnitude can here be nothing but the people embodied—and if the object be one for which the people will not embody, there can be no armies.

It is, I think, too plain to be doubted, that the conquest of Canada is such an object. They do not feel the impulse of adequate motive. Not unmindful of military distinction, they are yet not sanguine of laurels in this conquest. The harvest, thus far, they perceive has not been great. The prospect of the future is no greater. Nor are they altogether reconciled to the principle of this invasion. Canada, they know, is not to be conquered, but by drenching its soil in the blood of its inhabitants. They have no thirst for that blood. The borderers, on the line, connected by blood and marriage, and all the ties of social life, have no disposition to bear arms against one another. Merciless indeed has been the fate of some of these people. I understand it to be a fact, that in some of the affairs which we call battles, because we have had nothing else to give the name to, brother has been in arms against brother. The bosom of the parent has been exposed to the bayonet of his own son. Sir, I honor the people that shrink from a warfare like this. I applaud their sentiments and their feelings. They are such as religion and humanity dictate, and such as none but cannibals would wish to eradicate from the human heart.

You have not succeeded in dividing the people of the Provinces from their Government. Your commanders tell you that they are universally hostile to your cause. It is not, therefore, to make war on their Government, it is to make war, fierce, cruel, bloody war on the people themselves, that you call to your standard the yeomanry of the Northern States. The experience of the two campaigns should have taught you, that they will not obey that call. Government has put itself in every posture. It has used supplication and entreaty; it has also menaced, and it still menaces compulsion. All is in vain. It cannot longer conceal its weakness on this point. Look to the bill before you. Does not that speak a language exceeding every thing I have said? You last year gave a bounty of sixteen dollars, and now propose to give a bounty of one hundred and twenty-four dollars, and you say you have no hope of obtaining men at a lower rate. This is sufficient to convince me, it will be sufficient to convince the enemy and the whole world, yourselves only excepted, what progress your Canada war is making in the affections of the people.

It is to no want of natural resources, or natural strength in the country, that failures can be attributed. The Northern States alone are able to overrun Canada in thirty days, armed or unarmed, in any cause which should propel them by inducements sufficiently powerful. Recur, sir, to history. As early as 1745, the New England Colonies raised an army of five thousand men, and took Louisburg from the troops of France. On what point of the enemy's territory, let me ask, have you brought an equal force to bear in the whole course of two campaings? On another occasion, more than half a century ago, Massachusetts alone, although its population did not exceed one-third of its present amount, had an army of twelve thousand men. Of these, seven thousand were at one time employed against Canada. A strong motive was then felt to exist. With equal exertion that Commonwealth could now furnish an army of forty thousand men.

You have prosecuted this invasion for two campaigns. They have cost you vastly more, upon the average, than the campaigns of the Revolutionary war. The project has already cost the American people nearly half as much as the whole price paid for independence. The result is before us. Who does not see and feel that this result disgraces us? Who does not see in what estimation our martial prowess must be by this time holden by the enemy and by the world? Administration has made its master effort to subdue a province, three thousand miles removed from the mother country; scarcely equal in natural strength to the least of the States of this confederacy, and defended by external aid to a limited extent. It has persisted two campaigns, and it has failed. Let the responsibility rest where it ought. The world will not ascribe the issue to want of spirit or patriotism in the American people. The possession of those qualities, in high and honorable degrees, they have heretofore illustratively evinced, and spread out proof on the record of their Revolution. They will be still true to their character, in any cause which they feel to be their own. In all causes they will defend themselves. The enemy, as we have seen, can make no permanent stand in any populous part of the country. Its citizens will drive back his forces to the line. But at that line, at the point where defence ceases and invasion begins, they stop. They do not pass it, because they do not choose to pass it. Offering no serious obstacle to their actual power, it rises, like a Chinese wall, against their sentiments and their feelings.

It is natural, sir, such being my opinion, on the present state of things, that I should be asked what, in my judgment, ought to be done. In the first place, then, I answer, withdraw your invading armies and follow counsels which the national sentiment will support. In the next place, abandon the system of commercial restriction. That system is equally ruinous to the interests, and obnoxious to the feelings of whole sections and whole States. They believe you have no constitutional right to establish such systems. They protest to you that such is not, and never was, their understanding of your powers. They are sincere in this opinion, and it is of infinite moment that you duly respect that opinion, although you may deem it to be erroneous. These people, sir, resisted Great Britain, because her Minister, under pretence of regulating trade, attempted to put his hand into their pockets and take their money. There is that, sir, which they then valued, and which they still value, more than money. That pretence of regulating trade they believed to be a mere cover for tyranny and oppression. The present embargo, which does not vex, and harass, and embarrass their commerce, but annihilates it, is also laid by color of a power to regulate trade. For if it be not laid by virtue of this power, it is laid by virtue of no power. It is not wonderful, sir, if this should be viewed by them as a state of things, not contemplated when they came into the national compact.

The humble aid which it would be in my power to render to measures of Government, shall be given cheerfully, if Government will pursue measures which I can conscientiously support. Badly as I think of the original grounds of the war, as well as of the manner in which it has been hitherto conducted, if even now, failing in an honest and sincere attempt to procure just and honorable peace, it will return to measures of defence and protection, such as reason, and common sense, and the public opinion all call for, my vote shall not be withholden from the means. Give up your futile projects of invasion. Extinguish the fires that blaze on your inland frontiers. Establish perfect safety and defence there, by adequate force. Let every man that sleeps on your soil, sleep in security. Stop the blood that flows from the veins of unarmed yeomanry and women and children. Give to the living time to bury and lament their dead, in the quietness of private sorrow. Having performed this work of beneficence and mercy on your inland border, turn, and look with the eye of justice and compassion on your vast population along the coast. Unclench the iron grasp of your embargo. Take measures for that end before another sun sets upon you. With all the war of the enemy on your commerce, if you would cease to war on it yourselves, you would still have some commerce. That commerce would give you some revenue. Apply that revenue to the augmentation of your navy. That navy, in turn, will protect your commerce. Let it no longer be said that not one ship of force, built by your hands since the war, yet floats upon the ocean. Turn the current of your efforts into the channel which national sentiment has already worn broad and deep to receive it. A naval force, competent to defend your coast against considerable armaments, to convoy your trade, and perhaps raise the blockade of your rivers, is not a chimera. It may be realized. If, then, the war must be continued, go to the ocean. If you are seriously contending for maritime rights, go to the theatre where alone those rights can be defended. Thither every indication of your fortune points you. There the united wishes and exertions of the nation will go with you. Even our party divisions, acrimonious as they are, cease at the water's edge. They are lost in attachment to national character on the element where that character is made respectable. In protecting naval interests by naval means, you will arm yourselves with the whole power of national sentiment, and may command the whole abundance of the national resources. In time you may enable yourselves to redress injuries, in the place where they may be offered, and, if need be, to accompany your own flag throughout the world, with the protection of your own cannon.

When Mr. WEBSTER had taken his seat—

Mr. INGERSOLL rose and addressed the House as follows :

Mr. Speaker, I regret that there should be a necessity for any member on this side of the House to deny some of the positions assumed by the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. WEBSTER,) who has just taken his seat; and more especially regret that the task should devolve upon me, as I think it does, in justice to my constituents, to contradict more particularly his positions with respect to the popularity of the conquest of Canada. He has totally denied the prevalence of such a sentiment, denounced the project as odious and impracticable in the present state of public feeling, and, while he recognized the facility of the conquest, he nevertheless prophesied a continued abortion to the American arms in every such attempt. Sir, meeting his assertions, as I do, without previous consideration, it must be expected that my answer will be desultory and incomplete. The gentleman from New Hampshire appears to have taken the floor with an argument, the fruit of some study of his subject; and it is due to candor to premise that he has argued his case honorably, as well as elaborately; with propriety, as well as ability. I can assure him, in the first place, that whatever may be the temper of the community in that State which he in part represents; that, however impolitic, immoral, or impossible they may consider the conquest of Canada, the popular feeling is very different in that portion of the country which sends me to this House—a portion undoubtedly as populous, as enlightened, and as patriotic as the immediate section of that gentleman's residence; I will not presume to say, sir, more populous, more enlightened, or more patriotic. The delays, disasters, and disgrace our arms have sustained in the endeavor to invade the Canadian provinces we do not consider, in Pennsylvania, as reasons for abandoning the attempt. We do not account our misfortunes irremediable. We do not see in these difficulties attending the American military apprenticeship the evidences discovered by that gentleman of indelible national discredit, nor motives for closing with any terms that may be offered of peace; but, on the contrary, we hold them to be calamitous proofs of an ignorance of the art of war, which it is high time to overcome, and most powerful incitements to perseverance and fortitude in hostilities. As a separate cause of war, independent of all others, I will not undertake to say what the popular sentiment may be with regard to the invasion and conquest of Canada; but, as an instrument for waging it effectually, and as a desirable acquisition in the course of its prosecution, most certainly we do look upon those British provinces in our neighborhood as all-important in the account. It can hardly be doubted but that Canada will generally, hereafter, be as well defended as it has been in the present contest, nor can it any more be drawn into question that our efforts to possess ourselves of these territories will invariably be as unfortunate and disgraceful as they have been, unless we persist long enough to oppose discipline to discipline; otherwise, we may postpone the conquest to the next generation, who may try it, as we have done; fail as we have done; and hand it over to a third descent: always expensive, always sanguinary, always mortifying, and always unsuccessful. We recollect, sir, and take into consideration, in all our views of this subject, what it cost England to wrest it from France; how many disastrous campaigns succeeded each other; when the whole population of the New England States were embodied for the conquest under the most experienced military men Great Britain could place at their head; how they nevertheless failed, year after year, till Wolfe, at last, achieved it. And, when he had achieved it, what said the English nation of its worth? Turn, sir, to those histories to which the gentleman from New Hampshire has referred, with which he is, no doubt, so much more conversant than I can pretend to be. Ask the annals of the times. They will tell you that the acquisition was accounted a rich indemnity for all the blood and all the treasure it had cost. They will inform you that the English deemed it a prize inestimably valuable.

If such was their view of this conquest, such their perseverance to accomplish it, shall we reckon it so little worth, when its importance has been so much enhanced? Shall we forego the endeavor to obtain it, without exertions commensurate with those made so long ago by England? It is true that our arms have failed; failed repeatedly; failed most disreputably; failed almost unaccountably. But have not the arms of England been as often and as signally reversed? It is now more than a century since England has been striving to become a considerable military power, and what has been her fate? Look to Flanders, to Holland, to Walcheren, during the present war; without recurring further back, to Portugal, to Spain. Where have they not been defeated and disgraced? till finally, after three years of continued overthrows and failures in Spain, they have, at last, been beaten by their masters in the military art into an equality with those masters. Let it always be recollected, sir, that our present misfortunes in the field are the natural result of thirty years of peace and prosperity; thirty years of total neglect of every thing like military science or acquirement. I am given to understand, sir, by officers of unquestionable merit, that, in the late affair at Williamsburg, on the 11th of November, the superiority of British discipline was as manifest on the one side, as that of American enthusiasm was on the other; and that, but for this ardent, though ill-regulated spirit, we should probably have sustained a total defeat. The knowledge of war is not to be obtained in a day, nor through any theory. If labor, mortification, and constancy, are indispensable to the mastery of any part, surely they must be, and be expected to be, in that of military affairs. How was it, sir, when, soon after the organization of the present Government, an attempt was made to subdue the Indians on our borders?—when General Washington was the President, General Knox at the head of the War Department, and Generals Harmer, St. Clair, and Wayne, the commanders of the several expeditions? I forget which of the two former went first, but they were both entirely unsuccessful; nor was it until the third attempt was made, that, with all the supposable advantages of such an administration, this petty foe was ultimately overcome.

Have gentlemen forgot that the first blow of the war of the Revolution, even before the Declaration of Independence, was aimed at Canada? when General Washington sent Colonel Arnold to penetrate with his detachment through the District of Maine, while General Montgomery advanced to the co-operation by another route. The course and termination of that expedition are familiar to everybody. General Montgomery fell in the attack on Quebec, after the subjugation of Montreal, and when the conquest of the province was so near its accomplishment. He fell at a season of the year, too, and under circumstances, which cannot be called to mind, without contrasting them with the present situation and latter constitution of our armies, who, fortified all Summer and huddled all Winter, appear to have lost the spirit of enterprise and hardihood by which American officers and soldiers were formerly characterized. Several years after this invasion, in the year 1779, that Congress, whose constancy, patriotism, and talents, cannot be too much applauded, whose eulogium has been resigned to our enemies and omitted by our own annalists, made every arrangement preparatory to a second incursion. The Marquis Lafayette was sent into the State of New York to take the preliminary measures; and the design was finally suspended, for reasons which it is not now essential that I should enumerate. Many years succeeding the period, at the adoption of the Federal Constitution, a clause was placed in that instrument, as is well known, for the express purpose of making adequate provision for the future incorporation of the Canadas, at any time, into the Union.

When Mr. INGERSOLL concluded—

Mr. MILLER, of New York, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I cannot vote for the bill now under consideration, nor can I content myself with a silent vote. I am opposed to the bill—

1st. Because the force it seeks to raise is to be used in this war of conquest—the crusade against Canada.

2d. Because we have not the information we ought to have, before we grant more money, or raise more men, to prosecute this ruinous and disastrous war.

3d. Because I think this Administration is incompetent to conduct the war to a successful issue.

4th. Because I am utterly opposed to the principles which have been avowed in the progress of the war.

It is not my intention to touch the details of the bill on the table, although I think them very defective and objectionable. I am opposed to the whole bill—

1st. Because the force is to be used in this war of conquest.

We have been told by honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House, that however much we may have been originally opposed to the war, it now becomes our duty to withhold our opposition, and afford all the means in our power to carry it on with the utmost vigor. To this opinion I cannot subscribe; it goes to the destruction of civil liberty, and will not find advocates on this side of the House. This doctrine strikes at the vitals of your republican institutions. It amounts to neither more nor less than this: that a weak and wicked Administration, (I speak not particularly of the present men in power,) finding the confidence of the people withdrawn, and their power about to pass into other hands, have nothing to do but to declare war, and instantly all opposition must cease; the men who happen to be in place, at the time of the declaration of war, however weak, however incompetent, and however profligate, must be supported at every hazard. To this doctrine I object, as it goes directly to the destruction of civil liberty. The people of this country, I am proud say it, have an undoubted right to pass upon the conduct of public men, and examine the tendency of public measures, in war as well as in peace.

The conquest of Canada has been distinctly avowed as an object of the war. My honorable friend from New Hampshire (Mr. WEBSTER) stated to you that his constituents did not want Canada; that they were opposed to this war of ambition and conquest. An honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has just sat down, (Mr. INGERSOLL,) said his constituents considered the war just and necessary, and the conquest of Canada indispensable. He said, also, that it was patriotic to enlist in such a cause. I would like to know how many of that honorable gentleman's constituents have enlisted for this war, so necessary and so just? And how many of them have marched for the conquest of Canada which he and they think so indispensable? Does he see the dilemma in which he may have placed his constituents? I put it to you, sir: If that honorable gentleman proves to me that this war is necessary and just—that the conquest of Canada is indispensable—that to join the army is patriotic, that his constituents know it; and I prove to him that his constituents have not joined the army for these objects, so necessary, so just, so indispensable, I ask you, sir, whether his own argument does not prove that his constituents want patriotism? Your former projects for filling your army have failed—the present one may not succeed. You began with offering reasonable, moderate bounty and pay, and you were disappointed; you made some calculation on the patriotism of your friends—you now, however, make a direct appeal to their cupidity: you propose to increase your bounty to an extravagant amount; and yet I am not sure that your ranks will be filled. I know it has been said, that armies are usually filled with the idle, the vagrant, the dissolute, and the profligate—men without occupation, without character, without homes. Nor do I forget that our manners, our habits, our customs, our pursuits, and our feelings, are like our Government—peaceful; that in this country the means of subsistence are so easily acquired, the rewards of honest industry so great, and the condition of our people so comfortable, that they require strong temptations to enlist in your army. There is much weight in all this, but it is not sufficient to account for the present state of your recruiting service. There is another and no less powerful reason: your war is unpopular. In common with every friend of the country, I rejoice that our people are so happy and contented at home that they require strong temptation to induce them to leave their accustomed avocations and pursuits. But I am proud indeed in the belief that they require also to be satisfied of the justice and necessity of the war, before they will enlist in the ranks of your army. Show to the people of this country that you have not been wanting in any of the duties you owed the enemy; show to them that you have negotiated in good faith, and that all your negotiations have failed through his fault. In short, prove to them that your war is necessary and just—that it is the proper remedy for the evils of which you complain; show them that war is necessary to assert national right, or to vindicate national honor, and you will have an army; you will then command the energies of every heart, and the “might which slumbers in every arm.” But until you do convince the people of this necessity, offer what bounty you please, I am not certain you will get an army. Do what you will, say what you please, the people of this country will think and talk; and strong indeed must be the temptation for them to enlist, unless you convince them of the justice and necessity of the war. There is a pride in their own opinions of right and wrong—there is an elevation in their sentiments of independence—a haughtiness in their notions of freedom, which requires this at your hands.

2d. I am opposed to the bill, because we have not the information we ought to have, before we grant more men or money to prosecute this ruinous and disastrous war.

My honorable friend from North Carolina (Mr. PEARSON) stated this objection, and asked for information—it was suggested that it would not be prudent and discreet to expose the full extent of our means. To prevent the necessity of a public disclosure, he moved to clear the galleries; with a view to ask and learn the present state and condition of the army. This was not acceded to; and we are now called on to grant you more men at a most enormous premium, without even being permitted to have any satisfactory official information about the state of our recruiting service. Ignorant, hoodwinked, blinded as we are, it ought not to be claimed or expected of us to pass this bill. I think the Administration ought not to call on us for more men till they have answered the inquiry which we made of them touching the causes of the failure of our arms. And I much doubt whether this House ought to grant another army, before it has made a thorough investigation of the causes of the late disasters and disgrace which have followed our arms.

It is a position not to be doubted, that our military operations may, in a good degree, take their tone and character from the Head of the War Department; and I am free to confess that I think the present Secretary has more military talent than his immediate predecessor, or any member of the Cabinet. But your forces appear to be crippled and bound, as if by enchantment; and it seems that even the present Secretary of War, great as his talents are claimed to be, and respectable as I am willing to admit them to be, even he is not magician enough to break the spell which rests upon your army. The Head of the War Department is always, in some measure, responsible in the first instance, for the failure of a campaign; but in the present case the Secretary of War has identified himself with our military operations;—he went to the camp; he personally superintended all the operations of the army; he issued his orders from day to day; he governed, he controlled, he directed every thing; his friends claimed for him to be the “ipse agmen” of the war. Had the campaign succeeded; had his army proceeded on to Montreal and taken it; had victory perched on our standard, you would have heard more of the “head which planned, and the hand which executed” the last campaign. Had we been victorious, Teuero duce, et auspice Teuero, is the motto you would have seen blazoned on his escutcheons. And yet we have seen fit to apply to the Secretary at War for information respecting the causes of the failure of our arms. Sir, I ask whether this is strict and impartial justice to the officers of the army? I do not think our Generals have entitled themselves to be the peculiar favorites of this House; but I much fear that we have adopted a course of investigation, which they will think invidious towards them. Ineffectual as this inquiry must be, we have got no answer yet, and we are called on to grant you more men, while those heretofore granted remain altogether unaccounted for. An inquiry similar to the one proposed at the last session ought to have been adopted. A committee of this House with powers to send for persons and papers, appears to me indispensable to a fair and impartial investigation of the causes of the failure of our arms; and more men ought not to be granted before such a committee has performed its office, and reported to this House.

Mr. Speaker, we have not the information which we ought to have. We have not even inquired for it in a way to give the least possible chance for a fair and impartial investigation. In this I think you have erred. This House has admitted the necessity of an inquiry; the nation imperiously demands it; there has been, there yet is, a loud peal of murmur and discontent from one end of the continent to the other. It cannot have been unheard; it ought not to have been disregarded. Had this House seen proper to make an effectual investigation; or had we received an answer to the inquiry which we have made, I might perhaps have arrived at a different conclusion; but, under present circumstances, I must concur in the opinion, which is entertained by a large proportion of this nation, that this Administration is not competent to carry on this war. And, in this opinion, I find a distinct and insurmountable objection to the bill on your table.

8d. I am opposed to the bill, because I think this Administration is incompetent to conduct the war to a successful issue. I cannot consent that you should have more men, particularly at this enormous rate, until you produce some better proofs than you have done, that you have talent to use them with honor and advantage to the nation. You have had a fair experiment; you have had an authority to raise every man you required; you have had appropriations to the utmost extent you asked. Whether you have enlisted men is more than I can say; but we all know that you have expended all the money, and more than you required. Both your campaigns have proved abortive. Mens Tekel is written in the most legible characters on all your military operations. With my consent you shall not have a man more to lead to death and disgrace in your fruitless attempts to conquer Canada.

You approached the war with headlong haste and hurried step. How has it been conducted? We all remember, it was urged as a reason for not going to war, that our Administration was incompetent to carry it on with skill and vigor. This opinion has been fully verified; what was predicted then has since been history.

Look at the first campaign. Notwithstanding all the boastings and vauntings of the advocates of war; notwithstanding the pledge they gave of the mighty prodigies they would perform, what did they do? In a single campaign they expended millions of the people's money, lost one territory and three armies. At the close of the campaign, their pledge to the nation remained to be redeemed. If the event gives character to military operations, our men in power are totally unfit for a War Administration. They have shown neither talent in projecting, nor promptness in execution; and where is the evidence that they have either the boldness of enterprise or the dexterity of stratagem?

But I need not rest the charge of incompetency merely on the event of the first campaign. Let any man look at the operations of this Government; the object to be obtained, the force authorized, and the application of that force.

The object of our military operations was the conquest of Canada. The advocates of the war affected to think Canada would fall into our hands, without any considerable loss of time, of men, or of money, and indeed almost without the show of resistance; hence all the suggestions of prudent, discreet men, were considered as the effects of fear, the vagaries of a distempered imagination, or the result of a settled determination to magnify the evils of war. In fact, the descent upon Canada was considered not as the business of a serious campaign, but as the amusement of a holiday frolic. The inhabitants of that country were to flock to our camp; the American standard was to be nailed to the first hemlock tree, and Canada would take itself; no formidable resistance was expected. The American commander was to gain his laurels with "rapier unstained, and sword unhacked," and in honor of his bloodless victory, was to have an "ovation" decreed him. A large force was provided by law, not to secure the contest that was considered certain, but to "look down all opposition." The force was to be overwhelming, so that all resistance should be considered vain, and thus, in mercy to the Canadians, to save the effusion of human blood. These were the views and opinions of those who declared the war.

But I undertake to say that the whole business of the campaign, from beginning to end, was essentially and radically wrong. I am not a military man, my pursuits have been of a different cast, and generally it becomes me to speak on subjects of this sort with diffidence. However, with a tolerable knowledge of the local situation of the Lakes, and of that wizard country called Canada, added to such information as is now before the public of the force provided, no man of common sense can hesitate to say that the means were altogether disproportioned to the end. Even if General Hull had taken Malden, and possessed himself of Forts Erie and George, it would not have given him the command of Lake Ontario. And I hazard nothing in saying, that our whole disposable force on the frontier, added to the army which was surrendered at Detroit, could not in one season have secured the command of Lake Ontario, so long as the enemy was permitted to keep his naval superiority on the Lakes. I say then, the plan of this expedition, in so far at least as it disregarded the naval ascendancy of the enemy on Lake Ontario, was radically and essentially wrong. Indeed, the Administration, at the close of the campaign, admitted their error in this particular, and abandoned their project of getting possession of the Lakes without a naval force; but the enemy was permitted to keep open an uninterrupted intercourse between the Lakes and Lower country, and in this way had an opportunity to provide every thing necessary for preserving his superiority on the water. And the delay and embarrassments in our operations against the Lakes in the last campaign, may in a good degree be traced to a palpable, if not unpardonable, neglect to possess ourselves of some position to cut off the communication between Montreal and the Lakes.

With all due deference, the whole campaign in general, as well as in detail, was wrong. The object was conquest; the means of the country were applied, as if intended for defence. The Army was scattered all along the frontier from Detroit to Lake Champlain. Thus divided, it was so weak as not to present an efficient force at any given point. Not only was your army thus unwisely weakened, but operations were attempted against those positions which afforded the enemy an opportunity to use his force to the greatest advantage. For example, your first army was sent to Detroit, and thus the enemy was enabled to play off his Indians against you with the greatest possible effect. In every instance you have wantonly travelled out of your way to attack a hornet's nest; in every instance you have roused the lion in his den. To have defended the frontier by respectable garrisons would have been the dictate of caution and prudence; and the conduct of the enemy in acting on the defensive, during the first campaign, justifies the belief that you would not then have been molested.

But you have had a second campaign. Has the character of the nation been relieved? Has the dark and gloomy picture of the first campaign been relieved by the glory which surrounds the second? Sir, until I arrived at this place, I never heard it suggested that the last campaign was more glorious than the first. I did not believe there was a man in this House, or in this nation, who did not think the country disgraced, and that the money and the men had been shamefully squandered by the weakness of the Administration or their immediate agents. Much less could I have believed that the President of the United States could have found a motive for continuing the war in the success which had attended our arms. For my own part I have seen no cause of exultation; in common with every man I met, I felt mortified and humbled at the disgraceful figure we had made, in two abortive attempts to conquer the contemptible neighboring provinces. I had foolishly thought that all the laurels of the North had turned to Canada thistles, but in this I must be mistaken; the source from which the information comes forbids the possibility of a doubt. Success, then, has attended our arms! Have we gained honor and glory in the last campaign? Have we, indeed? Sir, my constituents will be right glad to hear it—they will rejoice most exceedingly—we may look for illuminations and bonfires from one end of the continent to the other; the people will be frantic—they will run mad with joy!

In reviewing the conduct of the last campaign I confess I derive no motive for continuing the war, from the success which has attended our arms. The project of taking Canada in detail was still persevered in, and was again defeated. The plan was wrong—the execution of that plan has failed to justify the public expectation. You were to conquer the Canadas—you have not an inch of ground in either province. The President, in his late Message, seems to claim a naval superiority on Lake Ontario. Sir, with all due deference to an authority so elevated, I must be permitted to question that fact. You do not find an authority for it in the communications from that brave and excellent officer who commands the Lakes. He has always admitted the force of the enemy to be superior to his. Commodore Chauncey has been eager for an engagement; he has on every occasion courted a battle; he had no doubt of his success, but he rested on his own skill and bravery; he calculated on the activity and exertions of his officers, the discipline and steady courage of his men, not on the superiority of his force. The enemy has about twenty guns more than we have; and besides, his ships sail better and afford a more efficient squadron than ours. Let not the Administration deceive themselves; Lake Ontario is not yet theirs; another campaign is necessary to obtain it.

The whole conduct of the war has tended to disgrace our country—depress the tone and spirit of our army; while, at the same time, it has inspired the utmost confidence in the enemy. The men who joined your standard were promised a conquest, and have met with defeat. Many of the inhabitants of Canada were disposed to remain neutral; they had heard of our resources; they knew the bravery of our people; we are descended from the same ancestors with themselves; they dreaded our power; they did not so soon expect to see "Alcides beaten by his page." The events of the war are calculated to have a most serious effect; after two campaigns you are altogether in a worse situation than when you began the war. Your defeats, your disasters, and your disgrace, have encouraged the hearts and strengthened the hands of the enemy. Your conduct has fortified every post; and when you again venture on Montreal, you will find every pass to be a Thermopylæ. The Canadians find ample encouragement in your weakness and improvidence. They by this time know they are not to be annihilated by the thunders of a proclamation; and they believe, too, that the walls of Quebec will not be tumbled into ruin by a Presidential manifesto.

Mr. Speaker, I have taxed the patience of the House much more severely than I had intended. I am opposed to the bill, because I am opposed to the war; because we have not the information necessary to a full conviction of the necessity of raising men at the enormous expense contemplated; because I think this Administration utterly incompetent to conduct the war to a successful issue; and because I abhor and detest the principles which have been proclaimed in its progress, which principles I think there is too much reason to believe have been authorized, or sanctioned at least, by our Administration. In discussing this subject, I have spoken with that plainness which I thought was demanded by the occasion. I hope I have not discovered a want of respect to those who differ from me in opinion. If I "have nothing extenuated," certainly I have not "set down aught in malice." Permit me, sir, to express a hope, that what I have said at this time will not subject me to be denounced as a "moral traitor" by any honorable gentleman on the other side of the House. With the definition I have given, there is no harm in it; but the term is reproachful, and must be resisted. In discussions here, it will always be my pleasure and my pride to do justice to the motives, and to respect the feelings of honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House. I claim the same justice and respect for myself. I repeat it, I hope no honorable gentlemen will apply that epithet to me. Like every member of this House, I stand here on the constitution and the law; like other honorable gentlemen, I stand here on my personal responsibility. The rights of my constituents will not, I hope, be abandoned; and as to my personal rights, I shall try to do without a prompter. If a time shall ever arrive when I shall distrust the strength of my nerves to meet any occasion which may be presented in defence of my own rights, or those of my constituents, I shall go home to them, and, resigning the honor they have conferred on me, shall tell them frankly, that I am not the man to serve them in wayward times like these. But, so long as I retain my seat here, I will do my duty, "peaceably if I can, forcibly if I must."

The main question was then put—"Shall the bill pass?" and decided as follows:

SATURDAY, JANUARY 15.

Extension of Enlistments.

On motion of Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill, sent to this House from the Senate, "authorizing the President of the United States to cause certain regiments therein mentioned to be enlisted for five years, or during the war."

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, said he rose to move an amendment. The object of the bill is to encourage enlistments in the Army. It offers a large bounty, and gives the option of engaging for five years or during the war; but the recruit might not be willing to serve for five years, because the war might not continue so long; and he might object to enlist for the war, as there was a probability of its continuing longer. To obviate these difficulties he would move to strike out the words "or during the war," and insert, "if the war shall so long continue." Thus, instead of being called on to elect either of the alternatives of the bill, individuals would press forward with alacrity to fill up the ranks of the Army, when they perceived that the term of their service was limited to five years, and that in the mean time if peace was restored they would be entitled to their discharge. He would use no argument to show that a preference was due to the plan he had the honor to submit. He believed there would be but one opinion on the subject, especially when it was on all hands admitted that we had men enough already enlisted for five years for all the purposes of a peace establishment, and that in no event, on disbanding the Army, could there be any difficulty on that score.

Mr. BROOKROX, of New Jersey, said, that although he was not partial to the present bill, nor to the system of which it is a part, but entirely opposed to it; yet he confessed that he was not so much alarmed at the present state of our national affairs as some of his friends appeared to be. If indeed he had brought his mind to believe that this war was to be carried on until Canada was conquered—that if the large army now contemplated should not be raised by voluntary enlistment, (and he did not believe that it would be so raised,) it was the intention of the Government, as avowed on this floor by the honorable Chairman of the Military Committee, to resort to conscription—if he believed in these things, he should be really alarmed at the present state of the nation; but he entertained no serious apprehensions on either of these points. With respect to conscription, he did not believe that any Congress of the United States would be brought to pass such a bill, because he believed that it would be unconstitutional, and therefore could never receive the sanction of the two Houses of Congress; and for the further reason, that such an act would never be submitted to, but would be resisted by the freemen of the United States. He therefore felt no alarm on that point—neither did he believe that it was the intention of Government to carry on this war until Canada was conquered;—true it is that such an intention has been avowed on this floor; but, added Mr. S., take my word for it, your Ministers will never open their lips on the subject of the acquisition of Canada in any negotiation for peace; and he further believed that the Government had not only given up all such designs, but also the other ostensible causes for continuing the war. Mr. S. said that he was irresistibly led to this conclusion by the fact of the Administration having acceded to the late proposition for a negotiation, and by a careful review of the public documents connected with that subject. That, in the recent overtures made by the British Government, it had taken care to state expressly and distinctly the basis, the only basis, on which it would negotiate; that basis was the public law of Europe and the maritime rights of Great Britain—meaning, doubtless, public law and maritime rights as the same are understood by that Government. To open a negotiation on this basis the Administration has assented, and the very act of assent in his opinion in itself is a complete dereliction of the other grounds of the war. Mr. S. said that he was fully borne out in his construction of that act by the conduct of both Governments heretofore, compared with our own, now to be collected from official documents on the table. He alluded to the correspondence of Mr. Russell and the British Minister—and to that of Admiral Warren and the Secretary of State. Soon after the commencement of hostilities, Mr. Russell, by the orders of this Government, offered to the enemy a negotiation for peace and an armistice; but demanded, in pursuance of express instructions, a suspension of impressment as a preliminary to such negotiation. Though not of much importance in itself, the British Government refused it at once. Such a basis might have carried with it some appearance of submitting the right of taking her own men on the seas. To exclude forever such an admission, she refused even a suspension during negotiation; and that too in terms which were complained of for unnecessary asperity. About the same time Admiral Warren, by the order of his Government, made substantially the same offer that is now made. The Orders in Council having been repealed, he offered an armistice, as preliminary to a negotiation on the general principles of public law and mutual rights. The Secretary of State refused the offer, for the special reason that it was not accompanied by some previous arrangement respecting impressment. The war has continued. Now this Government has assented to the same proposition in substance; and not only so, but it has assented to a proposition couched in such terms as fully to prove that Great Britain is determined not to yield an inch of her ground; and when an accompanying document of the most solemn kind, the Prince Regent's speech, charges our Government with showing no disposition to put an end to the war, which it pronounces is not to be found in the overture of Mr. Russell. To negotiate, said Mr. S., on terms of reciprocity, consistent with her understanding of the public law, she is willing; that is, she will probably agree to so regulate the exercise of her rights in future as to secure, as far as is possible, the real American citizen from impressment, provided this Government on its part will prevent the employment of her deserters and the abuse of American protections. Upon such matters she will negotiate, but she tells you plainly that she will not negotiate upon her right. What other conclusion then can be fairly drawn, but that the Administration have acceded to the basis offered, and mean to obtain as favorable regulations as can be procured? If this is not the final determination of the Cabinet, this negotiation is worse than useless—it is solemn mockery—it can serve only to deceive the people and to waste the public treasure. Mr. S. said he would not impute such intentions to the Government. No, he believed that the Administration had at length abdicated their ground, had struck their colors; and he rejoiced that they had at length abandoned the vain attempt to change the public law of Europe, and by a machine of their own invention to convert the subjects of other nations into lawful soldiers, fighting against their native sovereign. He rejoiced at it because it opened a prospect of peace, and an end of the calamities of this dreadful war. The idle doctrine of free trade and sailor's rights—idle as it is now contended for—would soon, he hoped, be heard no more. I might be asked, said Mr. S., if this was the real intention of Government, why all this parade and bustle about an army of sixty thousand men? The answer was plain to his mind; it was all vapor, a mere paper operation, designed to have its effect here, and to be taken in the pockets of your Ministers. We have, added he, been famous for years in operations of this nature, and if we can wage war by proclamations and laws, why not make peace? For his part he had no faith in such nostrums, and would not consent to waste ten or fifteen millions of dollars for such an experiment. Under this conviction he would not consent to any increase of the Army. He was also opposed to it for another reason—he was opposed to the war; especially to it as a war of invasion and conquest. He believed that the present Military Establishment, if properly directed and commanded, was amply sufficient to defend the country when aided by the militia—a safe and sure defence. He had voted against the former bill, and should vote against this.

Extension of Enlistments.

Mr. GENTRY, of Tennessee, observed, that a wish on the part of the majority of the House to despatch the public business had hitherto prevented them from entering into general discussion, and he believed the interest of the country would not justify it at this time; he should therefore confine his observations to a reply to some of the remarks made by gentlemen in the opposition. The gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. STOCKTON) asserts, that the Administration has abandoned the grounds on which the war was declared, by accepting the overture made by the British Government to negotiate at Gottenburg; and that, by the declaration contained in Mr. Monroe's letter to Lord Castlereagh, the maritime rights of Great Britain as claimed by her are recognized, and free trade and sailor's rights are abandoned. Sir, the fact is not so; and I do feel astonished that an attempt should be made to impose upon this House and the people of the United States, by mistaking the contents of a public document so lately put into the possession of each member. What is the language used by the British Minister and your Secretary of State, from which the gentleman ventures to make his assertion? Lord Castlereagh, in his letter of November 4, 1813, says, that his Government is willing to treat "upon principles of perfect reciprocity, not inconsistent with the established maxims of public law, and with the maritime rights of the British Empire." In answer to this, Mr. Monroe states in his letter of the 5th of January, 1814, that the United States are willing to treat "on conditions of reciprocity consistent with the rights of both parties, as sovereign and independent nations." But, sir, does not the practice of impressment strike at the very sovereignty and independence of the American Republic; and, should Great Britain insist on continuing that practice, does any American believe it can be submitted to? No, sir, neither this nor any other Administration can remain in power, who will consent that the citizens of this country shall be subject to such degradation. If Great Britain persists in her claims to enter American vessels and take therefrom American citizens, under the belief or pretence that they are her subjects, no peace can, no peace ought to be made.

The same gentleman has said, that this is designed to be an army on paper only. Here, again, the fact does not warrant the assertion.

The design is to have an efficient army; an army which will make the enemy feel our strength; an army which will procure peace by their prowess and valor, if it cannot be otherwise obtained.

The honorable gentleman tells us he expects peace, and rejoices at the prospect. What, I ask, is the most rational course to be pursued to enable the gentleman to realize this prospect? Is it by placing your country in such a situation as to manifest to the enemy your inability to do him damage, or is it rather by calling out the resources of the country, which will enable you to carry on the war with effect should the negotiation fail? Suppose the gentleman should be disappointed, and the negotiation shortly to commence at Gottenburg should not result in a treaty, what then will be the condition of this country? You will then be engaged in a war without any of the means provided for prosecuting it. This is surely a state of things greatly to be deprecated, and, should the negotiation not succeed, this must be our situation, if the course advocated by the Opposition be adopted.

Sir, the true policy which should be pursued is plain and obvious. If a just and honorable peace can be obtained, accept of it. If the enemy will not make such a peace, be ready to prosecute the war vigorously until you force him to yield to your just claims.

The gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. WEBSTER) advises us to abandon the project of conquering Canada, and turn our force to the ocean, and the will of the nation will go with us. Sir, does that gentleman believe we can safely rely on a declaration of this sort? Has it not been declared by the Opposition that this is an unjust and wicked war, and therefore they will not support it? Would changing the element on which it is to be carried on, change the character of the war, or the principles on which it was declared and is now supported? The same gentleman has said, that, as public opinion is so much divided, it becomes the duty of the majority to adopt the course recommended by the minority, and thereby produce union. We answer, that this war was declared to secure the sovereignty and independence of these States; that we consider its vigorous prosecution essential to their preservation; and, anxious as we are to see union restored, the sacrifice asked for is too great. And, in my turn, I would submit to honorable gentlemen whether it would not be more reasonable and more consistent with the principles of this Government, that the minority should surrender their opposition, and unite with the majority in prosecuting the war? They say, that all the men and money required by us shall be granted; but, what conditions do they impose? That they (the minority) shall make the application of the force. In fact, they contend for the principle that the minority shall substantially govern!

Sir, a sentiment I expressed at the last session, respecting the conduct of a portion of the Opposition, has been much complained of. I then said, and I now repeat, that those who systematically oppose the filling of the loans, and the enlistment of soldiers, are, in my opinion, guilty of moral treason. By this, I by no means intend to censure those who, in the exercise of a constitutional right, express their opinions freely against the expediency of having declared the war, or those who, from choice, withhold their own money from the public service; but those are intended who, after the respective laws were passed, exerted their influence to prevent others from carrying them into effect.

I wish gentlemen would discuss this point fairly and coolly with me. Sir, I challenge them to produce their arguments, and ascertain on which side truth is to be found. Take the case I formerly stated, and answer it. An individual goes over, joins the ranks of the enemy, and raises his arms against his country; he is clearly guilty of treason under the constitution, the overt act being consummated. Suppose the same individual not to go over to the enemy, but to remain in his own neighborhood, and by means of his influence to dissuade ten men from enlisting; I ask, in which case has he benefited the enemy and injured his country most? In the latter, no doubt; because he has weakened his country more than he would have strengthened the enemy by going over to him. In the fashionable language of the day, were I to inquire quo animo have men organized themselves to prevent the enlistments and filling the loans? the answer is clear—to weaken the United States, and give to the enemy the advantage over our arms.

Mr. CALHOUN did not rise, he said, to examine on what terms the President had assented to negotiate with the British Government; because he conceived it neither pertinent to the present question, nor proper at this time. He deemed it, however, his duty to state, that he wholly dissented from the construction which our opponents gave to the documents connected with this subject. If a proper opportunity should hereafter occur, he would be happy to present the reasons for his opinion on this point.

He was induced to occupy the time of the committee at present, to correct two essential errors, which gentlemen in the opposition have introduced into the discussion of this question; and, although not immediately connected with the merits of the bill, he thought it proper that they should be answered; because, from all that he had ever heard, as well on this as former occasions, it seemed to him that they constituted the basis on which the minority rested their justification. He alluded to the character which they gave to the war; and the claim set up in a political and constitutional point of view to justify their opposition. Gentlemen contend that this is not a defensive but an offensive war; and under that character undertake its denunciation, without ever condescending to state what in their opinion constitutes the characteristic difference between them. He claimed the attention of the committee while he examined this point; and he hoped that it would not be considered as a mere verbal criticism, since our opponents have made the distinction the foundation of so much declamation against the war. The inquiry, in another point of view, he believed, would be useful. The people of this country have an aversion to an offensive war; which he supposed interpreted the meaning of the vehemence of the Opposition on this subject; while they readily acknowledge the possible necessity and justice of one that is defensive. It is therefore proper that our ideas on this point should be fixed with precision and certainty. He would lay it down as a universal criterion, that a war is offensive or defensive, not by the mode of carrying it on, which is an immaterial circumstance, but by the motive and cause which led to it. If it has its origin in ambition, avarice, or any of the like passions, then is it offensive; but if, on the contrary, to repel insult, injury, or oppression, it is of an opposite character, and is defensive. The truth of this position would not require much discussion. He conceived that it might safely rely on the authority of the best writers on the subject, or on its own internal evidence. It is only in this view that the prevalent feelings on this subject can be explained. If the distinction taken is a correct one; if the two species of war are distinguishable in their cause and motive, then our aversion to the one and approbation of the other is no longer a mystery—it is founded in the nature of things. But if, on the contrary, it is true that they are distinguished by the mere accidental circumstance of the mode of carrying them on, that the scene of action should make them the one or the other, then the feelings of this country, by which it condemns or approves of either species, is a profound mystery, never to be explained. In the view which he had presented, the difference between an offensive and defensive war is of the moral kind; and the American sense of justice accounts for their feelings. Their exemption from ambition and love of justice preserves them from the former, while their manly spirit and good sense will always make them cheerfully meet the other whenever it becomes necessary. What, then, is the character of the war in which we are now engaged? Was it dictated by avarice or love of conquest? He appealed to our opponents for a decision. They have already decided. When the resolutions of the gentleman from New Hampshire were under discussion, at the last session, it was repeated till the ear was fatigued, by every one on that side of the House who took any part in the debate, that if the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees had been communicated in time to the British Government, the Orders in Council would have been repealed; and, had the last event happened, the war would not have been declared. They then have acknowledged, that the Orders in Council, and not the conquest of Canada, as they now pretend, was the cause of the war; and it would be idle to inquire whether to resist them was in its nature offensive or defensive. It would be to inquire whether they were or were not an injury to our commerce; a point he had never heard denied by the most obstinate debater. It would be equally so to examine whether the cause of continuing the war, to prevent our seamen from impressment, is of an offensive or defensive character.

Very few have the hardihood to deny that it is an injury of the most serious kind, both as it regards the Government, and the unhappy subjects of its operations. It involved the most sacred obligation which can bind the body politic to the citizen; he meant that of protection, due alike to all; to the beggar in the street—much more, if susceptible of degrees, to our sailors, that class of the community who have added so much to the wealth and renown of this country. Having thus established the character of the war in its origin and continuance, he would lay down as a rule not less clear, that a defensive war does not become offensive by being carried beyond the limits of our territory. The motive and cause will ever give character; all the rest are mere essential incidents. When once declared, the only question, even in a defensive war, is, how can it be carried on with the greatest effect. The reverse of this involves the most glaring absurdity. It supposes that we had determined to compel our enemy to respect our rights; and at the same time voluntarily renounced what is acknowledged to be the best and most effectual mode of producing that effect. On this point, as well as the cause of the war, the opinion of our opponents may be arrayed against themselves. What have they advised as to the mode of carrying on the war? Withdraw your troops from Canada, reduce your army, and limit your operations to the ocean. What! to the ocean? Carry the war beyond our own territory! make it offensive! The gentlemen surely do not intend to support an offensive war. To use their own language, it is too immoral for a virtuous and religious people. It is then admitted, that it does not cease to be offensive by its being waged at sea; how then can the carrying it into Canada change its character?

Mr. O. again observed, that it was a mere question of expediency where and how the war ought to be prosecuted. For his part, so long as it continued, he thought no effort ought to be wanting to reduce Canada. Should success accompany our arms, we would be indemnified for the privations and expenses of the war, by the acquisition of an extensive and valuable territory, and the permanent peace and security which it would afford a large portion of our country; and even, in the worst event, should we fail of conquest, the attempt will not be without great advantages. The war in Canada is the best security to every part of our country. We have a very extended, and, from the thinness of the population, in many places weak seacoast. He did not believe that it had been neglected, as represented by the gentleman from New Hampshire; but he did believe that many points are, and must from necessity be, without efficient protection. He would, however, ask that gentleman, how did it happen that this coast, so easily assailed by a maritime power, has sustained little or no damage in a war that has continued upwards of eighteen months? If he is at a loss for an answer, the scheme of his political friend from Virginia, (Mr. SHEFFEY,) to confine our troops to the defensive, should it succeed, would the next summer amply explain the fact. The truth is, that the war in Canada is the security of the coast. It compels the enemy to concentrate the whole of his disposable force there for the defence of his own territory. Were the absurd policy to be adopted to confine the operation of our troops within our own limits, the whole of the enemy's force in Canada would be liberated from its defence, and the entire line of our seacoast menaced with destruction. The enemy, masters on the ocean, could act with such celerity, that it would be either impossible to defend ourselves, or it must be done at an expense greater than would be necessary to reduce his possessions. Thus, even under the limited view of defence, the most effectual mode is that which has been adopted—to carry the war into the enemy's country; and our opponents ought, according to their own distinction, to grant every aid in men and money.

Mr. O. said it now remained to consider the defence which gentlemen have made for their opposition to the war and the policy of their country; a subject which he conceives is of the greatest importance, not only as affecting the result of the present contest, but the lasting peace and prosperity of our country. They assume as a fact, that opposition is in its nature harmless; and that the calamities which have afflicted free States have originated in the blunders and folly of the Government, and not from the perverseness of opposition. Opposition, say they, is a very convenient thing; a wicked and foolish Administration never fail to attribute all of their miscarriages to it; and, in confirmation of this doctrine, they appeal to Lord North's administration. He did not intend to examine the particular case to which gentlemen have with so much parade referred, as it did not fall in the course of his argument; but he thought that it could be easily proven to be essentially different, in character and consequence, from the opposition in this country. He conceived, however, that it would be proper, before he examined the general position taken over the way, to make a single remark, as it related to the British Government, on this subject. It struck him, that all arguments drawn from it on this point must be essentially erroneous. A more determined and vehement opposition there, is not only justifiable, but in some measure required. The difference of the two Governments, in this respect, results from a difference in the organization of their respective Executives. In England, such is its power, patronage, and consequent influence; such the veneration, which its hereditary quality and long descent possess over the subjects of that Empire, that her most enlightened statesmen have ever thought that it endangered the other branches of her Government, and have with much wisdom, ever since the dawn of liberty in that country, strenuously opposed its encroachments. Very different is the case here, under a Government purely Republican. It presents neither the cause to justify such vehemence of opposition, nor the means of restraining it when excited. But, even as applied to our Government, he would readily acknowledge there was a species of opposition, both innocent and useful. Opposition simply implies contrariety of opinion; and, when used in the abstract, it admitted neither censure nor praise. It cannot be said to be either good or bad; useful or pernicious. It is not from itself, but from the connected circumstances, that it derives its character. When it is simply the result of that diversity in the structure of our intellect, which conducts to different conclusions on the same subject, and is confined within those bounds which love of country and political honesty prescribe, it is one of the most useful guardians of liberty. It excites gentle collision, prompts to due vigilance, a quality so indispensable, and at the same time so opposite to our nature, and results in the establishment of an enlightened policy and useful laws. Such are its qualities when united with patriotism and moderation. But in many instances it assumes a far different character. Combined with faction and ambition, it bursts those limits, within which it may usefully act, and becomes the first of political evils. If, sir, the gentlemen on the other side of the House intended to include this last species of opposition, as he was warranted to infer from their expression, when they spoke of its harmless character, then have they made an assertion in direct contradiction to reason, experience, and all history. A factious opposition is compounded of such elements, that no reflecting man will ever consider it as harmless. The fiercest and most ungovernable passions of our nature, ambition, pride, rivalry, and hate, enter into its dangerous composition—made still more so by its power of delusion, by which its projects against Government are covered in most instances, even to the eyes of its victims, by the specious show of patriotism. Thus constituted, who can estimate its force? Where can benevolent and social feelings be found sufficiently strong to counteract its progress? Is love of country? Alas! the attachment to a party becomes stronger than that to our country. A factious opposition sickens at the sight of the prosperity and success of the country. Common adversity is its life; general prosperity its death. Nor is it only over our virtuous sentiments that this bane of freedom triumphs. Even the selfish passions of our nature, planted in our bosom for our individual safety, afford no obstacle to its progress. It is this opposition which gentlemen call harmless, and treat with so much respect; it is this moral treason, to use the language of his friend from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY,) which has in all ages and countries ever proved the most deadly foe to freedom. Nor is it then only dangerous, when it breaks forth into open treason and rebellion. Without resort to violence, it is capable in a thousand ways to counteract and deaden all the motions of Government; to render its policy wavering, and to compel it to submit to schemes of aggrandizement on the part of other Governments; or, if resistance is determined on, to render it feeble and ineffectual. Do gentlemen ask for instances? Unhappily, they are but too numerous. Where shall they not be found? Admired and lamented Republics of antiquity!—Athena, Carthage, and Rome—you are the victims and witnesses of the fall spirit of factious opposition. Fatal fields of Zama and Chæronea! you can attest its destructive cruelty. What is the history of Polybius, and that of the other historians of the free States of antiquity? What the political speeches of Cicero, and the orations of Demosthenes, those models of eloquence and wisdom, but volumes of evidence, attesting that an opposition founded in faction, unrestrained by moderation and a regard to the general welfare, is the most dangerous of political evils. Nor does antiquity alone testify. The history of modern times is pregnant with examples. What, he would ask, have become of the free States of modern Italy, which once flourished in wealth and power—Florence, Genoa, Venice, and many others? What of the United Provinces and Switzerland? Gone; perished under the deadly feuds of opposition. Even England, with her deep-rooted and powerful Executive, has not been free from its pernicious effect. What arrested the war of Marlborough, when France was so humbled that, had it been continued, Europe might have been free from the danger which she has experienced from that power? What stayed the conquering hand of Chatham, when before his genius and power the throne of the Bourbons trembled to its centre? The spirit of factious opposition, that common cause of calamity, that without which liberty might be eternal, and free States irresistible.

MONDAY, JANUARY 17.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a certificate of the election of WILLIAM IRVING to serve as a member of this House, from the State of New York, in the place of Egbert Benson, resigned: which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

Naval Reform and Retrenchment.

Mr. W. REED, of Massachusetts, adverting to former inquiries into the expenditures, &c., of the Navy when that establishment was rather of an ephemeral than permanent nature, which had proved ineffectual, and which were much more important now that the Navy had assumed a greater magnitude, offered the following resolution, being precisely the words of one adopted at a former session in this House:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and if any, what means of retrenchment and economy, of reform in the general management, and of extension and efficiency in the Naval Establishment, may be practicable and expedient; and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. R. said that his motive for offering this resolution, was the general opinion that our Navy cost more money in proportion to its efficient force than any navy in the world. This circumstance he did not attribute to the fault of individuals in that department; but he wished to be enabled to inquire into the defects of the system, if any, and if necessary to devise appropriate remedies. This was his sole object.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, moved to refer the subject to the Naval Committee, whose peculiar duty it would appear to be to inquire into such matters.

Mr. SEYBERT, of Pennsylvania, as a member of the Naval Committee, (in the absence of Mr. LOWNDES, the chairman,) stated, on his part, a full conviction that nothing could be done effectually by that committee in such an inquiry as this. He referred also to the appointment of a committee on a former occasion on the subject, by which, although composed of many members, and authorized to act during the recess, nothing effectual had been done. Mr. S. did not believe they ever should get adequate information on this subject through the means of any committee of this House, or through any means short of a Navy Board, which alone can make the necessary reform. It is impossible that members of Congress, who have in general but little information on the subject of naval matters, or of the various branches of manufactures, should be able to obtain correct information on the various articles of growth or industry which enter into the composition of the navy, or make the necessary reform. With regard to the comparative expense of our Naval Establishment, Mr. S. said it was stated to him by the Chairman of the Naval Committee, from an examination of documents—and it was with surprise Mr. S. had heard the statement—that the persons employed in the naval service had, for the last year, cost less per man than those employed in the navy of Great Britain.

The resolution was then ordered to lie on the table.

Extension of Enlistments.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill authorizing the enlistment of certain regiments for five years, or during the war.

Mr. McLEAN.—Mr. Chairman, it is with diffidence I rise for the purpose of submitting any of my remarks upon the subject under investigation; distrustful of my own capacity, and fearing lest I should obtrude on the time of gentlemen entirely capable of doing justice to the subject. Such considerations produce no inconsiderable embarrassment.

Already in this discussion has the spirit of partyism been excited to the most active exertions. Our language, so rich in expression, has been explored to give a loose to all the feelings of virulence. It is in vain at this late period to lament this unfortunate variance of opinion—the time has long since passed by when this difference of sentiment took place. Its causes I shall not attempt to trace, nor are my powers adequate to show the train of unfortunate consequences that have resulted. Nothing would afford me greater pleasure, if I could cover with the mantle of charity scenes that have frequently transpired. Although I do not presume to call in question the motives of any gentleman on this floor, yet I may be permitted to say, that it is extraordinary, indeed, that no important measure has been transacted by the Administration or advocated by the majority for a series of years that has not been fundamentally wrong. So often has the alarm been given—so accustomed have the majority become to hear the changes of national ruin rang by the gentlemen of the Opposition that they are no longer startled at the sound. The Administration of this Government, although it has been by gentlemen in Opposition repeatedly denounced, its competency arraigned and its motives questioned, still retains, and will continue to retain, the undiminished confidence of a large majority of the American people. No aid is requisite for its vindication—it is founded upon a basis too firm to be shaken by the prejudiced suggestions of any. When this conflict of party shall have ceased; when those who take the most distinguished part in this opposition, together with the Administration, shall have been consigned to the tomb, it will become the task of the dispassionate historian to record the history of his country—his pen will be the messenger of truth, and he will do the Administration justice, which is now by many denied. Sir, I hazard nothing in saying that posterity will find the events of the present Administration on one of the fairest pages in history.

As the causes that immediately produced the war have not been investigated by gentlemen who have preceded me, in imitation of their example I shall avoid entering into any discussion of them. I will only remark, that under accumulated injuries, but seldom, if ever, borne by any nation, our Government continued to remonstrate. Our wrongs were urged with an eloquence irresistible to any except those who were steeled against conviction, and such were the British Ministry. Restrictive measures were resorted to—the embargo, afterwards the non-intercourse; with increased force our diplomatists continued to urge the rights of their country. These measures were intended to coerce the enemy. If he were deaf to reason and justice, it was hoped interest might prevail. The serious effects produced on Great Britain by the restrictive system adopted by this country, it is unnecessary on this occasion to show? What was the stand taken by gentlemen in the opposition on this critical juncture? Like many others, I speak from information. As usual, they denounced the measures of the Government. It was charged with a want of energy. It was emphatically called upon to assume that dignified station its consequence justified. That, if the national rights had been infringed, and suitable reparation refused, to have recourse to the last resort of injured nations. That there existed just cause for war, the candor of many admitted.

The Administration, steady to its purpose, sought the continuance of peace by negotiation. A repetition of injuries still greater and more alarming spoke the language of the British Government. The point of utmost endurance at length arrived—to have passed it would have been to have prostrated the national rights—to have yielded the inheritance secured by the Revolution. Sir, I speak the language, the emphatical language of the American people. The voice of a majority in this Government—the declarations of some gentlemen notwithstanding—is the voice of the people.

It has been well observed, that an injury to property, however extensive, is susceptible of reparation; that the wound is incurable only when inflicted on national honor or national independence. War was recommended—war was declared. Surely those gentlemen who called for energetic measures, now that the Administration had recommended them, were found active in their support. As usual they denounced the measures of the Government. French influence was reiterated from one end of the Continent to the other; anathemas were poured forth against the Emperor of France. It was loudly asserted that the war was produced through his intrigues. The Government was charged with the grossest partiality in selecting the enemy; and as an irrefragable proof, it was triumphantly asked, why a declaration of war was not made against France. No circumstance could have been more fortunate than the call for this measure by an honorable gentleman from Kentucky. It tested the ground of opposition. No circumstance could have taken place that ought more completely to have silenced the clamors of French influence. War was called for against France by a Republican member; it was voted for by a considerable number of the same party, and not more than three or four of the Opposition gave it their sanction! That we had received great injuries from France, no one ever denied; nor do I believe an instance can be cited where an individual of the majority became the apologist of France, or attempted to mitigate her enormities.

The important question now presented is, have we cause for the continuance of the war? Is it proper from the opening prospect of peace to relax in any degree our measures for its prosecution? Is not this the most favorable time for filling the ranks of our army? Suppose the Orders in Council are repealed, does that act heal the bleeding wounds of our country? Are the thousands of American seamen now held in British servitude—taken by force—retained by force—and compelled to fight the battles of our enemy, are these to be neglected and forgotten? We are perpetually told that Great Britain never claimed the right of impressing American seamen. This is literally true; but so long as every petty officer in the British navy is permitted to take British seamen from on board our ships, the rights of American citizens will be disregarded; the complement of men to man the ships of His Majesty will be obtained the first opportunity offering, whether they be Englishmen or Americans. In vain the American sailor informs them the place of his nativity, and claims America for his country. His protection is torn in pieces, and to the loss of liberty is added the keenest insult to himself and his nation. Is it an object with a magnanimous people to stop this source of human misery and national degradation? And is such an object dearly obtained if it cost the price of blood? Sir, the obligations are reciprocal between a citizen and his Government. The citizen owes allegiance, the Government protection. The Government punishes a citizen for treason; it would be unjust not to vindicate his rights. The protection of individuals was the great object in the institution of Government. The strong arm of the community must be raised in behalf of the violated privileges of one of its members; a Government that refuses this is unworthy of confidence, the sooner it is dissolved the better.

How are we to obtain reparation for injuries we have sustained and security for the future? Should the negotiation at Gottenburg fail, how is an honorable peace to be had? But two alternatives are presented. We must obtain the object of our contest by a vigorous prosecution of the war, or we must seek peace by submission? Shall we expect justice by remonstrance? The Administration sought it in this way, until it became a by-word with the Opposition. Shall we indeed bear our wrongs to the foot of the British throne, and beseech His Majesty in his tender mercy to grant us justice? I hope no man in this nation is prepared for this state of degradation? Before such national debasement, I trust Massachusetts would arise from her slumbers; she would call to recollection the tragedy of Bunker's Hill; the shade of her Warren would be seen;—it would be enough, and more than enough; she would rise in her strength, put on the armor of her power, and present her phalanxes in the field as she presented them in the Revolutionary struggle.

The important inquiry is presented, how are we to prosecute the war with the greatest effect? We are told by some gentlemen in opposition, that all our operations for the conquest of Canada will prove ineffectual. Some say it is morally wrong to attempt it; and it is stated by others, that Great Britain cares very little about her Canadian possessions. The importance of this territory in the estimation of the British nation, was manifested by the extravagant rejoicings that took place on acquiring it. Her General Wolfe was immortalized, though he fell in the struggle that attained it. If the acquisition at that period was deemed so important, at the present time it must be infinitely more important that it should be retained. When it was acquired, Great Britain claimed the more valuable portion of North America; should it now be wrested from her, she would lose with it her last foothold on this Continent. I can discover no peculiar force in the objection on the ground of morality. If it be immoral and cruel to carry our arms into the Canadas, because distress is thereby brought upon their innocent inhabitants, the same objection would equally apply against the prosecution of all wars. We cannot reach personally the authors of our injuries: in all wars the innocent suffer, for they fight the battles of their country. Will our efforts for the conquest of the Canadas be in vain? Hold out proper inducements for enlistments—recruit the ranks of our army—concentrate our forces, and the auguries of gentlemen notwithstanding, I have no fears but in another season we shall be able to possess ourselves of their strongholds and carry the American standard to the walls of Quebec. Would it be politic thus to direct the operations of our arms? We resorted to war for the purpose of obtaining redress for injuries. The infliction of the greatest possible injury on our enemy within the usages of nations, is promoting the object of the war. Take the Canadas, and we act in accordance with this policy. Gentlemen in opposition protest against an offensive war; they cannot therefore give their assent to measures for the encouragement of military operations in Canada. They call upon the majority to give over this conquest; resort to measures only calculated for defence—place the energies of the nation on the ocean, the theatre of our glory, and then their co-operation shall most heartily be given. The glaring inconsistency of this proposition has been exposed by gentlemen who have preceded me. The minority refuse aid to forward our military operations in Canada, because they are offensive. Are not our operations on the ocean equally offensive? And yet to the latter their co-operation is offered. In answer to an objection stated, that it would require more troops to guard our frontier than would be sufficient to look down all opposition in Canada, it has been said—withdraw our troops from Canada, let it be understood that no offensive operations would take place against that country, and our frontier would remain unmolested. Then it appears this is the kind of defence to which gentlemen are willing to give their co-operation. To rest upon the faith of the Canadians, taking it for granted they will do us no harm, if they were to remain unmolested by us. Sir, I am unwilling to rest the defence of our country and the protection of our citizens upon such a security.

The necessity of union is so obvious, and has been so eloquently touched, that further arguments are unnecessary, if I were capable of advancing them, to enforce it. When I open the volumes of antiquity, I find many Republics have existed, that are no more! They live only on the faithful page—no vestige of liberty is found to mark their former limits! their fall presents awful beacons to warn us of our danger! We are pointed to the cause of their ruin! Rome was divided, and Rome lost her liberty! Carthage was divided, and Carthage lost her liberty! Athens was divided, and Athens lost her liberty! That country, once the seat of science and of freedom, where orators unrivalled with their eloquence charmed the ears and enraptured the souls of the listening Greeks, has now become the abode of wretchedness and slavery! Mr. Chairman, my spirit sinks within me when I reflect upon the mutability of human institutions, and that the same causes, sooner or later, will produce the same effects! Shall the time indeed come, when the sacred charter of our Union and our rights will exist only on paper? Then it may in truth be said that the soldier of the Revolution has fought, and bled, and died in vain! I beseech gentlemen to cease this dangerous extent of opposition. Willingly will I disarm myself of prejudice, and seek, in conjunction with them, such a course of measures as are best calculated to perpetuate the blessings of our Government. I will sit down with the admonitory language of the Father of his Country: "United we stand, divided we are in danger of falling."

Mr. THOMAS WILSON spoke as follows: Mr. Chairman, four grounds have been chiefly relied upon in opposition to this and the former bill, to wit:

1st. Badness of the cause of war. On this I shall offer no remarks at this time.

2d. Badness of its object, assumed to be the conquest of Canada. This, when emphatically termed "the object," is imaginary altogether. The conquest of Canada has never been either a motive to commence the war or a primary object; but, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I hold it to be an incidental but an indispensable object—not a primary object, but an inevitable consequence, without which I must say, with the gentleman from Louisiana and others, this country cannot be defended in a war with our present enemy from the most destructive invasion.

The observations of the gentleman from New York, on Saturday, occur at this moment. He advanced it with the utmost apparent confidence, and with an air of the most towering triumph, as if to confirm irresistibly all the novel doctrines we have heard so boldly advanced on the one side, and so ably refuted on the other, about chaining down our regular as well as militia force within a line, whilst the enemy is at liberty to attack where and when they please. Let Canada alone, said he; withdraw your armies, and you have nothing to apprehend in that direction from the enemy. Now, this could be nothing more than a strong expression of mere opinion; a proposition which could scarcely be accredited from an accredited Minister of Great Britain; an opinion without a shadow of support from reason, and in the very face of fact. Did not the enemy invade your territory at Michilimackinac without a knowledge that you had anywhere invaded his? If so, he commenced the invasion. He has continued to invade your territories from that moment to the present hour, carrying rapine, conflagration, and murder into every accessible point on all your borders, from Chicago to the shores of Lake Champlain, and from New York to New Orleans. In conjunction with the murderous savage, he has summoned your garrisons, demanding their surrender upon pain of indiscriminate slaughter of your old men and your infants, man and woman, soldier and citizen. Next after Michilimackinac, we remember the fate of Chicago, the invasion at Detroit, at River Raisin, at Fort Meigs, Fort Wayne, Sandusky, Buffalo, Manchester, Lewistown, Fort Niagara, Sodus, Oswego, Sackett's Harbor, Ogdensburg, and the villages on Lake Champlain. Will their invasion cease if you withdraw your armies? No supposition can be more extraordinary. Would the enemy suffer you to draw your forces to the seacoast, to become invulnerable there, and, undisturbed, employ your whole resources in naval preparations? No, sir; withdraw your armies, and I may say, on grounds as reasonable, at least, as any the gentleman from New York has advanced to the contrary, before the first of September next, the enemy will have not only put to flight, or desolated, or destroyed the frontier on all your border, from Lake Champlain to Lake Superior, but, unless resisted by more than one hundred thousand men, will have penetrated your country to Albany on the East, and Pittsburgh on the West. Has not a mere handful of the enemy's forces recently destroyed the strong Fort Niagara, spread flames and desolation for forty miles along the strait, driven before it a Major General's command, and put the country to flight near fifty miles in an interior direction? And, strange to imagine, this very circumstance is urged in argument against the bills to augment the Army!

I repeat, sir, withdraw your armies, and the degree of destruction I have imagined is not exaggerated, unless you have a positive treaty of peace for one side of your country, whilst the other is at war; unless Great Britain is thus converted into our faithful friend, in one section of our country, whilst the same power is waging with remorseless fury a war of extermination in another. Why? Because the enemy would have the power and the will to do so. The power, evidently, in the undisturbed possession of an overgrown military establishment in Canada; the will, because a sufficient motive is to be found in the diversion of your resources from defending your seacoast against his plundering squadrons, and from the increase of your naval means. I do not think the gentleman from South Carolina has succeeded, in the admirable manner common to that gentleman, in the view he took of the importance of Canada. His remark is certainly true, but had not all that point and force which I am used to look for whenever he speaks. The defence of Canada, said he, tends to save your seacoast, and accounts for the small degree of success your enemy has had in that direction. It would be still more true, to say the position of the enemy's military establishment in Canada, enables him at pleasure to exhaust your resources in interior defence, to the exposure of your maritime frontier, and thus keep down your naval means also, or to penetrate and destroy your country. Would he not act thus barbarously? I would only inquire whether, if it be in his power, would the public law of Europe restrain him? Ask your impressed seamen? Ask the survivors of Le Raisin, of Chicago, of Fort Meigs, or the relatives of a murdered family; the perishing families along the Niagara; or inquire of those who have survived the Revolution? Is it impossible for him to commit murder without the hand of a red man? By other hands he may commit a still blacker murder. The only means by which you can restrain him must be held in your own hands, or, believe me, there is no safety. For these very ends are the strongholds in Canada maintained. Quebec (a term said to import a narrow passage, a strait) is the gateway at which the greatest evils of a war with England can enter; it is an entrance at which the enemy comes upon your rear and takes every advantage; an entrance into a spacious country, having an inland seacoast of greater extent than the Atlantic; and, if a line can shield his forces in their passage along this border until time and place unite to serve his purpose, I repeat, once more, this country would become an easy conquest, or rather, an unresisting victim. But I am laboring to prove the sun shines at noonday, to the satisfaction of those who see it. Gentlemen would vote an army provided you will pledge yourself that it shall not cross a line which separates your territories from those of the enemy. To my conception it would be just as reasonable to require as the condition, that it shall march without arms and be bound in fetters whenever the enemy approaches. Such appears to me this ground of objection.

A third ground, was the impossibility of success in the contemplated invasion, and the little worth of the possessions in question, if success was possible. It was at last admitted, by one gentleman, that you possibly might succeed in gaining possession as far down the St. Lawrence as Montreal, but no farther—the fortress of Quebec would stand impregnable; whilst another gentleman contended that Canada could not be taken, because it must be done by drenching its soil in the blood of its inhabitants. Now, this whole ground of argument, as well as every branch of it, I would rank among the strongest that can be urged in favor of these bills. The more competent your force, the less probability or necessity will there be of shedding blood; and, if the fortress of your enemy is already of such gigantic strength, this only furnishes another, and a cogent proof that its reduction is indispensable to your own defence. To the same effect is evidently all the extraordinary resistance already experienced. All go to prove irresistibly that the enemy has been intrenching himself, preparing his weapons of war, and accumulating strength, whilst we have slumbered in security and peace. Still, there have been strong indications that he doubted his ability, effectually to resist our force; and, should we now persevere, and convince him that we can and will, whenever a state of war requires it, tumble all his strongholds about his ears, he will be the less inclined to re-possess them. But if we fail, we have every reason to fear the test will give him strength beyond his most sanguine expectation; he will be stimulated to new exertions, with greater confidence and strength than heretofore. Then, sir, would you be compelled, indeed, to keep on foot an overgrown peace establishment, to oppose fortress to fortress, soldier to soldier, when none are necessary. Other, and still more immediate considerations, recommend the most immediate exertion of the utmost energy to invade and conquer your enemy in Canada. He threatens in express terms your citizens, prisoners of war, with death—has them confined in dungeons; holds them, unfortunately for us, in considerable numbers—besides more than six thousand of your citizens in prison ships, fighting against you, and against their will. He threatens, moreover, in express terms, still greater devastation on your seacoast. Take, then, his strongholds in Canada without delay, before his succors shall arrive, and before the approaching summer shall secure his armies a retreat.

A fourth ground, the last I shall notice, was this: the incompetency of the Administration to conduct the operations of the war, attempted to be proved by the recital of numerous instances of misconduct heretofore. Upon this ground the particular observations were made which furnished my decisive reason for troubling the committee at this time. In enumerating the various instances of misconduct exhibited in order to establish the fact of incompetence or turpitude, rendering the Administration unworthy to be intrusted with an additional force, we have had a recapitulation of nearly all the military movements from the commencement of the war to the present time, without much discrimination between defeats and victories, and not only no credit is given, but a large share of censure is attached to each circumstance. The capture of York and Fort George, says the gentleman from New York, (Mr. MILLER,) were palpable defects in a campaign; for which the responsible officer was suspended indeed, but ought to have been arrested—especially for not making Kingston the first point of attack instead of York, and because the garrison of Fort George was suffered to escape. One remark which I shall offer in reply to these observations, will apply equally to all. The decision of the gentleman precedes instead of following the inquiry recently called for by an almost unanimous vote of this House: so, therefore, must necessarily be whatever may be said in reply to those facts and arguments. Some facts, however, are well known, some of notoriety, and some by official correspondence; others are probable, and some merely possible; which, with the obvious deductions, may be fairly though prematurely adduced to rebut accusations, and still more so decisions which are premature. Was not York the capital of the Province of Upper Canada, an important depot of troops and stores and of Indian supplies, placed at the very point for immediate conveyance to the Northwestern Indians in case of any obstruction on the accustomed route?—a large detachment of the British army garrisoning the place, and, what is perhaps still more important, a large vessel was on the stocks in a state of great forwardness. It is known also, I believe, that a considerable flotilla of the enemy had wintered there. Is it certain that the commanding General had no discretion, or, if he had, that there were no circumstances rendering it proper first to attack this post? It is certainly a harbor earlier open than that of Kingston, which I am not certain was free of ice at that time. The same remarks, except the last, apply equally to Fort George, the stores at each were forward on their passage to the Northwest; and, had Kingston been first attacked, would have reached their destination without interruption or the necessity of retaining their forces to second it. Had not astonishing alacrity been used in preparing for their attacks, and were they not conducted with admirable order and celerity? The garrisons escaped indeed, as they preferred flight to determined resistance; probably to prevent it was impossible—to pursue was all that was practicable. Might not even this have been difficult or impracticable immediately to execute, without artillery or cavalry, as an army must have been on first landing, and for some time after, in a country abounding in wood, ambuscades to be apprehended, and roads abated with the greatest ease?

WEDNESDAY, January 19.

*Resignation of the Speaker, &c.

The ordinary business of the day having been gone through—

The SPEAKER addressed the House in the following terms:

* Appointed a Minister in the joint commission to treat for peace.

JANUARY, 1814.]

Turreau's Letter.

[H. OF R.]

"GENTLEMEN: I have attended you to-day to announce my resignation of the distinguished station in this House with which I have been honored by your kindness. In taking leave of you, gentlemen, I shall be excused for embracing this last occasion to express to you personally my thanks for the frank and liberal support the Chair has experienced at your hands. Wherever I may go, in whatever situation I may be placed, I can never cease to cherish, with the fondest remembrance, the sentiments of esteem and respect with which you have inspired me."

The SPEAKER having left the Chair, and it remaining vacant—

Mr. FINDLAY, of Pennsylvania, moved that the House come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be presented to HENRY CLAY, in testimony of their approbation of his conduct in the arduous and important duties assigned to him as Speaker of this House.

The question having been put on this resolution by the Clerk, it was decided in the affirmative—for the resolution 144, against it 9.

A motion was then made to adjourn, and negatived—for adjournment 70, against it 90.

On motion of Mr. POTTER, of Rhode Island, the House proceeded to the choice of a Speaker.

Messrs. MOORE, JOHNSON, and WHEATON, were appointed tellers; and having counted the ballots, Mr. MOORE reported, that the whole number of votes given in being one hundred and sixty-five, eighty-three were necessary to a choice; that of these votes there were—

For LANGDON CHEVES	-	-	-	94
FELIX GRUNDY	-	-	-	59
Scattering	-	-	-	12

and that LANGDON CHEVES, having a majority of votes, was duly elected Speaker of the House.

Mr. CHEVES was accordingly conducted to the Chair, and made his acknowledgments to the House in the following words:

"GENTLEMEN: I thank you for the flattering and distinguished honor you have conferred upon me. The best acknowledgment I can make of the gratitude which I profoundly feel, will be expressed in the exertion of every faculty I possess, to prove that your favor is not entirely unmerited. I am aware of the importance of the station to which you have elevated me, and of the difficult nature of the duties which it imposes; a difficulty to discharge them with reputation, not a little increased by the great ability with which they have been executed by the gentleman who has just descended from the Chair; but with your support I shall not despair. Err, I undoubtedly often shall; and when my errors shall be calculated to affect, in the smallest degree, the interests of the House or the nation, I shall court your correction, and submit with cheerfulness and pleasure to your authority; but if they be immaterial, as frequent differences of opinion between the House and its presiding officer can add nothing to its dignity, and may diminish his usefulness, I shall ask, what I fear I shall too often need, your kind indulgence."

The oath to support the Constitution of the United States was then administered to him by Mr. FINDLAY, one of the Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania; and then the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 20.

Turreau's Letter.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; which was read and laid on the table:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of State, complying with their resolution of the 12th instant.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 19, 1814.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 18, 1814.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 12th instant, requesting the President to lay before the House any correspondence with, or communication in writing from the late Minister of France, on or about the 14th of June, 1809, or by his successor since, prescribing the conditions on which their Sovereign would consent to treat of amity and commerce with the United States, &c., has the honor to make to the President the following report:

That, of the transactions which took place in the Department of State, before the Secretary of State came into office, which was in the year 1811, he has no means of acquiring a knowledge, other than from the archives of the Department, or from the persons intrusted with their safe keeping.

That he has caused the files of the Department to be carefully examined for a communication described by the resolution of the House of Representatives, and that none such has been found of the date therein referred to, or of any other date, from the former Minister of France, or from his successor, or any trace or evidence of such a communication; that he has also inquired of the Chief Clerk of the Department, who has been in that office since the year 1807, concerning the same, and whose statement is annexed.

That no such communication was ever addressed to the Secretary of State by the present Minister of France.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 18, 1814.

I know not how I can more clearly state every thing that I know relative to a letter which was recently published in some of the public prints, from General Turreau to Robert Smith, Esq., and which I suppose to be the communication alluded to in the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 12th instant, than by observing, that when that letter, as published, was shown to me by a gentleman of this office, I told him I could not say whether it was genuine; that some parts did not appear new to me, but that other parts of it did. We immediately looked at General Turreau's file, and no such letter was there. I then observed, that if it was genuine, it must be the letter from General Turreau which had been withdrawn.

The fact of one of his letters, which I had translated for Mr. Smith, having been withdrawn, I distinctly remember, though I cannot speak with certainty either of its date or of its contents, more than four years having elapsed since I saw it; but I remember it was considered exceptionable, and that Mr. Smith directed me not to put it on the files, but to lay it aside. I can add, too, that it was the only letter from General Turreau which to my knowledge was ever withdrawn.

This letter was withdrawn by a gentleman attached to the French Legation, who called at the Department of State to get it, and it was delivered to him, either by Mr. Smith himself, or by me under his directions. When this was done I cannot now recollect, nor have I any means of ascertaining, except by reference to a subsequent event, which happened in the month of November, 1809. I allude to the dismissal of Mr. Jackson. For I remember, in a conversation I had with Mr. Smith respecting that occurrence at the time it took place, he observed that he supposed General Turreau would now be glad he had withdrawn his letter.

In what way the translation of this letter has got into the public prints I know not, nor do I know where or by whom it was taken from this office.

JOHN GRAHAM,
Chief Clerk Department of State.

Extension of Enlistments.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: It is with great reluctance that I rise in this debate; nothing but an imperious sense of duty could have compelled me—especially at this protracted period of it—after those brilliant displays of genius, learning, and eloquence, which, with pleasure and instruction, we have witnessed from both sides of the Hall. In this brilliant contest they appear like brothers of the same national family; and the same spark of divinity moves and animates them in debate. Such instances add celebrity to our national character. In that every American has an interest: and though they are above emulation, still each individual may claim his proportion of the honor. I have only to regret that those gentlemen in the majority who have thus distinguished themselves, had not a better cause to advocate; and that my friends in the minority, who have at least equally distinguished themselves, could only deserve success.

Speaking, sir, of national character, and of what tends to ascertain and extend it, I should do injustice to unrivalled merit, and to my own feelings, did I not advert to our Navy—a Navy identified with glory itself; the heroes of which, if I may be permitted the allusion, have fixed the stars of our flag in the Heavens, as a new and brilliant constellation in this Western hemisphere; a sign in which we conquer; our heavenly guide to victory.

When, sir, from these brilliant objects, I bring down my mind to your mouldering, dispirited, I might add, disgraced Army, and to your contentious boasting Generals, I can scarcely persuade myself that they belong to the same nation, and form a part of the same system. And when I extend my view further and consider your seacoast, from the Mississippi to the St. Croix, invested by the hostile squadrons of your enemy; and when I turn my attention to your northern frontier, and behold it, for a long distance, wrapt in flames, and its distressed and defenceless inhabitants flying before an exasperated foe, and the sacred soil of our country in the possession of that foe, I could almost wish for power to call down the vengeance of Heaven upon those rash and guilty men who have drawn our country into the vortex of misery and ruin. "O, my soul, come not thou into their secret; unto their assembly, mine honor be not thou united!"

When, sir, this Administration declared their war against England, they proclaimed to the world, what they were pleased to consider its justifying causes: Those citizens, who were opposed to this Administration and to their war, published to the world what they deemed its causes. The one relied upon the illegal blockades, impressment, and the Orders in Council of Great Britain. The other imputed it to the art, duplicity, and intrigue of the imperial despot of France. Perhaps a combination of these causes led to the calamitous result; though without French intrigue it never would have been produced.

But I have another view of this subject to which I solicit the attention of this House, and of the American people. I consider this war as the necessary and inevitable result of that policy and system of measures, so long pursued by the present and immediately preceding Administration, under Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison. Yes, sir, I consider this war, connected as it is with your embargo and your internal system of taxation, which indeed grew out of it, as bringing to an important issue before the tribunal of the American people, the great question for a long time depending between the rival parties in America, as to the correctness or incorrectness of their respective systems of measures. It is indeed a momentous, a solemn question; involving the Administration of our Government, the existence of our federal institutions, and the happiness or misery of the American people. Yes, sir, upon the judgment which that people shall pronounce upon that issue, their existence as a free people depends. Do thou, O God! interpose thine eternal wisdom, and lead their minds to a correct decision.

If, sir, under Washington, this people advanced with a more rapid progress than any nation under heaven, to national respectability and happiness; and if the same people, under the Administration of Jefferson and Madison, have been deprived by them of most of their national blessings, and are rapidly declining, from their proud elevation, into misery and discontent: can they for a moment hesitate to which to give the preference; can they not instantly decide which is their bane, which the antidote? To the intelligence of the American people the decision is with confidence submitted.

I have remarked, sir, that I consider the present war of the Administration as the necessary result of that system of measures, if system it can be called, in relation to our own country and to foreign nations, which has been so long and so obstinately persevered in by Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison. This system was first proposed by Mr. Jefferson, when Secretary of State, in his laborious and celebrated report to Congress in 1793, on the privileges and restrictions of our commerce in foreign ports. Upon which report were predicated the equally celebrated resolutions proposed by Mr. Madison, then a representative from Virginia to Congress, in January, 1794. In the debates upon these resolutions, Mr. Madison and the other advocates thereof, contended, as we are informed by the distinguished historian of that period, Chief Justice Marshall: "That the propositions submitted by these resolutions, were the strongest weapon America possessed, and would, more probably than any other, restore her to all her political and commercial rights." They further urged them on the ground of justice to France, by whom it was said our ships and produce were more favorably received than by Great Britain, or, in the language of the day, "The primary motive of these resolutions, as acknowledged by their defenders, was not the increase of agriculture, manufactures, and navigation, but to humble Great Britain and build up France." (And the same motive has most preposterously actuated those defenders to this day.) "And that if Great Britain should retaliate, the effects of a commercial conflict would be felt by her much more sensibly than by the United States."

Thus were thickly sown the tares of that system of commercial warfare, which have since sprung up and ripened into non-importations, non-intercourse, embargo, and war. Well might the political writers in Great Britain consider this system as war in disguise; well might they view it as a system of coercion, acting upon the distresses and discontents of their manufacturers, laborers, and mechanics. But what is indeed most surprising in the progress of this business is, that Great Britain was disposed to, and actually did consider it, though aimed principally against her, as merely commercial restriction or municipal regulation. While France, which it professed to build up, in some instances, considered it as hostile to the rights of her subjects and the dignity of her empire.

I will now, sir, read, if not for the information of the House, at least for that of the American people, (and I shall make no apology for drawing their attention afresh to the subject,) a part of the memorable letter of the 5th of August, 1810, from the Duke of Cadore, the French Secretary, to General Armstrong. A letter, I presume, which will never be forgotten by the American Government or people, as forming a part of one of the most infamous cheats and frauds that ever disgraced the Cabinet of that intriguing nation; and which, instead of having been the foundation of a friendly proclamation, might with more justice have been made the foundation of a declaration of war.

"PARIS, August 5, 1810.

"I have laid before His Majesty, the Emperor and King, the act of Congress of the 1st May.

"His Majesty could have wished that this act, and all other acts of the Government of the United States which interest France, had always been officially made known to him.

"The Emperor had applauded the general embargo laid by the United States on all their vessels, because that measure, if it has been prejudicial to France, had in it at least nothing offensive to her honor.

"The act of the first of March has raised the embargo; and substituted for it a measure the most injurious to the interests of France.

"This act, of which the Emperor knew nothing until very lately, interdicted to American vessels the commerce of France, at the time it authorized that to Spain, Naples, and Holland, that is to say, to the countries under French influence, and denounced confiscation against all French vessels which should enter the ports of America. Reprisal was a right, and commanded by the dignity of France, a circumstance on which it was impossible to make a compromise. The sequestration of all American vessels in France has been the necessary consequence of the measures taken by Congress.

"Now Congress retrace their steps; they revoke the act of the first of March; the ports of America are open to French commerce, and France is no longer interdicted to the Americans.

"In this new state of things, I am authorized to declare to you, sir, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan are revoked, and that after the first day of November they will cease to have effect; it being understood that in consequence of this declaration the English shall revoke their Orders in Council, and remove the new principle of blockade which they have wished to establish, or that the United States, conformably to the act you have just communicated, shall cause their rights to be respected by the English.

"It is with the most particular satisfaction, sir, that I make known to you this determination of the Emperor. His Imperial Majesty loves the Americans. Their prosperity and their commerce are within the scope of his policy."

Let us first see what figure an American Congress makes on this French canvass. Offended by one of your laws of mere municipal regulation, (and so considered by Great Britain,) the haughty tyrant says—"Reprisal was a right, and commanded by the dignity of France;" then calmly adds—"The sequestration of all American vessels in France has been the necessary consequence of the measures taken by Congress." He then insultingly subjoins—"Now Congress retrace their steps." Ay, sir, Representatives, Senators, and President, all—all "retrace their steps." The tyrant frowns—they stop; he seizes all American property—they retrace their steps; he commands it, and they repeal the obnoxious statute; or, in other words, and in his imagination, they fall prostrate at the tyrant's feet! Then, indeed, as the noble Duke has the satisfaction of stating, "His Majesty loves the Americans!"—"His Majesty loves the Americans!" Yes, sir, it is even so written, "His Majesty loves the Americans!" He loves the Americans! and seizes, sequesters, and condemns all the property within his reach. He love the Americans! and immure our defenceless sailors in his dungeons! His very smiles (if such a monster ever does smile) are to betray; his friendly professions, treachery; his love destruction; an alliance with him, would be the unnatural conjunction, by a tyrant of antiquity, of a dead corpse with a living body. Not the tiger crouching for his prey, nor the lion roaring for his food, is more to be dreaded than this scourge, this pestilence, this death. I would spurn from my country his love, his professions, and his treachery.

Still "His Majesty loves the Americans; their prosperity and their commerce are within the scope of his policy." No doubt, sir; no doubt, when within the scope of his power. But this kind "Emperor is pleased in aggrandizing the United States," by stripping their unprotected citizens of all the property within his grasp, and expecting hereafter to aggrandize the United States by generously declaring them a territory of France, and by elevating them to the dignity of his Empire, adding to his other titles that of Lover of the Americans. How was it possible, sir, that any man in his senses could have been deceived by a paper like this? How was it possible for your President to give it the least faith or credit? It carries treachery and deceit on the face of it. Yes, sir, on this deception was predicated the fatal proclamation of your President of the 2d November, 1810, whereby he proclaimed to the world that, on the day before, at a place more than three thousand miles from him, a certain fact had happened, essential to the validity of that proclamation, but which, in truth, did not take place till April after, and which was not promulgated till May, 1812, in season to effect the rescinding of the British Orders in Council; in such time that neither fact should be known in this country till after your declaration of war; and the intent of that declaration was the subject of conversation in Paris before it was in America. Our Government had certainly agreed with that of France to declare war by a certain day, (say the first of June, 1812,) unless the British Orders in Council should be rescinded before that day. And they did but too faithfully keep their word.

Sir, Congress themselves did not believe that the French Decrees were repealed so late as March, 1811, when they re-enacted the provisions of your non-intercourse law, which had been attempted to be revived by this proclamation. And Bonaparte, though solicited to save the apparent veracity of your President, intending to add the grossest insult to the highest injury, would not condescend to found his repealing decree upon that proclamation, because he well knew it was a mere dead letter, as his decrees were not repealed when that proclamation was issued; but he founded it upon the act of March, 1811, as an act of resistance to British aggression. The only concession he made to the proclamation, was to suspend a few condemnations, though not any of his captures or seizures. Is it not then apparent that our Government has by this imperial despot been grossly deceived? Willingly and blindly led on, step by step, to a situation from which they could not recede without disgrace and dishonor to themselves, or go forward without distress and ruin to their country?

"Alas, their dazzled eyes
Beheld this man in a false glaring light,
Which conquest and success have thrown upon him!
Did they but view him right, they'd see him black
With murder, treason, sacrilege, and crimes,
That strike my soul with horror but to name 'em!"

Attend for a moment, sir, to the declarations of your President himself, in his three Messages preceding this session. You will find him speaking in relation to France of "authorized expectations," "amicable professions," "negotiations procrastinated to the latest date." Ay, sir, this procrastination is indeed the very thief of time—of millions of American property—and of a large proportion of our national spirit and reputation. In his Message at the last session he speaks of "delays before so unreasonably spun out." Yes, sir, spun out indeed! And he will continue to spin them out, so long as you condescend to send him the raw material. Yes, sir, here were spun those halters which, in the appropriate language of an eloquent gentleman on a former occasion, were by France so twisted round the necks of this Administration, that nothing but the sword of war could sever them.

Why then disgrace our country by keeping your Minister dancing attendance at the court of this proud, sanguinary, and faithless tyrant? Is Republican America to be the only nation to prop his tottering throne? Thank God the "tyrant falls, and the world again is free!" Let us, then, emancipate our country from this imperial slavery! and with the immortal bard exclaim—

"Then be these juggling fiends no more believ'd,
That palter with us in a double sense;
That keep the word of promise to our ear,
And break it to our hope."

FRIDAY, JANUARY 21.

Right of Expatriation.

Mr. ROBERTSON rose to offer a resolution to the House. He said it had always struck him as singular that there was nothing in the constitution or the law which points out the manner in which one of the most important rights belonging to man in his social character is to be exercised. He meant the right of expatriation. Some provision on this subject had become important from circumstances which have lately occurred, and the more so, because of the doctrines affecting it which have recently been broached in the nation, and which, but a few years ago, would have been scouted by all parties. Whether the right was denied or admitted, it was important that the question should be settled. As far as the subject has been before the people of the United States, the opinions have been various and contradictory; as far as the subject has been before the courts, they have decided that the right of expatriation does not exist, and a decision more contrary to the spirit of the constitution never was given in any court of the United States. He alluded to the familiar case of Isaac Williams, decided before Judge Ellsworth, of Connecticut. The disposition of the Legislature, as far as manifested by its acts, was favorable to the right of expatriation. It was time that some definite decision should take place in relation to it. In draughting the resolution, he had gone upon the ground that the right of expatriation was clear, natural, and inalienable, and required no legal provision to fortify it, otherwise than by prescribing the manner in which it shall be exercised. He admitted that the Constitution of the United States did not directly give this right; neither did it give a thousand other rights which we exercise in society. It did not, in terms, give the right to move beyond the horizon which bounds our view; but no man doubts the right. The constitution, however, does impliedly give the right of expatriation. It gives a right to the citizens of other countries to come into the United States and be naturalized; a right which cannot be given or admitted by any community that denies the right of expatriation. Mr. R. said he did not wish this important question to rest merely on inference. He wished that every citizen might have it in his power to turn to the statute books of the country, and show explicitly, when he thinks proper to expatriate, that he had availed himself of the right in the manner prescribed by law.

It need not excite any alarm, that our citizens will too freely avail themselves of the privilege. The best way of keeping our citizens at home is to make them free and happy. Odious must be the Government or laws which make a man willing to leave his country. But when, if ever, his country deprives him of his rights, of every thing desirable to man, let us not make that country his prison, but give him the power of legally removing himself from beneath its control. With these observations, Mr. R. submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the exercise of the right of expatriation, and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, made some remarks which were not very distinctly heard by the reporter. He said, however, that the resolution embraced a question at any time interesting, and particularly so at this time. How far the right of expatriation ought to be extended was a question of great importance. When it was considered, also, that a negotiation was pending with a foreign power, in which this principle was involved; and, when it was considered that the Government might find it necessary to make concessions on this point, and to restrict naturalization, it became important to approach the question with much circumspection. It was a well-known fact, not only from the decision which the gentleman had quoted, but from other circumstances of public notoriety, that there was a difference of opinion whether the right of expatriation does exist. Not only in a general point of view, but from the particular circumstances in which the United States are placed, this question was very important. The adoption of a resolution of this kind, to appoint a committee of inquiry into the expediency of providing by law the mode of expatriation, might, perhaps, be considered as establishing the principle of the right, which ought not thus hastily to be settled. He moved that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, said he had heard with some little surprise the reasons assigned for laying this resolution on the table, and the quarter from which they proceeded surprised him more than the doctrine itself—that the resolution ought not to pass, lest it should interfere with our negotiations with Great Britain. We were told the other day, said he, that we, or the Government, had struck our flag. But is it come to this, that we are afraid to inquire into our own municipal regulations lest we offend our enemy? Under such circumstances as this, can it be expected that our enemy will be very yielding in negotiation? Will not a refusal to agree to this resolution be acknowledging, in language too plain, that we are about give up this point? Will it not be saying we are ready to yield them whatever they ask—in other words, their maritime rights? The question now before the House is merely, that we should inquire into the propriety of giving to man as much liberty as the God of Heaven gave him at his birth, and does not for a moment depend on the feeling of any foreign nation. If we mean to be independent, we must be so in whole and not in part; we should maintain our rights unceasingly. Shall we now hesitate whether we shall inquire into this subject, lest it should affect the negotiations with an enemy whom we are determined to fight forever unless she yields? We had better say at once, that the Representative branch of the Government has become so timid that it dare not inquire into our municipal rights for fear the enemy should not like it. He would not for a moment hold out such an idea.

Mr. CULPEPER, of North Carolina, said this was a subject of importance, and well worthy of consideration. He was of opinion, however our municipal regulations might interfere with those of other nations, it was the duty of this Government to do its own business in its own way, and therefore he was opposed to the resolution's being laid over.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, said he hoped the resolution would be ordered to lie on the table. It seemed to be acknowledged that its adoption might have a tendency to embarrass negotiation. He was not certain how far that idea might be correct; but if by possibility it could have that tendency, its adoption was surely not advisable. Mr. C. wished for time to reflect on this subject, and he did not see why that time should not be granted. It was a question of great delicacy under every aspect, and one which they could not decide affirmatively or negatively without embarrassment. A state of war did not appear to him the best time for agitating such a subject, at least it ought not to be hastily disposed of.

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, expressed his surprise at the nature of the objections which had been urged to this resolution. Could any regulations be made by treaty, he asked, declaring that the people of this country should not go where they pleased? It was impossible to imagine that that right could come in question in any negotiation with foreign powers. If this subject was one of difficulty, as was contended, he believed the sooner it was looked to the better. But, notwithstanding this belief, the only reason for departing from this general rule to vote for any motion to lie on the table, on the request of any member, was the declaration of a gentleman, that he meant by that motion to put the question at rest for the session.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, said he had really been surprised to hear gentlemen allege that the adoption of a resolution, or passage of a law on this subject, would have any possible effect on any pending negotiation. If, for the first time, the question was proposed to establish the right of naturalization, of which expatriation is the necessary correlative, then the expediency of agitating the question at this moment might be doubted. But the constitution had expressly declared that Congress should possess the power of naturalization; and would they now controvert the principle established in the constitution, by denying to our own citizens the right to expatriate? If foreign nations desire to inquire into the disposition of the Government in this respect, let them look into our charter; they will find the principle of naturalization ingrafted there. This idea of expatriation was by no means novel, Mr. J. said, in the State to which he belonged—where there was an act of expatriation of which persons might avail themselves. He could see no objection to this proposition at this time. Indeed, if this war continued, of which all hoped to see an honorable termination, it was indispensable, with a view to that state of things, that some provision should be made on the subject of expatriation. A citizen going into Canada and returning, and thus committing treason, alleges, on detection, that he has expatriated; and if tried as a spy of the enemy, alleges that he is an American citizen. Some regulation was necessary to prevent this collusion, and, whether peace or war prevailed, it was proper that the question should be settled definitively in some way.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, observed that all that had been said of this motion affecting negotiation &c., ought to have no effect. To refuse the passage of this resolution on the grounds on which it had been opposed, was to contest that principle of the constitution by which Congress are authorized to make laws relative to naturalization; for it was a known truth that naturalization and expatriation belonged to the same subject; because there can be no naturalization without previous expatriation. The arguments against this motion apply as strongly to the constitutional provision on this head, which was just as likely as this motion to impede negotiation. Mr. R. said he had known nothing of the design to bring forward this motion; but, having been brought before the House, he considered it his duty, under the solemn obligations of the constitution, to vote against any evasion of it, as was proposed.

Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina, said, laying the motion on the table would not affect a future decision on it. The subject never having before occurred to his mind, were he now to give a vote on it, it must be at hazard. As it was advisable to commune further together before they decided on it, he was therefore in favor of laying it on the table.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, said he was as ready as any gentleman in the House to investigate this subject, and, if the right exists, to make the necessary regulations; but, if voting to lay the resolution on the table implied an acknowledgment of the principle therein assumed, he should not vote for it. The gentleman had laid down the right of expatriation as inalienable, and had at the same time informed the House that a person named Isaac Williams, notwithstanding he had taken the oath of allegiance to another power and received the character of a foreign citizen, had been punished, as a citizen of the United States, with fine and imprisonment. If such had been the administration of justice by a high tribunal, it was strong evidence to him that the law was against the position the gentleman had assumed; because the proper guide on points of law, where there was no lex scripta, was the decision of judicial tribunals. The gentleman from Virginia had instanced the law of that State giving this right. If there was a law giving this right there, it was strong evidence that there was no such right before the law passed; and, certainly, if the right was inherent, as contended, no law of Congress was necessary to give it. Mr. W. said he should have no objection to vote for a resolution which should bring the whole question before the House; but he could not vote for a resolution which assumed the existence of the right of expatriation.

The question on laying the resolution on the table was decided in the affirmative.

Extension of Enlistments.

The engrossed bill authorizing the enlistment of certain regiments for five years, or during the war, was read a third time.

Mr. POTTER said he thought the war inexpedient, and voted against it, and should vote against this bill, to raise more men to carry it on. That he had been in hopes the question would have been taken without debate, at least on the side of the minority. That although he was opposed to this bill, yet he thought it much more equitable to raise soldiers, as was now contemplated, by enlisting and giving a large bounty to induce them to enlist voluntarily, and make the rich pay the money, than to adopt the conscriptive system proposed, as he understood, by the Secretary at War, by classing the whole body of militia into as many classes as there were soldiers wanting, and to make every class furnish one during the war, or to have one draughted from each of them; which would be the means of compelling the young and very poor men, to do all the duty and bear the burdens of the war, while the rich, and those who are excused from doing duty in the militia, would be excused.

He said he should have taken no part in this debate, but to exonerate himself from some charges of inconsistency, made by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. McKENZIE,) who said the minority had opposed and defeated all the measures of the Administration. That an embargo was laid in 1807, as a precautionary measure, and that it was raised by opposition. Not so, Mr. P. said, the caution was not necessary; as the commerce of the country was never more prosperous than at that time, as the result demonstrated; as, out of five hundred and ninety-four vessels that sailed by permission during that embargo, nearly all of them returned in safety to this country with valuable cargoes, and the risk was hardly a common sea risk; and as it respected the repeal of the embargo, it was repealed by those that laid it, not in consequence of opposition, but in consequence of its reaction upon the people of this country, the nakedness of the Treasury, and the indisposition to direct the internal taxes, knowing the effect they had once before upon the people of this country; and he said he believed the present embargo would be defeated by its friends, and for the same causes.

Mr. P. said, if a stranger should come into that Hall, unacquainted with the constitution of this country, he would suppose, from the confession of the majority, that the minority governed, as they are charged with raising the embargo, with preventing laws from being passed, with preventing Great Britain from doing us justice, and preventing our Administration from chastising of them;—that the minority made the war, have prevented enlistments and loans, have divided the country, have prevented the conquest of Canada, and are the means of continuing the war;—a very strong minority indeed to have more power at home, and more influence abroad, than the constituted authority of the nation!

Mr. P. said the Administration never had been obstructed or impeded by opposition. It had been by their own divisions and jealousies, as well in the Cabinet as in the Senate and House of Representatives, and by defalcations of many large States, who had promised much and done very little. That the minority never had made an unreasonable opposition, nor would it be in their power, if they were so disposed, as the majority can pass any law they please, and whenever they please. Mr. P. said, if the President of the United States, with his means of information, could not have selected from his political and personal friends four gentlemen having the same general and political interest with himself that could agree with him in his measures—and the war party in the Senate and House of Representatives would not agree with each other, advocating the same interest—how could they expect the minority to agree with them? They have no right to expect a thing so unreasonable. Mr. P. asked, what had become of the Cabinet he saw a few years since? Where were the late Secretaries of State, War, and the Navy? And from whence came Turreau's letter, but from their own divisions? And he said the present Cabinet seemed to him to be made of discordant materials, and if the public should hear something from some of them, at some future day, he should not be surprised. Mr. P. said it was convenient for the majority to lay all the misfortunes and distresses of the country, occasioned by their own divisions, jealousies, defalcations, and misconduct, to the minority; but it was unjust in the extreme—they did not deserve it—they had not deceived them—they had promised them nothing. But it is now said that the nation was in war, and that the minority ought not to find fault, but to join in prosecuting it. This, to be sure, is an excellent doctrine for those in power. How would this reasoning have sounded in the ears of the minority, in the year 1798, when they were opposing all the measures of Administration, on account of loans, taxes, armies, and war? The Opposition did not then believe that as soon as war should be made that their mouths were to be shut, and that they must then act against their wills and better judgment, and support the Administration; and believe that to be right, then, that they knew in their own consciences to be wrong before. This principle, once admitted, puts an end to all opposition; and when the party in power, by their mismanagement, shall have forfeited the confidence of the people, they will have nothing to do in future but to declare war against any nation with or without cause, and perpetuate themselves in power.

Mr. P. said it had been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. INGERSOLL,) that opposition in this country was different from that in England—that there it was against the King and Ministry, but here it was against the people. Mr. P. said he would ask if the opposition in this country, in the years 1798, 1799, and 1800, against the then Administration for loans, taxes, and war, was for or against the people? And if for the people, then, how much more must it be in their favor now, in opposing the same measures in a much better degree. That Administration had not the benefit of experience, and did not understand financiering as well as the present. They created an eight per cent. stock, and as he had understood, sold it above par. The present creates a six per cent. stock, and sell it under par, getting about eighty-eight dollars for a hundred—making the interest about the same, losing in principal what they save in interest. At that time an individual in good credit had frequently to give twelve per centum per annum for money. At the present, such a person can hire money for less than half that premium. At that time we had an army of about 5,000 men, and hired about $5,000,000. At this time we are to have an army of 70,000 men, and contemplate borrowing $80,000,000 for this year. If, therefore, the opposition to the Administration in 1798 was in favor of the people, most assuredly this must be.

As it respected opposition, Mr. P. said he hoped always to see one, let who would be in power. He considered them the sentinels and friends of the people, and he never wished to see a majority of more than ten in that House, and then six honest men might save the nation. He said, in proportion to the strength of the majority, he believed the liberties of the people in danger; and he thought they had more to fear from a few violent men, in a majority, who condemn and proscribe the moderate men of their own party, than from an Opposition. When the majority is large, if a few moderate, well-disposed men, who have independence to judge for themselves, and whose integrity has placed them above the reach of their party, feelings, and who, from principle, will not go all lengths with the most violent of the party, are proscribed by the party here, and denounced at home, and more violent men sent in their room; from such a course of conduct the people have much to fear. But if the majority is small, from the influence of a few good men, the nation has much to hope.

Mr. P. said, as it respected the war, it was not occasioned by opposition; it was brought about by newspapers, by public excitement, by high party men, in and out of that House; by many who expected appointments, and who were now enjoying them; by resolves of public meetings, and resolutions of democratic Legislatures, pledging their lives, fortunes, and sacred honor, to the Administration, to aid in prosecuting the war; those were the measures that had brought this country into its present situation. And if the Administration should now be compelled to make a dishonorable peace, they will not be driven to it by opposition, but by their pretended friends, who have done much to get them into their present difficulties, and will do very little to help them out of them.

Mr. WHEATON.—Mr. Speaker: Although a majority of this House thought fit to decline considering a resolution introduced a few days ago by an honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. GASTON,) affording a more appropriate ground on which the great subjects of war and peace might receive a free and candid discussion, yet I think the minority may acknowledge some obligation to the majority in permitting such an extensive range as has been gone into by gentlemen on both sides, in debating the question of the passage of this bill; and that obligation I shall feel with peculiar sensibility, if indulged but for a few moments in making some remarks upon it myself, knowing, as I do, that they have assumed the power, whenever they shall have the will, by the application of the previous question, to strike this whole assembly in an instant dumb.

Sir, I am opposed to the passage of this bill, because its professed object, and no doubt its real object, is to give support and continuance to the war in which the Government of this country is at present so unfortunately engaged. In the justice of this war, at its commencement, I never boasted any very strong faith; of its expediency I always doubted, and now further to progress in it, I think would be not only impolitic, but wicked.

I do not pretend that the people of this country had sustained no injuries from the contending nations of Europe. From Great Britain we had suffered some, and from France infinitely more. Great Britain had captured some of our property; France had added insult to her robberies; France therefore should have been included in our declaration of war, if it had been proper for us to go to war with either. In commencing war against Great Britain at the time that we did, we were, in my opinion, unjust to ourselves, and faithless to our engagements. While professing to be impartial, in this we did an act of great partiality; for, after passing a number of years in bitter but fruitless complaints against the Governments of both those nations, Congress did, on the 1st day of May, 1810, pass a law, a law which after times and circumstances have proved to have been most unwise and impolitic, whereby we did, impliedly at least, engage that if neither of them should rescind or repeal their obnoxious orders or decrees, we would do no more than complain, or, if we did, that our resentment should be turned equally against both; but that if one of them should rescind, we would allow the other three months to deliberate on the expediency of rescinding also, before we would put ourselves in an attitude of resistance against the one that should refuse or neglect so to do. This was done to try the sincerity of each of those Governments, who had each professed that their orders and decrees were merely retaliatory upon the other, and that they should cease on one side, whenever they should be revoked on the other. Of this law France took the advantage, and, operating on the credulity of our Administration, induced them to take promises for realities, and thus inveigled them into a war with Great Britain. Great Britain had not the three months, as allowed her by that law, in which to repeal her orders. For it will not now be pretended that the French decrees were revoked, in fact, until April, 1811, nor until, by passing the non-importation act, we had manifested a disposition of determined hostility towards Great Britain, in consequence of which the French revoking decree was professedly issued; nor was that revoking decree made known to Great Britain, nor even to our Minister in France, until within about a month of our declaration of war; and the British Orders in Council were repealed very soon after information of that act of the French Government was received. The conclusion, therefore, is, that we did not act with good faith in making the declaration of war at the time it was declared, and consequently it was unjust. That the declaration of war, at the time it was made, was highly inexpedient, a consideration of the state of things in our own country and in the world, at that period, and a number of years immediately preceding it, must force conviction upon every reasonable mind. Out of the wars in Europe grew all the mischiefs of which we complained. France issued her decrees to destroy or obstruct the commerce of Great Britain, and Great Britain issued her Orders in Council to weaken or retard the war operations of France; and thus, while both those nations were trying which could do the other the most harm, they both did harm to us; but this harm to us, as it grew out of, so it must have terminated with their wars. And, in the mean time, from those very wars, so unprofitable to them, we were reaping advantages vastly more than sufficient to balance all the evils and inconveniences we suffered from them. The commerce of this country, after deducting all the losses occasionally sustained by British or French captures, was producing an aggregate of profit far beyond what we had ever enjoyed before, and beyond what we could expect to enjoy when the state of things of which we so much complained should be changed. Was it then wise in us to bring curses upon ourselves when in the lap of blessing; to abandon at once such a state of "successful experiment," because we had not obtained an entire exemption from the evils inseparable from the present state of man, and plunge ourselves into a destructive war that must necessarily destroy much positive good that we actually enjoyed, and at the same time increase for the present, without affording any prospect of ever diminishing, those very evils? How much better would it have been for us, while all Europe were in arms, to have preserved a course of impartial neutrality, as recommended by the great Washington, and not have become a party to their wars? Thus we should have continued to have thrived upon their calamities; should soon have been able to discharge our national debt, and still have our treasury full, and our country in universal prosperity; and then we should be able suitably to resent a denial of our just claims by any nation upon the globe. But, instead of pursuing this wise and prudent course of policy, as if tired of prosperity, we shackled and restrained our very profitable commerce by acts of embargo and non-intercourse, until our public funds were exhausted, and many of our citizens reduced from affluence to poverty; and then rushed precipitately into a war against one of the most powerful nations in the world without previous preparation, and which now cannot be carried on without intolerable taxation upon the people. Indeed, its ill success hitherto but too well shows how unadvisedly it was begun; and now to continue it, would not only be bringing misery upon ourselves, but showing that it is a misery that we deserve. For the ostensible cause for which it was commenced has long since ceased; and shall we progress in a war merely to gratify our thirst for conquest, and with a miserable prospect of success too, and thus cause thousands more of our innocent but deluded people, to fall unpitied victims at ambition's shrine? Surely such folly can only be accounted for upon the principle, that Heaven infatuates whom it determines to destroy. Were I to afford any aid or comfort to the declared enemy of the country, I should be guilty of treason to an earthly Republic, fast approaching, as I fear, to its dissolution; and were I voluntarily to afford any aid or comfort to this war, thinking as I do upon the subject, I should be morally guilty of treason to the throne and monarchy of Heaven. The minority in this House, together with those who neglect to use their personal influence to give encouragement and popularity to the war, or that have refused to lend their money to carry it on, have been on this floor denounced as moral traitors. But, I apprehend there has been a mistake in the application of the crime of "moral treason." It may be committed by acting in conformity with, as well as against the laws of the Government. It is indeed a crime unknown to human laws, but well defined in that law written by the finger of Heaven on the heart of every man, and sanctioned by severer penalties than racks or gibbets can inflict. History, both sacred and profane, has furnished sad instances of moral treason, as well as some noble examples of resisting every temptation to that odious offence. Socrates, when reduced to the dreadful alternative of renouncing his doctrine of immortality, as required by a law of his country, or receive a draught of the hemlock, had been guilty of moral treason had he preferred the former to the latter. The Christian martyrs had been moral traitors, if they had sacrificed their consciences to the decrees of violent and wicked men.

Extension of Enlistments.

Judas, indeed, was a moral traitor, though a faithful friend to the Administration; conscience was the court in which he was tried; there his sentence was filed; thence issued the warrant for his execution, and he went out and hung himself. Felix (I mean the Roman Governor) was a moral traitor. All that had a hand in the crucifixion of the Saviour of mankind, were moral traitors. It was said they had a law, and that by that law he ought to die, though obliged to confess that they could find no fault in him. I hope, therefore, that the charity of the honorable gentleman who introduced the subject of moral treason, convinced, like his namesake of old, that there is no fault in us, will lead him to impute our opposition to his war measures to a conscientious belief that they are now mere projects of ambition—offensive to Heaven, and destructive to the best interests of the people of this country.

The main question was then put on the passage of the bill, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bowen, Bradley, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Clopton, Comstock, Conard, Condict, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Findlay, Fiak of Vermont, Fiak of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hubbard, Humphreys, Ingham, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kerahaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, Montgomery, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ridgely, Ringgold, Roane, Roberts, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Skinner, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Whitehill, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancy—90.

Blue Lights.

Mr. LAW observed that there was a subject which for some time past had caused much speculation, and excited some irritation. It has appeared in a variety of shapes, and given rise to many observations. It has been the theme of public prints. It has been solemnly introduced in debate on this floor—it has been ushered before the public, through the Head of a Department, and has acquired unusual currency, and some degree of credit, by the manner in which it has gained publicity. That which was at first mere rumor, has, by a species of official acts, become in some measure confirmed; and characters, perhaps not intended to be embraced, have been implicated, and exposed to crimination and reproach. From zeal to impute blame to one class of citizens, it may, on due examination, be found they have cast odium on men of another description, whom I presume they had no intention to injure. Eager to spread the story, they may find, on further inquiry, they have involved their friends as well as those they deem their enemies. Had the subject been confined to vague rumor, it certainly would not have deserved the trouble of an examination in this place. But when we consider it comes before the public in the form of a letter addressed to the Head of a Department, from a highly-distinguished and meritorious officer, and through that channel is issued to the world with a sort of official authenticity; when we consider it has been more than once repeated by honorable gentlemen within these walls; and, above all, when we consider on whom the stigma must attach, if the report be founded on fact, it rises above idle report, assumes a character of importance, and presents a subject for investigation not beneath the dignity of this House. I allude to the blue lights, so called, which are said to have been displayed at or near the harbor of New London, in the manner stated by gentlemen some days since in this place; for surely no men ought to rest under such foul reproach, without proof of the fact. It is a charge, if not of direct treason within the limits of the constitution, in adhering to the enemy, giving them aid and comfort, is at least a charge of giving that enemy light and information, whereby they may be better able to carry on the war, check the movements and defeat the operations of our own ships. The resolution I am about to submit is not induced from a belief in my mind that it is correct in fact; for I have no hesitation in declaring it as my belief, grounded on information derived from gentlemen in that vicinity, of the first respectability, that it is incorrect. Nor do I seek the inquiry because I think the State from whence I came can be chargeable with acts which the constitution forbids; or that I am willing to believe my native town contains among her citizens men so abandoned as to light torches, as signals to the enemy, which would in all probability lead to the destruction of their own dwellings. The conduct of the citizens of Connecticut is well known, and gratefully acknowledged by the General Government, in protecting their property, when they were unable to protect it themselves—their conduct in keeping at bay the proud and insulting ships of Great Britain, which, without their voluntary aid, might have captured or destroyed a part of that Navy which sustains our hopes and buoys up the national character, would seem to forbid and preclude all suspicion against them as the perpetrators of such deeds. Sir, the State of Connecticut has felt a pride in protecting that charge, unfortunately committed to their care. But if men, of whatever station or politics, are to be found, who attach to them the slightest suspicion of treachery, in relation to the American ships now in that harbor, they will, on a plain statement of facts, at once dismiss their jealousies, and acquit that State and its citizens from the charge raised against them, or the suspicion, if it does not vanish, must be extended to others for whom they are not responsible.

It will be recollected, that Commodore Decatur arrived with his squadron in the harbor of New London the beginning of June last, being driven into that port by a superior British force which has continued to invest that port, and will continue to blockade it, doubtless with an intention of depriving the country of the skill and exertion of that valuable and distinguished officer, during the present war. At this time, one year after war was declared, the United States had not troops at that place adequate to the protection or defence of the ships; at this critical moment the State of Connecticut, although not approving of the war, called forth her patriotic sons, and the inhabitants of New London were not backward on the occasion to protect the coast of the country, defend their own soil, exposed to danger by the acts of the General Government, and resist the enemy. At the beat of the drum, they repaired to the scene of danger; they occupied the adjacent heights; they guarded the points of the harbor and defended the coast. For months, during the time these watchmen, faithful to themselves and their country, were on duty in your service, no charge of disloyalty was heard against them—no surmises of treason were circulated against the citizens. About the first of November, the United States having collected, as was supposed, a competent number of troops, and having repaired the fort on the east side of the harbor, the detachments from Connecticut were dismissed, with the thanks of that State and the approbation of the General Government. From this period the United States troops, occupying the forts on each side of the harbor, commanded the adjacent heights, kept or ought to have kept guards on the points near the enemy's ships, to watch his movements and detect any improper intercourse from the shores. Yet on these very heights and points, these wicked torches, these mysterious lights, are said to have been raised, if they were exhibited as represented. Now, sir, I know the officers commanding on this station; they are faithful and honorable men—and I am bound to presume they have performed their duty; but the report casts censure on them, or at least implies a neglect of duty and want of vigilance in them, which I am unwilling to attach to them, without further proof. The subject merits inquiry; if the report is correct let the censure fall on those who have incurred it—if incorrect, let the reproach be wiped away. With a view therefore, to ascertain the facts correctly, I move the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any treasonable correspondence has been held, or information given, by means of blue-lights, or signals by fire, given from the shores at or near the harbor of New London, in the State of Connecticut, to the blockading squadron off that harbor, whereby the enemy might learn the state, condition, or movements of the American ships under the command of Commodore Decatur, now in that port; and that the committee be authorized to take evidence by deposition, or otherwise, as they shall deem necessary, and report thereon to this House.

The House agreed to consider the resolution.

Mr. MOSELY.—Mr. Speaker, I hope the resolution offered by my honorable colleague will be agreed to, and that a committee may be appointed to make the inquiry proposed. It could, perhaps, hardly be expected that this subject of blue lights should claim the attention of this House, were it not for the consequence given to it by the various circumstances which have just been stated by the mover of the resolution, and which I need not repeat.

Sir, as a citizen of Connecticut, I feel no particular solicitude, lest the character of that State should suffer by any representations which have been made, or which may be made on this subject.

From the best information I have been able to obtain, I am very much inclined, with my colleague, to discredit the reports which have been put into circulation respecting these blue lights. I am induced to believe, that upon due examination it will be found, that there has been some mistake in this business. But, admitting that these blue lights have in fact been seen in the manner represented—it is clear from the statement made by my colleague, who resides at New London, and must be perfectly acquainted with the situation of the country, as well as from the representation made by a great number of the most respectable citizens of that place, that they could not be made by any private person without detection. Troops of the United States were standing each side of the harbor, and, it is to be presumed, they would guard each of the points where these blue lights are said to have been exhibited.

There are, or ought to be, guards or patrols constantly maintained, and especially in the night season. No person could, therefore, without discovery, exhibit these lights at the places where they are said to have been seen. It follows, therefore, if they were indeed seen, as has been represented, either that these troops must have been criminally inattentive to their duty, or themselves privy to the deed. Neither of these conclusions ought to be drawn upon slight ground. And this view of the case makes it more important that the proper inquiry should be had. I hope, therefore, that the subject may be duly investigated by a committee of this House, and that the public may be possessed of the true state of facts respecting these blue lights, which have excited so much attention and assumed so much importance.

Mr. GRUNDY, of Tennessee, said the sensibility displayed by the gentlemen from Connecticut on this subject was most honorable to themselves; and he certainly concurred with them in the hope that upon examination it would appear that no portion of the people of that State were capable of an act so base and dishonorable. So far, however, as his mind had been impressed, he differed from the gentleman who appeared to think there was no foundation for the report. It ought to be recollected that the commander of the American squadron, whose authority could not be questioned, had stated what was his impression, derived from the information of the officers and men under his command. The same impression was confirmed on the mind of Mr. G. by the statements of newspapers on the spot conducted by those who differed from him in politics, narrating the circumstance which had been alluded to. He should vote for the inquiry, but he did not wish to see a departure from the regular course. The inquiry belonged properly to the Naval Committee, he conceived—because it was the Navy which was intended to have been particularly injured by the exhibition of those lights. He moved to amend the resolution so as to refer the subject to that committee.

Mr. FISK, of New York, said he was sorry to hear a wish expressed by the gentleman from Tennessee for the proposed inquiry. When he looked at the principle of this motion, he trembled at the consequences of its adoption. What was the principle? It was nothing more than a proposition to exercise, through a committee of this House, the inquisitorial power to inquire whether treason has been committed in a particular instance. He hoped no such precedent would receive the sanction of the House.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, remarked that the adoption of such a resolution as this would place the House of Representatives in an awkward situation. It was unquestionably the right of the House to inquire into all things connected with subjects of legislation; but, to justify this inquiry, it ought to be for some specific object. He, therefore, proposed to amend the motion, so as to constitute a committee to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the punishment of persons who hold out blue lights to the enemy, or commit other acts of a like nature, not amounting to the crime of treason.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, said this was not an object worthy the attention of the House, because it was too diminutive. The object avowed by the mover, that is, to defend the character of the State of Connecticut from injury on this head, was not a sufficient one for this House to proceed upon. No one had been cruel enough to charge the act in question on the citizens of New London, or on the State of Connecticut. He hoped it would lie on the table.

And the question was taken to lay the resolution on the table, and decided thus: For laying it on the table, 89; against it, 42.

So Mr. LAW's motion was laid on the table.

TUESDAY, January 25.

Prohibition of Ransom.

The House, on motion of Mr. CALHOUN, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to prohibit the ransoming of ships or vessels of the United States, and the goods or merchandise on board the same, captured by the enemies thereof.

The blank, for the time after which it shall have effect, was filled with the first day of April.

Considerable desultory discussion took place on the principle of the bill, which was opposed by Messrs. POST and GROSVENOR of New York, and WARD, PICKERING, and RICHARDSON of Massachusetts; and supported by Messrs. CALHOUN of South Carolina, WRIGHT of Maryland, and FISK of Vermont.

In opposition to the bill, it was said that it was contrary to the true policy of this nation, which, being weak in its maritime power, ought to permit the vessels of its citizens to be ransomed, because the chance of recapture on its way to the port of an enemy is small; that no benefit could, in fact, result to the United States from its passage, as the non-importation act was capable of invasion in a thousand ways—not admitting, however, the fact stated of frequent evasions of that law by pretended ransoms; that the operation of this law would be cruelly severe on the coasters and poorer classes of our citizens, who were allowed by the enemy to release their craft for a very small proportion of its value, &c.

The advocates of the bill, in reply, adduced the statement of the Executive of collusive practices under this pretext of ransoming vessels, for the purpose of evading the non-importation laws, and affording intelligence to the enemy. They stated, also, that if no such statement had been laid before the House, the fact was sufficiently notorious without it. The law might, it was true, give rise in its operation to occasional cases of hardship; but no principle of Government was better established or more generally acknowledged, than that the interest of individuals must give way to that of the community, which it was contended demanded the passage of the law, &c.

The committee rose, and reported the bill to the House. On the question of its passage to a third reading,

Mr. GASTON rose to move that the bill lie on the table until to-morrow. In making this motion, he had no design to delay the decision upon its passage, but to procure a little time for reflection. It had been complained by gentlemen favorable to this bill, that all the measures suggested by the majority met with a systematic resistance, and it was strongly insinuated that to this zeal of oppugnation was attributable the opposition to this bill. For himself, he begged leave to say that he felt an anxiety to discover some measure of the majority, which a regard for the welfare of his country, and a respect for the dictates of his conscience, would permit him to support. He had viewed this bill as possibly affording such an occasion, especially as, in the almost annihilated state of our commerce, but little practical effect could follow from it. But he feared that his hopes had been visionary, and wished for leisure to discover, or enable others to discover, how it could possibly operate any good end.

On all hands, it was admitted that the prohibition of ransoming would produce individual inconvenience, but the Committee of Foreign Relations believed this inconvenience atoned for, by the great public benefit it would effect. This benefit was said to be the suppression of "collusive captures by the enemy, covered under the practice of ransoming." Now, he could understand how such collusion might exist while we had a coasting and an export trade; but now that the embargo hermetically closed our ports against the departure of our vessels, he was utterly at a loss to imagine how it was practicable. The object of ransoming is, to be permitted to retain the captured property. The only instance in which ransoming can now take place, is with respect to American vessels going from one foreign port to another, or returning from abroad home. Any inducement to "collusive captures," under pretence of ransom, in instances of the first description, had not been suggested, nor was readily conceivable. As to those of the other class, he had perplexed his mind hitherto in vain, to find out what temptation there could be to a collusive capture and ransom. It would seem that, if the ship was not concerned in illegal importation, and had no prohibited goods on board, she needed no stratagem of the kind to legalize her entry into the ports of her own country; if she had a prohibited cargo, it seemed equally certain that the process of capture and ransom neither changed its character, nor altered our laws forbidding its introduction. Perhaps reflection might show that there were possibilities of such a practice, notwithstanding his present view seemed very clear to the contrary. He wished, if it were so, to know them, and, on knowing them, would take pleasure in supporting any measure calculated to put down an injurious practice. He hoped, therefore, that the bill would lie on the table.

Mr. GROSVENOR said he was not certain that he understood the principles upon which the bill purported to be founded, sufficiently to justify him in offering any remarks upon it to the committee; yet so palpably incorrect was the whole policy of the measure, as it was presented to his mind, that he could not withhold his view of it. But first, Mr. G. said, he would offer his solemn protest against this method of legislating. In reply to an inquiry made by his honorable colleague, (Mr. POST,) the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, who reported the bill, (Mr. CALHOUN,) had stated that abuses and evils did exist under this practice of ransoming, and that particular cases of abuse had been stated to the committee of which that gentleman is chairman by the proper department. It was, Mr. G. said, against this manner of giving information to the House—information which it was essential that the House should possess for the regulation of its conduct—that as a member of the House, a co-ordinate and independent branch of the Legislature, he solemnly protested. He refused not to any committee of the House that confidence to which, as honorable men, and as responsible members of the House, they were entitled. But who is to act upon and pass this bill? Not a committee, but the whole House. The House, then, said Mr. G., ought to receive this information "from the proper Department." It could not rely upon the judgment of any man, or set of men. It would be more decorous, more constitutional, and infinitely more satisfactory for the body which was to act, and which were responsible for the act, to call for the facts; to have them exhibited, and then to judge whether they justified the harsh and unjustifiable measure now before it. This kind of legislation was a perversion, in his opinion, of the plainest constitutional principles. Between Congress and the Executive there ought to be no middle body. There could be none consistent with his views of propriety and the constitution of the country. Mr. G. ardently hoped this new system of blind confidence would be abandoned, and the old independent ground reoccupied by the House.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Niagara Frontier.

Mr. HOPKINS, of New York, rose to make a motion which he deemed worthy the immediate attention of the House. His distance from the reporter prevented his first remarks from being heard. He took a rapid view of the progress of the campaign in the neighborhood of Fort George, and of the circumstances which led to the evacuation and destruction of that post, by our military force. Connected with that transaction also was another, into the merits of which it was not his purpose to enter at this moment, as it did not come within the scope of his motion. The village of Newark was burnt—a circumstance in every respect deeply to be regretted, both as respected the character of the nation, and the faith violated by that act, which had been so often pledged to protect the inhabitants in the enjoyment of their property and personal rights. The place had been burnt, not in the act of attack, not as villages suffer that are destroyed in the contending operations of opposing armies. It was burnt in cold blood, when there was no resisting force to defend it. And this act was the less defensible, because its position was such, that it might have been destroyed at any moment if its destruction had been really necessary. The consequence of which act, and the abandonment of the country by the United States, and the public authority of the State of New York, was, that the enemy had retaliated on our frontier the distresses and injuries they had suffered by our invasion of their country. The fort of Niagara had been destroyed; and, notwithstanding the published accounts asserted to the contrary, with it a vast amount of public stores had been destroyed. It was impossible not to have foreseen, he said, when all our forces were withdrawn, when we gave up the conquest we had made to prosecute another and very distant one, that the country would be left exposed to the incursions of an enemy exasperated by our inroads into his territory, and so strong, too, that during great part of the past season he held our forces confined within a small fortification. The consequences of those incursions of the enemy were well known. Lewistown, Schlosser, and Buffalo, were burnt. It might be necessary, in the view of Government, to sacrifice a part of the territory for the preservation of the whole. Whatever was the object, the tract of country to which he had referred fell a sacrifice in consequence of the operations of the Government. War was first carried there by our Government, and the country afterwards left defenceless, abandoned to the enemy. The distresses incurred in consequence of this policy were great. Several villages had been burnt. Terrified by the fears and horrors of savage warfare, the people had abandoned their habitations, and for thirty or forty miles, and more, from the scene of action, the roads swarmed with the flying sufferers. To relieve their distresses he would propose a resolution to the House. He did not say whether it would be proper in all cases for the Government to compensate individuals for losses occasioned by war; but this was a case in which it would be proper for our Government to afford some relief. Our Government had heretofore extended the hand of relief to foreign sufferers—he alluded to the case in which a quantity of flour had been sent under the authority of Government to the sufferers at Caraccas; and he presumed our own citizens, equally suffering, were at least entitled to attention. Mr. H. was proceeding to advert to the liberality which it had always been the policy of Great Britain to display to her citizens in similar cases—but the SPEAKER called his attention to the subject of his motion; and Mr. H. submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by-law for the indemnity or relief of those who have suffered losses by the irruptions of the enemy on the Niagara frontier; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, observed that this motion embraced a novel principle, on which the House ought to have time to reflect, and therefore moved that it lie on the table.

Mr. TROUP rose to state a fact, not at all by way of replication to any thing the gentleman had said in support of his motion; but merely to correct an impression which might otherwise gain currency in relation to the burning of Newark. The commanding officer in that quarter had been ordered, by the Secretary of War, to destroy Newark in one event only; when it should be absolutely necessary to the safety of Fort George. It could only have become so in case of an attack on Fort George, the enemy availing himself of Newark as a place of shelter. Now, no attack had been made on Fort George; and the burning of Newark was of course not consequent on any order of the Government, but the disobedience or misconduct of the commanding officer. Such would be the fact, he was convinced, which an official statement of this matter would disclose.

The motion was ordered to lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 26.

CHARLES GOLDSBOROUGH, from Maryland, appeared, and took his seat.

THURSDAY, February 8.

Army Contractors, &c.

Mr. FISK, of New York, adverting to a report from the Secretary of War, on the table, respecting the unsettled accounts in the War Department, said that the report called the attention of the House to the expediency of making some provisions in order to secure the punctual performance of the public business and the more perfect accountability of public agents. Casting his eyes over these statements, he perceived one case not noticed, which had fallen under his own observation. He alluded to the manner in which the public moneys were employed in purchasing supplies. He stated a particular case, that had occurred at Black Rock; although the contractor was prepared to furnish the necessary supplies, the commanding General had ordered his issuing commissaries to purchase supplies to the amount of thirty thousand dollars, which were transported to Black Rock, where they remained from December, 1812, until they were destroyed in the late conflagration. To institute a general inquiry into this subject, Mr. F. offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire in what manner the contracts for supplying the Army of the United States have been made and executed, and to what extent the General Officers have interfered in such contracts prejudicially to the public interest and the rights of individuals.

Mr. FITKIN, of Connecticut, having inquired the particular object of the mover, and whether his motion included cases in which higher prices had been paid by the purchasing commissaries than was usual or proper—

Mr. FISK stated his object to be, to ascertain whether further provision was not necessary to secure the accountability of public agents intrusted with the expenditure of public money, particularly in relation to the contracts for supplying the Army; and to restrain commanding officers from appointing issuing commissaries to furnish duplicates of supplies already furnished by other persons according to previous contract. As the law now stood, commanding officers were clothed with a general authority, without restriction, or personal or pecuniary responsibility, to appoint additional commissaries. In his opinion, the motion did embrace the case stated by the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GRUNDY, of Tennessee, said he had no objection to this motion, but he suggested whether the main object of providing a remedy for the evil could be attained unless the committee were authorized to report by bill.

Mr. BRADLEY, of Vermont, expressed his satisfaction at this motion, for he was convinced there was something wrong in the existing provisions on this subject. A case had occurred in Vermont, and created some dissatisfaction there, in which a contractor who had engaged to supply the United States troops, was ready, as he represented, to furnish the necessary supplies; the General commanding conceived he had a power, whether there had or had not been a failure of the contracts, to appoint issuing commissaries, and had done so. Mr. B. said he had also heard of other cases on the Niagara frontier. The public interest, he thought, must suffer from collisions between the contractors and issuing commissaries making purchases under the authority of the General at the same time.

Mr. HALL, of Georgia, hoped the resolution would pass, but on different grounds from those assigned. He thought that contractors had more frequently failed in their duty than Generals had done injury by taking the supplies out of their hands. He spoke from evidence, that such had been the conduct of contractors, on important stations, that the Army was not supplied. On this subject, he had received a letter from one of the aids of Gen. Floyd, which he read, stating, in substance, that no more volunteers could be obtained unless a stronger assurance was given of the necessary supplies being furnished; that no army ought to be placed in a situation of dependence on contractors for supplies; that three thousand brave and patriotic men had languished for five months, not from any fault of the General, but from the conduct of a "speculating, rascally contractor." When these troops had achieved a victory against the savage foe, which would have done honor to any troops, it was at the risk of starvation, and they remained on the ground without being able to march from it for the want of supplies. Mr. H. feared the resolve did not go far enough, however, unless it authorized the committee to propose to the House a remedy for the evil.

Mr. SHEFFRY, of Virginia, said he did not think the motion went far enough. He had no doubt it would appear, on examination, that in one case at least, where a General Officer had directed supplies to be purchased, and the account therefor was settled at the War Department, that twelve or fourteen dollars per barrel had been allowed for flour; and the contractor had produced evidence that, instead of twelve or fourteen dollars, this commissary had not paid more than seven or eight dollars per barrel. The inquiry, therefore, it appeared to him, ought to be extended to the conduct of these purchasing commissaries.

Mr. FISK thought the terms sufficiently comprehensive to combine all that gentlemen wished.

The resolution, however, was so amended as to authorize the committee to report by bill or otherwise; and thus amended, was agreed to without opposition.

Mr. FISK of New York, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. SHEFFRY, Mr. MILLER, and Mr. HALL, were appointed the committee.

FRIDAY, February 4.

Honors to Midshipman John Clark.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, &c., That the President be requested to present a sword to the nearest male relative of Midshipman John Clark, who was slain gallantly combating the enemy in the glorious battle on Lake Erie, under the command of Captain Perry, and to communicate to him the deep regret which Congress feels for the loss of that brave officer.

The resolve was twice read, and was subsequently ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of William Stothart and Josiah Starkey, was twice read, and committed.

National Bank.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the petition from New York for the establishment of a National Bank, and that the same be recommitted to the same committee, with a view of making a further motion on that subject.—Agreed to.

Mr. C. then said that it would be found that the Committee of Ways and Means had decided against that report, on the ground of unconstitutionality of establishing such a bank as that asked for in the petition. Mr. C. wished to instruct the committee to inquire into the expediency of establishing a National Bank within the District of Columbia, the power to do which it could not be doubted came within the constitutional powers of Congress. For all practicable purposes he believed such a bank would be as useful as that which was proposed. To come at his object, Mr. C. proposed the following motion:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a National Bank, to be located in the District of Columbia.

The resolution was agreed to without opposition.

Naval and Military Trophies.

MR. SEYBERT, from the committee appointed, on the 20th of December last, "to inquire into the present condition and distribution of the flags, standards, and colors, which have been taken by the forces of the United States from their enemies," made a report; which is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the resolution directing them "to inquire into the present condition and disposition of the flags, standards, and colors, which have been taken by the forces of the United States from their enemies; and whether it would be expedient to make any provision in relation to them, with leave to report by bill or otherwise," report:

That the collection, preservation and exhibition of such flags, standards, and colors, as have been taken by the land and naval forces of the United States from their enemies, is sanctioned by the practice of European nations, and more especially by the proceedings of the Congress of our Revolution. It is believed there cannot be a difference of opinion on this subject; it is natural to rejoice at the victories and the glory of our country. In Europe, the trophies which have been gained in war, are preserved with uncommon care. As monuments of national power they have ever been cherished by all civilized nations. In England they are highly prized. Not content that they should constitute the ornaments of their military institutions, such standards are deemed proper subjects for the decorations of the temples which they have consecrated to the purposes of religious worship; the sacred chapels, in common with the royal palaces, are the places in which are displayed to every subject and traveller the banners which the British forces have won from their enemies. It must be recollected, that the standard of our fourth regiment of infantry, which the enemy received at the lamentable surrender of Detroit, was in haste conveyed to Europe. Immediately after its arrival in London, the public prints informed us, that it was triumphantly displayed in the Council Chamber at Whitehall. Such is the British practice.

In France, the galleries of Notre Dame are blazoned with these splendid trophies. The chapel of the Hôtel of the Invalides, is richly embellished, and exhibits, to numerous visitors, the many standards which that gigantic power has, at different times, taken from its enemies. It affords no common satisfaction to the disabled tar, or the superannuated soldier, when he informs the inquisitive stranger that he gloriously fought in the battle which may have gained some of them. For the time he forgets his former sufferings, and his present disabled condition; his consolation rests upon the power and glory of his country, so fully demonstrated by the sight of the numerous ensigns which were taken from other nations. Other instances, in favor of the practice, could have been furnished; but your committee are persuaded, that the order of the illustrious Congress of our Revolution alone, will justify the propositions which they intend to submit for legislative consideration. As early as the 28d of June, 1778, it was "Resolved, That the Board of War be directed to collect the standards and colors taken from the enemy, by the Army of the United States, since the commencement of war." Had this order been strictly observed, and somewhat extended, the present proceedings would be unnecessary. Far from any regulations having been adopted, in pursuance of the recited resolution, your committee lament the peculiar negligence which ensued. The Secretary of War now tells us, that of the standards and colors which were taken by the Army of the United States, during the war of the Revolution, only six remain in his office. He cannot give any information concerning others; even their place of deposit is unknown to the Department! The Navy Department possesses no knowledge of any flags which are taken "anterior to the declaration of the present war." Such as have been captured, with the public armed ships of the enemy, subsequent to the 18th of June, 1812, "have been carefully preserved." Thirteen of them have been already received, as will more fully appear by the annexed statement: of these, three belonged to the heavy frigates of the enemy, viz: the Guerriere, Macedonian, and Java. The Navy Department is also in possession of a Royal Standard of Great Britain, which was taken at York, and a Union Jack and flag, which were captured at Fort George. The flags of five small vessels which were captured, have not been received. Your committee regret that the Journals of Congress do not exhibit statements of all standards and colors which were taken during our Revolution by the Army and Navy of the United States. The early attention of the Legislature to this subject inclines them to believe they were very numerous. The capture of Earl Cornwallis alone furnished twenty-four of them. In all probability, as many were taken with General Burgoyne.

By some the exhibitions which are contemplated may be considered as too trivial for legislative provision. Your committee would coincide with them in this opinion, did the practice only afford a momentary gratification to the curious. Experience must have taught European Governments that national benefits were derived from the course which they have adopted. It is presumed that essential consequences proceed from the practice, more especially when a nation shall be engaged in war. Such trophies excite the spirit of a nation; the result is national character. The arrival of an enemy's flag is sufficient to rouse the population of London or Paris. On such occasions the finest national feelings are developed; and to the honor of our fellow-citizens be it said, they have not been found to want this species of national sensibility when the flags of the Guerriere, Macedonian, and Java, &c., were exhibited to them. It was indifferent whether they considered themselves of the war or of the peace party, each was ambitious to rank the victor with himself. The national taste and propensity is strongly marked by the eagerness with which all view representations of our late unparalleled naval victories. If, then, the art and genius of the painter can thus excite our natures, may we not look for much more when we have the physical facts placed before us instead of fancy? These flags, the trophies won by our gallant tars, demonstrate to us and the world, that the invincibility of the British naval power has been very much exaggerated. In battle will the recollection of them sustain our sailors, and impart additional skill and valor in support of the cause of our country. The value of standards does not depend upon the gaudy colors which they exhibit, no more than upon the nature of the stuff of which they may be fabricated. They have been, at all times, regarded as the insignia of fame and power. Their surrender is the act of submission. The last wish of the proud bearer, is the preservation of his eagle; too often is the loss of it sealed with the loss of life. In Europe, where military operations are on a large scale, though the result of a battle should prove destructive to thousands of those who were engaged, the capture of a single standard constitutes a prominent feature in the details of the action, and adds much to the brilliancy of the achievement. Colors taken from the enemy, were considered a present worthy the nation, to General Washington, for his signal services in the capture of Earl Cornwallis. The records of the proceedings of Congress, during the whole of our Revolution, mention but two instances where this highly honorable and distinguished mark of approbation was voted. In fine, we have declared the flag shall guaranty the safety of our citizens. Can a higher value be set upon it? Can we attach more honor to it?

It may be asked, what will be the effects of a public display of the flags which have been taken from our enemies? This view is considered to be important. No one can doubt that the Government and the people of England would rather we should have taken millions of their merchandise, than that we should have it in our power to exhibit the flag of a single sloop of war, which was gained by equal force. If the enemy will expose to the view of the British nation and every traveller who may visit them, the one or two which they have captured from us, shall we conceal the many we have taken from them, and thus lead others to doubt our possessing any? Shall we permit the numerous trophies of our Revolution to moulder into dust by a voluntary concealment, without any effort for their preservation? If this shall have happened to the proud monuments of our independence, shall the fate of those which are now perfect, and which have been so lately won on our own coast, on that of South America, off the Azores, on the Lakes, in short, in all latitudes where our tars have come in contact with the enemy, be the same? Is not the preservation of these flags a duty which we owe to the people of the United States? Are the achievements of that gallant little navy, which a few months ago was the object of derision with the statesmen and the people of England, but now the cause of their fears, to be buried in oblivion? Shall we put at rest the inquiry which the glorious deeds of our sailors have excited in the Parliament of Great Britain? Shall we, at our expense, approve the labored calculation of the enemy; with her confound reason and common sense, and attribute simple truths to fallacious causes? or shall we give into a practice so generally cherished by other nations? Our successes on the ocean constitute the pride of our country; they have secured to us the respect of foreign nations. In Europe we again hold that rank which our ancestors had obtained by their many hard-fought conflicts, which we had nearly forfeited. Have we not accomplished more than did Spain with her "invincible Armadas," than did Holland with her De Witte, Van Tromps, and De Ruyters; than France could achieve when she was in the zenith of her naval power; than did Great Britain with her Nelsons, Rodneys, Howes, and St. Vincents? The naval annals of England furnish no instance in which every vessel, belonging to a hostile fleet was captured.

Some may doubt our possessing a number of standards sufficient to warrant their public exhibition. Had we but few of them we should not deny our sanction to the principle. Your committee regret that special order had not been taken by Congress immediately after the receipt of the first present of this kind; we allude to the colors which were taken by General Montgomery from the 7th British regiment, at Chamblais, on the 18th of October, 1775. The French pride themselves on their ability to exhibit the two which they have taken from our present enemy; for so lately as the year 1800, they had only two of the naval flags of Great Britain. Though the War and Navy Departments can immediately furnish but twenty or twenty-five of these flags, it is probable the place of deposit will be ascertained, so as to put within our power many of those which were gained during our Revolution. Where are those which were won during our dispute with France in 1798? The same may be asked of those which the defeats of Derne and Tripoli should furnish. The only object which remains for consideration is the place most proper for the exhibition.

This should be public and easy of access, at the same time that it should be perfectly secure from villainous attempts. These flags should be placed so as to be seen by every citizen who might wish to observe them. It will be of advantage that they should be noticed by every foreigner who may visit the United States. Can any objection be made to the spacious national apartments which are devoted to legislative purposes? What ornaments can be more suitable? Go abroad, and you may see the walls of the British House of Lords decorated with representations of some of the celebrated battles which were fought by the troops of Great Britain. At home we find the principle already established by one branch of the Legislature of the United States: in the Senate Chamber we observe engravings of some of the battles of our Revolution; and had time allowed the execution of the original design of the architect, the precedent would have had existence in the Chamber of the Representatives of the United States. It was contemplated that the frieze, over the capitals of the Corinthian columns which sustain the dome, should present, in relievo, a regular series of the battles which secured our independence. Such decorations might gratify the artist, and afford an opportunity to display his talents; but in a national view, little or no effect would be produced. It must be conceded that much more will be communicated to the spectator by the display of the captured standards. No one can pretend that any difference exists between the representations which we have noticed and the standards which have been taken from the enemy, as will warrant the public exhibition of the one and preclude that of the other: these subjects are most immediately connected, and their tendency must be the same. The public exhibition of these trophies is a tribute due to the very superior skill and valor which achieved them; the sight of them will bring to recollection every circumstance of cause and effect; they will constitute valuable records of illustrious portions of our history; they will form a collection of the proudest monuments to commemorate the brilliant deeds of a rising generation.

WEDNESDAY, February 9.

Sierra Leone and Paul Cuffe.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made a report on the bill from the Senate "to authorize the President of the United States to permit the departure of Paul Cuffee from the United States, with a vessel and cargo, for Sierra Leone, in Africa, and to return with a cargo:" which was read: When, a motion was made by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH that the report and bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole, and that the report be printed.

A division of the question on the said motion was called for, and, being taken on the commitment, it passed in the affirmative.

A motion was then made by Mr. POSE to add to the motion to print the report, the words, "and that the memorial of Paul Cuffee be also printed." And the question thereon being taken, it was determined in the negative. The report was then ordered to be printed, and is as follows:

"That, in the opinion of the committee, it would be impolitic, at a time when the Government of the United States has been compelled, from imperious necessity, to prohibit the coasting trade, to prevent the enemy from obtaining supplies of provisions, and thereby from keeping a considerable naval force on the coast of the United States, to relax the prohibitions of the embargo law, on the application of an individual, for a purpose which, how benevolently soever conceived, cannot be considered in any other light than as speculative—the efforts heretofore made and directed by the zeal and intelligence of the Sierra Leone Company having failed to accomplish the object designed by its institution. When exemptions from the operation of a law are made, the justice of which is not seen by every citizen, the wisdom of which is questionable, and the necessity of which is not palpably evident, discontent, if it did not exist, would be produced; and if it did exist, it would, by such policy, acquire expansion and vigor.

"In what manner soever the act from the Senate be contemplated, the committee see difficulties which cannot be overcome by any suggestions of their ingenuity. They, therefore, from this view of the subject, feel themselves constrained to recommend the rejection of the act to authorize the President of the United States to permit the departure of Paul Cuffee from the United States, with a vessel and cargo, for Sierra Leone, in Africa, and to return with a cargo."

The Loan for 1814.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on a bill to authorize a loan of ——— dollars. The bill having been read through—

Mr. E. rose to move to fill the blank in the bill, and to state the reasons for its amount, and why the loan bill had been introduced at this stage of the session, before the appropriation bills were reported, and of course before it could be precisely ascertained what the amount of those appropriations would be.

Mr. BIGELOW.—Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against filling the blank in this bill with twenty-five millions, or with any other sum. I shall not do it, because I believe that it will not require so large a loan to defray the expenses which the measures of the present session will create, or because I do not believe that the income of the land and other property in the United States would amount to that sum.

I shall vote against it, on the principle that it is to obtain money to prosecute a war of invasion and conquest—a war which has been as unwisely managed, as it was improvidently declared. I shall vote against it, on the principle that the measures which preceded and produced it were radically wrong.*

To explain to the committee my ideas on this subject, it will be necessary to glance at events in Europe for some years past; events, the magnitude and variety of which have been of a nature not to afford the mind time to examine and contemplate the causes and effects of one, before it has been astonished with another. An attempt to look back, and trace the various effects of each in producing the measures pursued by the Administration of this country, as it respects the two great belligerents, would be a task to which I certainly have not the vanity to aspire. But, as such a course is highly necessary to enable us to form a correct opinion of the policy pursued by the Administration, and the propriety of continuing that policy, I will state some of the most prominent events in Europe, and attempt to show that the measures caused by the operation of that influence have been erroneous, and the sooner the error is acknowledged, and the procedure corrected, the better. I cannot expect, sir, with my feeble powers, to produce conviction, but I do hope to be able to provoke inquiry and investigation.

The first great error (I speak of errors in regard to our foreign relations) which I shall notice, was the refusal of the late President to lay before the Senate the treaty of Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, concluded with Great Britain in December, 1806, and received by him in March, 1807, before the adjournment of that body. Sir, that he might have wished a better treaty, I have no doubt; and I have as little doubt, had the state of Europe been different, it would have been laid before that body, and been ratified.

Upon this subject, I wish gentlemen to pay particular attention to dates.

On the 21st November, 1806, the French Emperor, then at his imperial camp at Berlin, the capital of Prussia, which he had victoriously entered, after the battle of Jena, issued his famous Berlin decree. This decree declared the British islands in a state of blockade, prohibited all commerce and correspondence with them, declared all merchandise belonging to England, or coming from its manufactories and colonies, lawful prize, &c. It was at this time Napoleon attempted to put in execution the gigantic project of blockading the islands of Great Britain, not by a naval force, but by compelling or flattering all other nations to unite with France in the total prohibition of all intercourse with Great Britain. This decree, and this intention of the French Emperor, were known to the President before the treaty of Monroe and Pinkney arrived. To have ratified that treaty, would have permitted commercial intercourse between us and Great Britain, been in direct violation of the Berlin decree, and have counteracted the designs of the French Emperor, thus explicitly expressed. Add to this, that Great Britain was then expected to be crushed, by the pressure of the war and taxes upon her subjects, aided by the mighty genius and power of Bonaparte, and little doubt can remain of the real cause of the refusal of Mr. Jefferson to lay the treaty before the Senate.

Let us now, Mr. Chairman, look at the state of Europe when Mr. Jefferson recommended the embargo, on account of the increasing danger with which our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise were threatened on the high seas, &c.

On the 14th June, 1807, was fought the famous battle of Friedland, in which the French were victorious over the Russians. In consequence of this battle, on the 14th of July following was concluded the Treaty of Tilsit, between France and Russia, by which the latter engaged to prohibit all commercial intercourse with Great Britain, &c. Austria was still bound to France by the humiliating Treaty of Presburg. Prussia, by proclamation, had prohibited all intercourse with Great Britain. Portugal, in August, 1807, soon after the Treaty of Tilsit, was threatened by France with invasion, if she did not in three weeks prohibit all commercial intercourse with Great Britain, prevent the departure of Englishmen from the kingdom, and confiscate all British property therein.

True, we have no official document to prove that France, at this time, made a similar demand upon the Government of the United States. But, when we look at the conduct of France towards other nations, that she compelled them, by force of arms, or by intrigues, to submit, have we any reason to doubt on this subject?

Such was the state of Europe at the meeting of Congress, in December, 1807. On the 18th of that month, Mr. Jefferson recommended a general embargo; a bill was hurried through both branches, and on the 22d of the same month, the act was passed, unlimited as to duration. This law, if not in compliance of a demand, was in conformity to the views and wishes of Napoleon.

But it may be said, it was a measure of an impartial character, as it respected the two belligerents. In theory it might be, but not in its practical operation. The object of France was the destruction of Great Britain, by a total interdiction of her commerce with all other nations. The United States, by the embargo, joined with France to facilitate the accomplishment of this object. The embargo, in theory, might be called a municipal regulation, but, practically, it was an act of hostility against Great Britain.

Does the measure, then, deserve the character of impartiality? Great Britain, at that time struggling for existence against France, Russia, Austria, Prussia, and Denmark, felt no disposition to engage in a war with the United States. She, therefore, chose not to consider the embargo an act of hostility. France viewing it as an act of co-operation in her continental system, highly applauded the measure.

The French Minister for Foreign Affairs, (Talleyrand,) in a report to his Imperial Majesty, Napoleon, of September 8, 1808, thus speaks of the embargo:

"The Americans, a people who involve their fortune, their prosperity, and almost their existence, in commerce, have given the example of a great and courageous sacrifice. They have prohibited, by a general embargo, all commerce and navigation, rather than shamefully submit to that tribute which the English impose on all nations."

The French Emperor, himself, in an address to the Legislative body of France, October 26, 1808, is very explicit on the subject:

"The peace of Presburg, that of Tilsit, the assault of Copenhagen, the plans of England against all nations on the ocean, the revolution of Constantinople, the affairs of Spain and Portugal, have in various ways had an influence on the affairs of the world.

"Russia and Denmark have united with me against England.

"The United States of America have rather chosen to abandon commerce and the sea, than to acknowledge their slavery."

Having thus virtually engaged on the side of France, not by a declaration of war, but by the exercise of our restrictive energies, it was difficult to recede. The embargo, however, had become extremely unpopular, and on the 1st of March, 1809, it was repealed, and the non-intercourse substituted in its place. This repeal of the embargo, was also charged to the minority. Yes, sir, and happy, happy indeed, would it have been for the country, if the minority had been more successful in their opposition, and, with the death of the embargo, prevented the birth, if the term is applicable, of the non-intercourse.

The non-intercourse, however, had one feature of impartiality. It prohibited, as well French as British armed ships, from entering the ports and harbors of the United States after the 20th May then next.

This feature of impartiality was embraced by Erskine, the British Minister, to tender satisfaction for the injury done by the attack on the Chesapeake, and to propose an arrangement for the repeal of the Orders in Council. But the President, as if fearful the arrangement would be ratified by the British Government, takes particular care to accept the offers in a manner calculated to insure their rejection. Mr. Smith, Secretary of State, is instructed to say, that "the President owes it to himself, and the occasion, to let it be understood, that this equality was the result of a state of things growing out of distinct considerations." And Mr. Smith, in the same letter, adds:

"I have it in express charge from the President to state that, while he forbears to insist on a further punishment of the offending officer, he is not the less sensible of the justice and utility of such an example, nor the less persuaded that it would best comport with what is due from His Britanic Majesty to his own honor."

Let us now, Mr. Chairman, look at the conduct of France in relation to the non-intercourse act of March 1st, 1809, and of our Government towards France.

Strange as it may seem, this very act, placing the two belligerents upon the footing of equality, was made the pretext by France for the decree of Rambouillet, of March 28d, 1810. A decree which, for fraud and injustice, has no parallel in the annals of any other civilized nation. This decree, after assigning as the reason for its enactment the non-intercourse act of March 1st, 1809, declares, that—

"All vessels navigating under the flag of the United States, or possessed in whole or in part by any citizen or subject of that power, which, counting from the 20th May, 1809, (the time when her armed ships were prohibited entering our waters,) have entered or shall enter into the ports of our Empire, of our colonies, or of the colonies occupied by our arms, shall be seized, and the product of the sales shall be deposited in the surplus fund."

By virtue of this decree, more than one hundred American vessels were seized in the ports of France, and in those of Holland, Spain, Italy, and Naples, countries under French control.

Let it be recollected, Mr. Chairman, that this decree was promulgated but about four months previous to the pretended repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees. Let it be recollected, too, that General Armstrong was instructed not to engage that a non-intercourse should be adopted against Great Britain, upon the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, unless a satisfactory provision was made for restoring the property seized under the Rambouillet decree. This I assert on the authority of the letter of Mr. Smith, to General Armstrong, of the 5th of July, 1810. In this letter he says:

"As has been heretofore stated to you, a satisfactory provision for restoring the property, lately surprised and seized by the order, or at the instance, of the French Government, must be combined with the French edicts, with a view to a non-intercourse with Great Britain—such a provision being an indispensable evidence of the just purpose of France towards the United States. And you will, moreover, be careful, in arranging such a provision for that particular case of spoiliations, not to weaken the ground on which a redress of others may be justly pursued."

This provision, however, was not made; it has not yet been, and probably never will be made. And how, sir, let me ask, did the President justify his proclamation, declaring the Berlin and Milan decrees repealed on the 2d of November, 1810, and thereby causing a non-intercourse with Great Britain, without this provision, which he had declared to be indispensable?

That such a provision was not, and has not yet been made, we have the best evidence—that of the President himself. In his Message of December 5th, 1810, a month after he had declared those decrees revoked, he informs us that—

"It would well have comported with the conciliatory views, indicated by this proceeding on the part of France, to have extended them to all the grounds of complaint which now remain unadjusted with the United States. It was particularly anticipated that, as a further evidence of just dispositions towards them, restoration would have been immediately made of the property of our citizens, seized under a misapplication of the principle of reprisals, combined with a misconstruction of a law of the United States. This expectation has not been fulfilled."

Still, however, it was urged by a majority of this House that we were pledged to France. Yes, sir, I well recollect that the speeches of honorable gentlemen, then members of this House, urged in the strongest terms the passage of the act of March 2d, 1811, renewing the non-importation act against Great Britain, on the ground of our plighted faith to France. I well recollect, too, that the minority, who are too often charged with unreasonable opposition, as boldly declared that we were not pledged to France; that the Berlin and Milan decrees were not revoked. And who, sir, were correct, the majority or the minority?

But to return to the subject of the restoration of the property seized under the Rambouillet decree. In the President's Message of November 5th, 1811, we are told that—

"The justice and fairness which have been evinced on the part of the United States, towards France, both before and since the revocation of her decrees, authorized an expectation that her Government would have followed up that measure by all such others as were due to our reasonable claims, as well as dictated by its amicable professions. No proof, however, is yet given of an intention to repair the other wrongs done to the United States."

Again, in his Message of the 4th November, 1812, he says:

"Our affairs with France retain the posture which they held at the date of my last communication to you. Notwithstanding the authorized expectation of an early as well as favorable issue to the discussions on foot, these have been procrastinated to the latest date. The only intervening occurrence meriting attention, is the promulgation of a French decree, purporting to be a definitive repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees. This proceeding, although made the ground of the repeal of the British Orders in Council, is rendered, by the time and manner of it, liable to many objections."

It is not a little remarkable, that, notwithstanding General Armstrong was instructed to have combined with the repeal of the French decrees, provision for a restoration of the millions of property seized by the Rambouillet decree, that in the very letter of the Duc de Cadore to General Armstrong, of August 5th, 1810, the very letter on which the President's proclamation of November 2d, 1810, declaring

FEBRUARY, 1814.]

The Loan Bill.

[H. OF R.]

these decrees revoked, was founded, we have, from the language of that letter, reason to believe, that such a restoration was never intended. These are the words:

"The act of March 1st, 1809, has raised the embargo, and substituted for it a measure the most injurious to the interests of France. This act, of which the Emperor knew nothing until lately, interdicted to American vessels the commerce of France, at the time it authorized that to Spain, Naples, and Holland, that is to say, to the countries under French influence, and denounced confiscation against all French vessels which should enter the ports of America. Retaliation was a right, and commanded by the dignity of France, a circumstance on which it was impossible to make a compromise."

Then follows the pretended revocation. Now, sir, what reason had the President to expect a restoration of this property? Was it because in this letter he was told that—

"His Majesty loves the Americans. Their prosperity and their commerce are within the scope of his policy. The independence of America is one of the principal titles of glory to France. Since that epoch, the Emperor is pleased in aggrandizing the United States; and, under all circumstances, that which can contribute to the independence, to the prosperity and the liberty of the Americans, the Emperor will consider as conformable to the interests of his Empire."

Other nations, Mr. Chairman, have learnt by fatal experience what he means by his love, and by his efforts to contribute to their independence, to their prosperity, and their liberty. Thanks be to the God of Battles, who has put it out of his power ever again to give the United States any further specimens of his love, either for their commerce, their liberties, or their independence!

There is still another important view in which this subject ought to be considered.

A recurrence to facts and to dates will not only prove that the Berlin and Milan decrees were not revoked on the 5th of August, 1810, but that our Government had no right to consider them as revoked.

On the 14th of February, 1810, Champagny, in a note to Armstrong, after, in an insolent manner, telling him that—

"The Americans cannot hesitate as to the part they are to take; they ought either to tear to pieces their act of independence, and to become again, as before the Revolution, the subjects of England, or to take such measures as that their commerce and industry should not be tarified by the English, which renders them more dependent than Jamaica, which at least has its Assembly of Representatives and its privileges."

After thus severely lashing the Government of the United States he changes his tone, and proceeds:

"If then the Minister of America can enter into an engagement, that the American vessels will not submit to the Orders in Council of England, of November 1807, nor to any decree of blockade, unless the blockade should be real, the undersigned is authorized to conclude every species of convention, tending to renew the Treaty of Commerce with America, and in which all the measures, proper to consolidate the commerce and the prosperity of the Americans, shall be provided for."

Here is an explicit declaration of the terms on which we were to expect any modification of the Berlin and Milan decrees. The very next specimen of the Emperor's friendship, was the promulgation of the Rambouillet decree of March 28, 1810, which I have noticed, and by virtue of which, all American vessels, with their cargoes, then in the ports of France, or of the countries under her control, were seized, sold, and the proceeds deposited in the surplus fund. Well, sir, the next thing we hear from France, after this characteristic mark of friendship, the Rambouillet decree, was the pretended revocation on the 5th of August, 1810, of the Berlin and Milan decrees. Now, sir, either Armstrong did enter into an engagement, agreeably to the terms prescribed by Champagny, in his letter of February 14, 1810, or the President must have known that the pretended repeal of August 5, 1810, was conditional. How, then, could the President say, as he did, by his proclamation of November 8d, 1810, that those decrees were revoked? That the Emperor of France considered this repeal conditional, we have his own subsequent declarations. On the 31st March, 1811, in an address to the Council of Commerce, in Paris, he thus expresses himself:

"The decrees of Berlin and Milan are the fundamental laws of my Empire. For the neutral navigation, I consider the flag, as an extension of territory. The power which suffers its flag to be violated cannot be considered as neutral. The fate of the American commerce will soon be decided. I will favor it, if the United States conform themselves to these decrees. In a contrary case, their vessels will be driven from my Empire. The commercial relations with England must cease. I tell it to you very loudly."

The Emperor then waits, until satisfied by the proceedings of Congress, at their session of 1811-'12, that the United States would declare war against Great Britain, and then, on the 12th of May, 1812, at the earnest solicitation of Mr. Barlow, publishes the following decree:

PALACE OF ST. CLOUD, April 8, 1811.

Napoleon, Emperor of the French, &c., &c.

On the report of our Minister of Foreign Relations: Seeing by a law passed on the 2d of March, 1811, the Congress of the United States has ordered the execution of the provisions of the act of non-intercourse, which prohibits the vessels and merchandise of Great Britain, her colonies and dependencies, from entering into the ports of the United States:

Considering that the said law is an act of resistance to the arbitrary pretensions consecrated by the British Orders in Council, and a formal refusal to adhere to a system invading the independence of neutral powers, and of their flag, have, and do decree as follows:

The decrees of Berlin and Milan are definitively, and to date from the first of November last, considered as not having existed (non avenue) in regard to American vessels.

of mine is necessary. They carry with them intrinsic, irresistible evidence. I might, sir, proceed much further. I might notice the connection between the famous Turreau letter of the 14th of June, 1809, and the dismissal of the British Minister, Jackson, in November of the same year. I might notice the connection between the declaration of war, by France against Russia, in 1812; and by the United States and Great Britain nearly at the same time. But I will not trespass longer upon the time of the House, which will be more usefully occupied by others, who will, I trust, investigate this subject thoroughly, and who will rend asunder this veil of mystery, which conceals from public view the transactions between the Government of the United States and France.

Until, sir, my mind is better satisfied upon this subject, I will vote for no loans, I will vote for no men, or money, to prosecute this war. I will vote for no measures but such as are necessary for the defence and protection of the United States.

THURSDAY, February 11.

The Loan Bill.

Mr. SHEFFREY rose and said, that, on this occasion, it became the duty of the committee to look beyond the present moment. The motion submitted by the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means required them to consider not only whether there existed in the country a capacity and disposition to furnish the sum now wanted, but whether this system of loans and expenditures, of which the present measure constituted a part, could continue until the professed objects of the war were accomplished. There is certainly, said Mr. S., no honorable member on this floor who entertains serious doubts on the subject, who will not feel disposed, at least, to pause. There is none who shall be convinced that this system has its limits, and that those limits are short of your object, who will not think the present the best moment to arrest your progress. To continue the effusion of blood and the waste of money, without hope, would be wanton and cruel.

The sum proposed to be raised by loans, including the Treasury notes, as a portion of the means necessary to defray the expenses of the present year, is thirty millions of dollars. Although exceeding in amount any loan ever attempted in this country, (as it is admitted,) and exceeding any loan ever obtained in any other country, (means and circumstances considered,) as I shall have occasion hereafter to notice, yet it will be far short of our necessities, should our Army equal the number estimated. The Secretary at War estimates the military expenditures at twenty-four and one-half millions of dollars, and our military force for the year at sixty-three thousand men, thus making the average cost per man less than four hundred dollars. If we judge from past experience, I am inclined to believe the average cost will fall little short of one thousand dollars per man, and therefore, if the Secretary's premises are to be regarded, our military expenditures will this year exceed $50,000,000.

During the fiscal year, which commenced on the first day of October, 1812, and ended on the 30th September, 1813, the various sums paid on account of the military service, amounted to more than eighteen millions of dollars, and about six thousand dollars less than the sum appropriated. The paper laid on our tables, showing the near approach of the amount actually paid to the sum appropriated, may have been considered by some as a high evidence of the wisdom and sagacity of those who managed our affairs. Let them not be deceived. Nothing is more fallacious than the idea that the expenditure is limited by the appropriation. The actual payments only are so limited. If there is an excess of expenditure, it constitutes a debt which is paid out of the next appropriation. To prevent the whole sum appropriated for the military service from being paid as demands may require, and thereby prematurely exhaust the means of payment, the Treasury Department has interposed a restriction by which but one-twelfth part of the amount appropriated can be drawn monthly. Thus, the appropriation for the last year being about eighteen millions, the Treasurer, as agent for the War Department, received a monthly credit of one million and a half; beyond this sum no payment could be made, whatever the demand might be. Should there have been any application within the month after the sum set aside was exhausted, the claimant would be postponed, he would have to wait until the waters were again moved, and if he was not preceded by others, or thrown back in the scramble, he might be satisfied.

Sir, we have no means by which the actual military expenditures can be ascertained. Such is the manner of disbursement, and the state of the various branches of the War Department, that no person knows, or can know, how much of the immense sums drawn from the Treasury is actually paid to those entitled thereto, or how much remains due. Many millions are received by officers and contractors in the way of advances, who, instead of being called upon at short stated periods to account, retain large sums for months, often for years, and sometimes forever. There is, in fact, no system, no accountability. The people's money is squandered to enrich those who riot on the public spoils, and who fatten by their calamities. Little as I know, I have heard and seen enough to convince me of the profligacy, profusion, and corruption, which attends the expenditure of your public money. No person can form an adequate idea of the amount, nor will it be known until long after the war shall have closed. You are in the habit of passing laws to provide for the payment of claims not before contemplated, the extent of which you do not anticipate. It is, moreover, evident that many claims that accrued before the close of the last fiscal year, were either not presented, or not paid. We know of many large ones in that situation.

The Loan Bill.

[H. OF R.]

An honorable member from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY) seems to admit that temperate opposition on the floor is not improper; but he bestows severe reprehension on certain acts done out of this House, tending to defeat the measures of Administration. His fancy has created an offence which he calls moral treason, hitherto unknown to any code established to regulate the conduct of man. Though its name is known to every one, yet we are all ignorant how it is composed, or what is its essence. When we ask, does it consist in the violation of any law? we are answered that it does not. When we ask, whether disobedience to the dictates of conscience constitutes any ingredient? we receive the same answer. When we demand to know what it really is, the answer contains such refined, metaphysical reasoning, that we are still left to conjecture. This new-fangled, this sublimated offence, without body or soul, without any resting-place on this earth, is conjured up by the gentleman whenever he rises in his place to address you.

The honorable member has disclaimed the merit of the original discovery, and very disinterestedly bestowed it on another. But I presume, if he is not the inventor he certainly has improved on the idea, and according to the rules of the Patent Office, is entitled to a patent for his improvement, which will give him the exclusive enjoyment of all its benefits. He has referred us to Doctor Witherspoon as the original inventor, who, it seems, at the commencement of the Revolutionary contest, addressed his Scottish brethren in America, and exhorted them to aid in the cause of the colonies against the mother country. To illustrate his idea of their duty in the then crisis, he supposes a vessel at sea in distress, which required the aid of all on board to bring her into a port of safety; he supposes a minority of the crew, not only to refuse aid themselves, but counteracting, by every thing in their power, the efforts of their companions; and he asks whether the majority would, in such case, not throw them overboard, to save themselves from inevitable destruction? The gentleman's authority proves too much. If, as he supposes, our situation is like that of the crew in distress, why not go the full length of the remedy then applied, and throw the minority overboard? To this I have no doubt the gentleman would resort if he was not afraid. Perhaps there might be danger in the experiment. Sir, the authority cited has no kind of connection with our present situation. Dr. Witherspoon applied his hypothetical case to the then state of the country. When we, as a portion of the British Empire, attempted forcibly to separate ourselves from the dominion of the parent State, the law of nature, which is the law of force, was the only rule for our conduct; hence, the majority had a right to resort to every means their physical power gave them to secure their object. But what is our situation now? We have a government to which all are parties, and by which the rights of all are secured. Among them is the right belonging to every one, to investigate public measures and to speak of them as they may appear to merit, and this right extends to every possible act, short of meditated resistance to the law.

Permit me to take a short review of the most prominent public transaction, since the commencement of our difficulties abroad. I will lead your attention no further back than to the period when the treaty negotiated by Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney with Great Britain was rejected by the President, because it always has appeared to me that that act was the foundation of all the evils which have since befallen the country. I do most sincerely believe that, had it been ratified, we should not only this day enjoy the blessings of peace, but have little, if any, cause of complaint against our present enemy. It had been negotiated under circumstances as favorable as any American could wish; circumstances which once passed might never return. Its provisions, though not such as they would have been had we had it in our power to dictate the terms, were more favorable than those of the treaty of 1794, which had received the sanction of Washington, and under which we so eminently prospered. They were "honorable and advantageous to the United States," in the opinion of our Ministers, now members of the Cabinet; but it was indignantly rejected by the President, and gentlemen who now constitute the majority approved of his conduct. It was supposed that the situation of Great Britain would compel her to submit to any terms the Administration should dictate; or, if she would not, it was better to have "no treaty." Gentlemen were mistaken in both. They could obtain no better terms, and the effect of having "no treaty" we now witness in the calamities of the country.

After gentlemen had foregone the advantages of negotiation, they set about to invent and apply their own remedies to cure the disorders of the body politic. The embargo was the first that succeeded the rejection of the treaty. It was hailed by the Administration, its friends, as wonderfully efficacious, not only as a remedy, but as a preservative. It was to coerce the belligerents (or rather Great Britain) into an abandonment of their injurious policy, and to preserve us from war. After the experiment had been made sufficiently long to evince its preposterous absurdity, and to occasion loud complaints, in many parts of the Union, it was abandoned, and a commercial non-intercourse with the dominions of the two great belligerents substituted. This measure was adopted, not because a majority were convinced of the inefficacy of the embargo, but because the people would not bear it any longer. To this very day "all true believers" are firmly persuaded that it would have been effectual had it been continued, or had it not been violated. This proves to me that they do not understand the character of a free Government. A free people will not long submit to great privation, the necessity of which they cannot comprehend. And in a free Government, where the laws are necessarily mild, you cannot enforce regulations militating against the general habits and interests of the community without changing it in reality into a despotism. Napoleon could not execute his anti-commercial system among the people in Holland until he placed every individual under the control of military power. This is the only means which can execute an embargo in this country. And of this, it seems, the majority are convinced—as they have lately adopted it themselves.

After the non-intercourse had been in operation long enough to subject our farmers and planters to at least ten millions of dollars loss in the sales of their produce, burdened with the expense of double freight and double insurances, I thought I saw a strong disposition in this House to get clear of it by some means. But it could not be abandoned, consistently with the policy which had been adopted, as long as the belligerent edicts continued, without substituting something in its stead. A substitute seemed with the majority to be indispensable. A substitute was the rage; but what it should be no person could tell. I recollect about that time, an honorable member from Virginia, (Mr. GHOLSON,) whose ardor and honesty in the cause I very much admire, in accents of despair, exclaimed, What! no embargo! no non-intercourse! no substitute! As if the destinies of the nation hung upon one or the other. At length, however, "a substitute" was brought into the House by an honorable member from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON,) of a very innocent and harmless character, afterwards baptized "Macon's Bill No. 1." By its provisions, the merchant vessels of Great Britain and France were to be excluded from our harbors entirely, but commercial intercourse in every other respect was permitted with those powers. I was friendly to its passage; not because I believed it was calculated to coerce the belligerents or even induce Great Britain to retaliate, but I thought it well enough to throw into the hands of our own people the whole profits of carrying our products, as Great Britain had not been friendly towards us. As to France she was out of the question, as none of her ships visited our ports. But, above all other reasons, the conviction that the majority must have a "substitute," was the most cogent to influence me to support the bill. I feared that if they could not get that, which was perfectly harmless, they might adopt some other that would do mischief. It passed this House, but was unfortunately rejected in the Senate; I say unfortunately, because I believe it probable, had it become a law, we should have got clear of the restrictive system, and perhaps this day have been at peace.

After this bill was rejected, a new "substitute" was in demand. But what it would be, or what it ought to be, seemed to be the question. Ultimately some one, more sagacious than the rest (who it was I know not to this day) discovered that the only way was—to induce one of the belligerents to relinquish his injurious measures, by promises of resistance against the other should he continue his, and that other would follow his example; or, if he did not, you had then an opportunity of directing against him alone the whole force of your power, which the course marked out in the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations in 1808-'9, forbid against either, as long as they both continued to injure you. A bill was reported, containing provisions calculated (as was supposed) to secure one of these objects, called Macon's Bill No. 2, which finally passed into a law on the 1st of May, 1810.

In the progress of the bill through this House its friends manifested great expectations. They seemed to believe that they had fallen upon a most fortunate expedient, calculated to obtain respect for our commercial rights, by exciting in the belligerents a spirit of emulation to precede each other in ceasing to injure us. The infatuation, for I can call it nothing else, pervaded the most intelligent who were friendly to the Administration. I recollect to have heard in conversation an honorable member from Massachusetts of considerable talents, then a member of this House, declare that the bill provided a certain remedy for the difficulties under which we then labored. I was astonished to hear him make such a declaration—because it appeared to me, that every one who had paid any attention to the character and wishes of the French Government, could see in this measure the seeds of the evils of which such an abundant harvest has since fallen to our lot. It was the very measure which afforded full scope to the deception and chicanery of the French Cabinet to draw us from our neutral attitude, and such has been the effect. Scarcely had the act of the 1st May been received at Paris, when the toils were spread, and the Administration were caught. I wish I could believe they were willingly caught. The President, on the second of November, 1810, announced, on the authority of the letter of the Duke of Cadore of the 5th of August preceding, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan were revoked—an assertion, to say the best of it, which has never been supported by any proper evidence, and about which men differ according to their political opinions. The consequence was, that in relation to Great Britain the non-intercourse was put in force, and the ground of impartiality abandoned, to which the Administration had always professed rigidly to adhere.

But it was not to be expected that we should long remain in the situation in which that act placed us. It was the natural forerunner of stronger measures. As the fact had been asserted that France had ceased to violate our rights, and Great Britain alone remained unjust; another step became indispensable, as soon as public opinion was ripe for it. Accordingly, at the commencement of the session, in November, 1811, the President recommended to us, "an armor and an attitude suited to the occasion;" and a large army was voted, under the impression, I believe, that Great Britain had counted on our pacific policy, in which it was necessary to undeceive her by warlike preparations, when she would do us justice. The war was ultimately declared. And we were flattered with the most extravagant promises of its speedy and successful termination. As to the subjugation of Canada, that was almost too unimportant to detain gentlemen in their career of glory. I recollect an honorable member from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) who the other day talked about the predictions of the minority having failed, then pledged himself that the greater portion of the country would be in our possession in six weeks after the war should be commenced. Some gentlemen even supposed that no efforts of ours were necessary; that the Canadians were panting for the glory of conquering themselves. Two campaigns are now wasted, and you are no nearer your object than when you began.

After this review of the measures of Administration, which gentlemen have uniformly supported, and which have progressively brought us into our present calamitous situation, I should like to know upon what principle they can set up their high claims to our confidence. Has any one of their measures succeeded? Have they been able to perform any of the promises so lavishly made? They rejected the Treaty of 1806 and promised you a better. They were mistaken. They resorted to the embargo, to coerce Great Britain, and to save you from war. Great Britain maintained her policy and laughed at your embargo, and you are now at war. They adopted the non-intercourse with equal effect. The act of May, 1810, was to relieve you from the injustice of both belligerents; it has brought you into a ruinous war with one, without obtaining justice from the other. The war finally was to secure every thing. It has secured nothing—but, combined with the restrictive system, sacrificed every thing. The whole system of measures in fact, from the beginning, has been a miserable patchwork of expedients, resorted to as occasion seemed to require, without any regular and liberal policy. For myself, therefore, I cannot unite with gentlemen, however much I may respect them as individuals, in a course which has led us into many evils, and which, in my opinion, if persisted in must terminate in ruin.

I hope I shall be indulged, on this occasion, to use the liberty which gentlemen on the other side frequently exercise. Permit me, also, in my turn to invite to union. A union, not to support measures, which every day's experience condemns; to continue a hopeless, disastrous, and ruinous war; to fasten on ourselves and posterity, a heavy load of burdens; to cherish the profligacy of those who riot on the public spoils. But a union to restore the general happiness. Let them come over to us, and with us travel the path that leads to peace and national prosperity, from which they have departed. Their policy stands condemned by universal experience; to ours it has given a high sanction. I repeat, therefore, unite with us, and restore peace to our country.

The committee now rose.

SATURDAY, February 12.

The Loan Bill.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to authorize a loan for the year 1814.

Mr. FINDLAY addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I have voted for the declaration of war, and for the means necessary to carry it on, but have not heretofore on that subject accompanied my vote with my reasons for giving it, believing that such reasons had been given by others, as were self-evident; I now, however, claim the attention of the committee to a few of the reasons that determined me to vote for war, and the means of carrying it on with effect, and consequently to vote for filling the blank with twenty-five millions of dollars, as I design to do. This is the third declaration of war that I have lived to see, and I have read of many more, I believe of most that have been declared in Europe on the system that has been adopted for two centuries past; and I have observed but very few of them declared on grounds so perfectly justifiable as that in which we are now engaged.

I have, sir, heard one, if not more, respectable and honorable members, to give weight to their arguments in opposition to this war, mention that they themselves had learned their politics in the old school—the school of WASHINGTON. You, sir, I know, consider old men to be privileged to some extent to talk about themselves; this having been already admitted to others, I will make some use of the privilege, because this will be connected with my argument. I am, sir, now an old man. I have the frost of seventy years on my head. I am a scholar of the old school—of the school of WASHINGTON. I was elected a member of the first committee appointed to promote independence, in a very respectable and then very extensive old county of the same State that I have still the honor of representing in this House. I was employed in confidential stations to support it when declared. I risked my life oftener than once, in situations where several of my friends fell to give it the support I thought it deserved. When the present Government was put in operation, and Gen. WASHINGTON was appointed President, I was consulted by him about the circumstances and defence of the Western country, before I had the honor of a seat in Congress; and owing to particular circumstances, was more intimate with and more consulted by President WASHINGTON and the members of his Administration, than ever I have been by any succeeding one. Therefore I claim a right to be a disciple of that school, and perhaps the oldest one in this House. But it is proper to inquire, what was the doctrine taught in this school? This may be substantially found in the official documents of that period.

In President WASHINGTON's remonstrance, presented to the British Minister, he says, that the British Government had broken the definitive treaty before it was known in this country, and continued to break it after it was known.

That they continued to break it after it was known, we are taught to remember by very serious tokens; they continued to supply the savages, by whom they had desolated much of our country during the Revolutionary war, with every implement for distressing the most exposed part of our settlements. Kentucky was made the unceasing object of their attack, and even Pennsylvania did not escape. On the conclusion of the Revolutionary war, Congress found themselves possessed of as little power as means of providing for the general defence, and gave some reason to believe that they were not very zealously disposed to defend the Western frontier; they seemed rather inclined always to consider the frontier settlers as the aggressors. This and other causes rendered it necessary, or at least prudent, for Gen. WASHINGTON to send a confidential agent (Mr. Innis) on this inquiry as part of his mission. He reported an amount of sufferings in Kentucky beyond what had been conceived, while their hands were bound up from even defending themselves by retaliation.

During the first Congress of WASHINGTON's Presidency, and without any act of Congress for that purpose, he sent out an expedition against the hostile Indians under the command of Col. Harmer, composed in part of the militia from Pennsylvania, Kentucky, &c. They were defeated, and besides other friends whom I valued, a young man, a near and dear relative of mine, was killed and scalped by the savages. The next season, Gen. St. Clair was sent out with an army provided by law; he was not only defeated, but his army destroyed. It was raised only with a view to subdue the Indians between the Ohio and the Lakes, but the savages from the deep recesses of the woods were brought to Detroit, still at that time in possession of the British, contrary to the express terms of the definitive treaty, and furnished with every thing necessary for war, and sent against Gen. St. Clair. I recollect this the more perfectly, because, on the receipt of that information by the President, I was sent for by the Secretary of War, and informed of it; the Secretary lamented that the information came too late for the Government either to recall or reinforce General St. Clair. Government was, therefore, under the necessity of raising a large and more permanent army, which was put under the command of Gen. Wayne, and which, after four years, became eventually successful. Much more information might be given of the hostility of Britain against the United States during this period, but I will only detain you, sir, with one instance. A council of the Indian tribes was convened by Lord Dorchester, then Governor of Canada, in which he engaged to supply them, in behalf of Britain, with munitions of war, and encouraged them to proceed in war against the United States with an expectation of the co-operation of the British Government. This was first shown to me in confidence, but has been since published even in British prints. The British Minister was called upon to account for it. He gave no satisfactory answer; so, we are informed, Gov. Prevost, of Canada, has done when called on about the worse than savage depredations on the Chesapeake. After peace was made with the Indians, and Jay's treaty was ratified, President Adams informed Congress as early as 1797, of the British agents being employed in forming a confederation of all the Indian tribes against the United States, the truth of which has been severely verified.

Much has been said in opposition to the conquest of Canada; in almost every argument against the measures of Government, the attempt to make the acquisition has been denounced, as both unjust and unwise. This, sir, is not the doctrine of the school of WASHINGTON, nor even of New England while colonies. It is well known that they, while colonies—principally Massachusetts—equipped and sent out a powerful armament at their own expense for the reduction of Canada, to commence with the taking of Quebec, under the command of their Governor. The winds and waves defeated them; many were lost by shipwreck, those who escaped returned home. It is remembered by many yet living and recorded in history, the very great assistance which the colonies, especially New England, contributed to aid Britain in conquering Canada from France during the seven years' war. In accomplishing this object, much American blood was shed.

When the aggression of Britain forced the colonies, though still acknowledging allegiance to the British Crown, to appeal to arms in defence of their rights, one of their earliest objects was the conquest of Canada. The approaches to it were secured, and the plan laid for its future reduction, before the declaration of independence was agreed on, and officers appointed and an army raised for the final conquest of Canada. In the Autumn following the declaration of independence, General Washington detached a division of his army under the command of General Arnold to co-operate with General Montgomery in the reduction of Quebec. The misfortunes that prevented the final success of that plan, are too well known to require to be repeated; but though the plan was at that time defeated, it was not relinquished. As soon as the French alliance was obtained, the plan was renewed by Congress. General Washington was consulted on the subject, and the Marquis de Lafayette went to France to negotiate for assistance to complete the conquest of Canada. He did not, however, succeed, and the object was from necessity relinquished.

The Loan Bill.

[H. OF R.]

It may be asked, what was the object of the New England colonies, and afterwards the United States, in being so solicitous for the conquest of Canada? Was it to acquire a greater extent of territory? No: it was solely as a defensive measure of the first importance; it was, as they express themselves, to secure their frontier settlements from being destroyed, and their people without regard to age or sex, scalped and barbecued by a savage and ferocious foe, instigated and supplied with the munitions of barbarous destruction by the agents of a foreign nation whenever they thought proper. If this was a justifiable reason for the conquest of Canada in defensive war by offensive operations, when our settlements but in a few instances were extended to the sources of the Atlantic rivers, how much more justifiable and necessary it is now, when our people are increased to more than three times the number, and our settlements extended far and wide on all the Western rivers, as well as to the South?

Mr. Chairman, some of those who were opposed to the war, and every measure proposed for carrying it on to effect, denied that the Indians either provoked or commenced the war. Not desiring to detain you long on this subject, I refer to the warning voice of President Adams to Congress, in his speech to Congress sixteen years ago, to which I have alluded above, and to all the information since obtained by Government from the Indians themselves and our own agents, of the councils to which the Indians were called by the British agents, of the presents made to them, of arms, ammunition, and all other suitable goods, and as to the industry of their prophets, &c., in extending the confederation against the United States, and of the murders committed, and such rendezvous as have usually indicated the commencement of Indian war. Was the Government to look blindly on till our frontier settlements were desolated and the inhabitants murdered, without using any means of prevention? It was only by a preventive measure they did begin; they sent a commissioner, accompanied with a small army, to the principal Indian rendezvous to negotiate; they promised to negotiate the next day; but while the army lay in security, depending on the promise, they were attacked with the usual Indian ferocity in the night. Was the Government wrong in marching the army into their country? If they were in error, they learned it in the school of President Washington, who, during the first Congress, called on the militia of different States, the first call of militia under the Government, and who, with the only regiment of regulars then existing, were sent on a secret expedition to attack the Indian towns. Those Indians, I believe, were justly charged with committing murders and stealing horses in Kentucky, but not at that time in other States; on the late occasion murders had been committed, and horses stolen in different Territories, and endeavors used to induce them to desist. Before General Wayne's treaty the Indians refused to acknowledge the transfer of that Territory to the United States in full sovereignty; but in that treaty the sovereignty of the United States, as transferred by Britain, was fully acknowledged—the Indians retaining the right of soil, disposable to the United States only; therefore, the United States had an unquestionable right to march their troops wherever it was necessary in that Territory. It may possibly be recollected by some members, that when provision was made by law for raising several regiments in addition to the peace establishment in 1803, I advocated the measure, on the ground that a military force stationed in the Indian country was absolutely necessary to prevent an Indian war; and gave my opinion that a regiment or two, judiciously stationed, might prevent a war, and incalculable mischief and expense. Though the raising these regiments was strenuously opposed, and the recruiting stopped the next session, yet no member suggested that we had no right to keep a garrison in that country, or denied that the British agents were supplying the Indians with the munitions of war.

I have, sir, examined with some attention what has usually, by the civilized nations of Europe, been assigned as causes to justify war. In some of them I could only discover that the party assigning them only wished for an excuse to get to war; but that a nation, by its agents, exciting war in a neighboring country, was an act of hostility, and a just cause of war against the aggressor, is agreed by all; yet the nation against whom the hostility is committed is the proper judge of the time and manner of correcting it. If there was any doubt of the hostilities committed by Britain, in exciting the savages and supplying them, it might be supposed that their so instantly incorporating them in their armies, and patronizing their savage barbarity in conducting the war, is a sufficient proof; therefore I conclude that their exciting and supporting the savages in a war against the United States, was alone a justifiable cause of war, and renders the conquest of Canada not only expedient but a necessary defensive measure, and would alone justify the war; but it is not alone. I do not, however, design to detain the committee with explaining all the causes of war that existed before it was declared. I design, principally, to confine myself to one other cause, viz: the impressment of our seamen, and on that I will chiefly confine myself to the question of expatriation, on which some extraordinary opinions have been advanced—opinions to which I seem to be personally called to pay attention.

Mr. Chairman, I drew my first breath in the British European dominions, but have been in this country more than fifty years. As early as 1775 I served as a member of the committee elected to preserve order when the King had renounced the protection of the Colonies by dissolving their Legislatures, and to provide for the public defence, and also to prepare the way for independence; and when it was declared, though not in the regular army, I risked my life more frequently, and for longer periods, where many of my friends fell, or were taken prisoners, for its establishment, than any law required; I on more occasions than one volunteered my services in support of it, as several of my near relations have already done in the present war. Therefore, on the principles now advanced, I have long been, and yet am, at least a moral traitor of a high grade, and for which, if I cannot be punished in this world, I must account in another. I may, however, be answered, that we were all equally traitors at that period, being equally born subjects to the British King, but were morally justified by the justice of the cause. This answer, however, will not justify me on the principle of perpetual allegiance to the country in which I first drew my breath. I drew my first breath in Ireland, which then was, and continued to be a component part of the British Empire; therefore, on the principles now advanced, I am still under a moral obligation of allegiance to that soil and Government. This was not the case with those who drew their first breath in the Colonies; they supported the allegiance to the soil in which they drew their first breath, and only became traitors to their King. Kings may be changed or die, but the soil where we drew our first breath continues unchangeable. Therefore, I was a traitor on another and much higher principle than the native colonists. I also took up arms and held official appointments of pretty high trust before I was a naturalized citizen. Indeed, I never have been naturalized, except by the definitive treaty. It is true, that during the Revolutionary war, I, in common with the native colonists, took an oath to support the independence of the United States; this oath was prescribed by the State Legislatures, to distinguish between Whigs and Tories, a distinction then well known, that the latter might be double taxed, and deprived of political privileges. That old school of Washington did not admit advocates of British aggressions and traducers of their own Government to sit in the National Councils, nor enjoy political privileges, but they did admit many into their councils and armies who had not drawn their first breath in the Colonies, without any act of formal naturalization. Municipal laws for naturalization are introduced for the security of the State which enacts them, and not for the security of other nations; perhaps the United States is the only nation which has a standing general law for that purpose; Britain has none, yet admits to citizenship for a short time of service on the ocean. No nation is obliged to have such a law, yet all nations are obliged to treat strangers who come among them with hospitality as long as they permit them to stay, and to grant them protection, in return for which they are obliged to support the government and obey the laws; we oblige them to serve in the militia, constables' guards, &c.

Mr. Chairman, I really do not understand how happening to draw my first breath in a particular spot can bring me under a moral obligation of perpetual allegiance to that spot, under the penalty of being guilty of treason, which is allowed to be the highest crime a man can commit in society. I have been taught to believe that the law of nature, which is the law of nature's God, made it the duty of every man to consult and pursue his own happiness, and that this conduced to the general happiness. I have acted on this principle. The same supreme law also taught me that I could not be brought under a positive moral obligation but by a conscious act of my own will. Now, sir, I am not conscious of where or when I drew my first breath; my will was not consulted about it; it was not my voluntary act; I was wholly passive in that business. Therefore, no moral obligation can arise from it to bind my conscience to perpetual allegiance to that spot of earth. If this reasoning is correct, I conclude that I am not guilty of the high crime of treason; that I am not a traitor. About twenty years after the time I was told I had drawn my first breath, consulting my own happiness, I came to Pennsylvania, where I have resided for more than half a century. I have found that doing so conduced to my own happiness and the happiness of those with whom I am connected. I have a pretty numerous family of children and grandchildren, who, as far as they have grown up, bear true allegiance to the country of my choice, but do not consider themselves as slaves to the soil on which they were born because they happened to draw their first breath in it.

I have said that this is the doctrine of the law of nature. I will add that it has been the practice of free and civilized nations of the world, as far back as we can trace their history. After God had created the human race, he commanded them to increase, and multiply, and replenish the earth, which he apportioned to the different original families; but they, or at least the majority of them, rebelled against this commandment, and erected a despotic government on the plains of Shinar, (Chaldea.) The first despotic Government of which we have any information, and the first national sin of which, we are informed in sacred history, was, like the opinion of the gentleman to whom I reply, refusing the right of expatriation. The Creator and Supreme Governor of the world said, "Disperse abroad, and replenish the earth." "No," says the Government of Shinar, "we have chosen a fertile and beautiful situation; we will compel you to stay to defend the Government, to which you owe a perpetual allegiance; we will establish here a universal empire; we will make ourselves a name, and an elevated tower, that we may not be scattered abroad." But God punished this despotism contrary to his law of nature, and, by confounding their language, laid them under the necessity of dispersing themselves abroad, and replenishing the earth in small colonies of emigrants, which laid the foundation of such numerous small nations as we observe in the time of Abraham.

The Loan Bill.

The empire of Shinar, (Chaldea,) it appears, was soon dissolved, and we find, from the same record, the emigration was free in all the countries of the East for some ages; we do not find that they asked leave to emigrate from the country which they left, but they did request admittance into the country to which they came. Jacob and his sons requested permission to settle in Egypt; they were received and treated with hospitality; but, after they had increased in number, and all those who had been born before they came to Egypt were deceased, they proposed to emigrate to Asia, from whence their ancestors had come; but the King of Egypt, then become a despot, refused to permit them to remove. The ruin that this brought on that King, and the distress it brought on the nation, it is not necessary to repeat. After this period, emigration appears to have been freely admitted between Egypt, Phœnicia, Greece, &c., till, perhaps, it might have been interrupted by the rise of great empires, the scourges of the world; but it is well known that it was freely admitted by the civilized and free nations of Greece and Rome. They gloried in this as the test of their freedom and civilization. The moral law of nature, and the examples I have quoted, are the schools from which I have derived my principles on this subject, as well as from the school of Washington, who admitted every free emigrant into the Army, even without naturalization, if he was not a deserter from the enemy's camp. Such he would not trust.

The question of expatriation, in the present contest, derives its importance from the question of impressment. The Greeks and Romans considered violence done to one citizen as an act of hostility against the whole nation, and resented it accordingly. So did all nations, not even excepting the savage tribes. So did President Washington; so did President Adams, and every succeeding Administration, only they exercised longer forbearance than the ancient nations would have done.

As early as 1792, President Washington in his instructions to Mr. Pinckney, then our Minister near the Court of London, mentions one instance of British impressment that had recently taken place, and instructs our Minister in remonstrating against that outrage to inform the British Court that it was such an act of hostility as, if persisted in, would certainly provoke retaliation; or, in other words, was clearly indicating, that it was a just cause of war in his opinion. He also objected to written protections as a test of citizenship, because our flag was the proper protection of all that sailed under it. When Jay's Treaty was made, this question with some others was postponed for further negotiation. Another Minister, Rufus King, was sent without delay, with positive instructions to renew the negotiation on that subject. On the same principles similar instructions were renewed and strongly enforced by President Adams, and continued to be so by President Jefferson, but without success. These things are so generally known, that it is not necessary to be more particular. Some gentlemen who hear me are so well acquainted with the facts, that they can correct me if I am mistaken. I, sir, agree with Washington and Adams, that impressing seamen of any description, whether our own citizens or those of other nations, from under the national flag on the ocean, the common highway of nations, was a just, and, if persisted in, necessary cause of war. That thousands of our own native citizens were thus impressed, was a great aggravation to the aggression, but did not change the principle. Impressing French, Danes, Portuguese, &c., from under our flag, about whose language there could be no mistake, has been practised, and protested against by different Presidents. President Adams, it is presumed, was as well informed on this subject as any member on this floor. He not only in his public instructions, but in his private discourse, invariably maintained that our national flag was the protection of all under it, except contraband of war. In his last instructions to Mr. King, he lays down the incontestable position, that independent nations, while they remain so, have all equal rights; that consequently, if Britain had a right to impress from under our flag, we have an equal right to impress from under theirs.

It has, sir, been repeatedly and boldly declared on this floor, by such as are engaged in advocating the cause of Britain and accusing their own Government, that Britain has enjoyed and exercised these rights from time immemorial; and they treat with a kind of ridicule our expectation that she will ever surrender them, or ought to do it, because they say her national existence depends on them; that she has invariably exercised this authority. This I deny absolutely, and appeal to facts. I do not admit it to be entitled to the name of right.

During the reign of Queen Elizabeth, thousands of Englishmen went volunteers into the service of Holland and Henry IV. of France; but though England soon after, being at war with Spain, stood in need of seamen, yet we know they did not impress their own seamen, nor seamen of other nations, from under the flag of Holland or France. As the armies of Holland have been generally composed of men enlisted from other nations, they have at all times, while they enjoyed independence, had numbers of English, and Scotch, and Germans from different States in their service. They had several regiments kept up regularly by recruits from Scotland. Britain has been at different times at war with the United Provinces, but we never have heard of British citizens who entered their ranks in time of peace, considered or treated as traitors. During the Revolutionary war, when Britain purchased all the Germans she could procure from the petty despots, she also called on the States of Holland for the Scottish regiments; but they refused to come. Britain afterwards went to war with Holland, but did not in that war consider or treat as traitors the Scottish regiments, nor before they went to war impress seamen from the ships of Holland; nor have they impressed from Prussia, whose navy was manned with British seamen, from the admiral to the private sailor.

When the Prince of Orange arrived with an army in England to accomplish the revolution of 1688, that army was composed of officers and soldiers of different nations; a large proportion of that army, and their General, the Duke of Schomberg, were native born citizens of France. France became a party in the war, which was continued for several years; but none of the French citizens who had left France in time of peace to seek their fortune in foreign service were ever considered or treated as traitors by France. During the reign of Louis XIV., who has been often, perhaps justly, considered as a tyrant, a number of young Frenchmen, during a period of peace between Austria and France, entered the Austrian service as volunteers in a war against Turkey. One of these afterwards became the celebrated Prince Eugene. A war soon after commenced between Austria and France, when the King of France called on the volunteers to return. Eugene and a number of others who had received commissions from Austria, then considered as the natural enemy of France, refused to return. Eugene became Commander-in-chief of the army of Austria, which eventually reduced the haughty Louis very low; but during different wars of near fifty years' continuance, with some intermission, neither Prince Eugene nor these Frenchmen who continued in the Austrian service with him, were ever considered as traitors. They left France in pursuit of their own happiness, and went to a nation with whom France was not at that time at war.

The Count St. Germain, a native of France, in time of peace entered the service of Prussia; but when France engaged in the war against Prussia, he joined the armies of his native country, in which he attained a high rank, and rendered eminent services; but he was not a favorite of the King's mistress, Madame Pompadour, and his great merit was overlooked. He became discontented, and determined to resign and go into foreign service. Every inducement was given, and promise made, both by the King and Commander-in-chief, to retain him in the service. These promises, however, had been too often broken to afford confidence. He claimed his right from the law of nature to pursue his own happiness, but engaged not to go into the service of those then at war with France, but of a neutral power who eventually might be at war with it. He accepted of the chief command of the troops of the King of Denmark, who gave him a high salary to introduce discipline and order among the troops of Denmark. Was he deemed and prosecuted as a traitor, or reclaimed for this? No, after peace was restored in France, he was invited back to France, and put at the head of the War Department.

But, passing numerous examples from different nations of Europe that might be produced, I will, sir, offer a few examples from the practice of Great Britain herself on this question. I have already mentioned instances from the time of Elizabeth; I will now offer some of a later date. On the termination of the war in Ireland, which had been for several years supported in favor of King James against King William by the natives, assisted by auxiliaries of France, by the Treaty of Limerick, the heads of the Opposition were permitted to retire into foreign service. It was soon after discovered that it would have been better policy to have rendered them happy at home. They went into the service of France and Spain, and formed the famous Irish brigade, so much distinguished in the service of those nations in their war with Great Britain, till the Revolution of France, in which we know, by their names, many of them made a figure. They continued to be recruited from Ireland in time of peace for near a hundred years. General Conway, from France, who served in the American Revolutionary war, was one of them. He was born in Ireland. These brigades, continually recruited in Ireland, by the estimated amount of more than two hundred thousand, fought against Britain, the country in which they drew their first breath, from sixteen hundred and ninety till the close of the last century. They were exchanged, and otherwise treated in the same manner as the native troops of France; they were not punished as traitors. This was not singular. Holland, Prussia, Austria, &c., always had troops in their armies, enlisted or appointed from the neighboring States with which they were frequently at war. One of the sons of the sister of the King of Prussia, the famous Duke of Brunswick, had a command in his army during the seven years' war, while his brother had a command in the Austrian army opposed to him. But if they emigrated and went into foreign service in time of peace, or with a nation at peace with their native country at the time of their emigration, there is no instance known to me on record in which they were treated or punished as traitors, or obliged to return. The instance of Patkul, I presume, will not be considered as an exception. Their emigration is their voluntary act. In drawing their first breath, they are passive, their will is not consulted.

This case has, apparently, by the gentlemen from New York and Virginia, been divided into two questions—allegiance to a particular King or Government, and allegiance to the soil or country in which we happen to be born. The native colonists were only traitors against the King, even if they had not been successful in the struggle for independence; but I, and others, who had emigrated from Great Britain, if this doctrine was valid, were also traitors against the country in which they drew their first breath, viz: guilty of double treason. But these honorable members seem to have more acute discernment than the British Government itself possessed at that time. Very many officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army drew their first breath in Britain or Ireland. Generals Gates, Lee, and St. Clair, the oldest Major General now living of that respectable army, drew their first breath in Great Britain, and had held commissions in the British army. Lee only resigned the British commission the day preceding his acceptance of a Major General's commission from Congress. He was afterwards taken prisoner by the British, but he was not by them considered as a traitor, but exchanged as other officers were, agreeably to the law of nations. The Pennsylvania line of that army, considered, at least before the mutiny, as the strongest line of the Revolutionary army, was in a great measure composed of men born in Ireland. Of these, Generals Irwin and Hand, well known in the annals of that period, had been in Ireland, and held military commissions under the King of Great Britain. General, then Colonel Irwin, and many other officers and privates who had been born in Ireland, were taken prisoners at the battle of Three Rivers, but they were not considered as traitors, but exchanged on the same principles as the natives were. If this absurd, slavish doctrine, had been urged and admitted at that period, it is very probable that the present generation would not have enjoyed independence, or a Government of their own; and if we had not gone to war when every honorable means of avoiding it was exhausted, we would have enjoyed independence only in name, the expense of supporting it without the benefit. The gentlemen know that they did not offer any alternative for war but submission. Submission in important points opens the way for repeated submissions.

Mr. HUMPHREYS said he rose with diffidence to address the House, on a subject which he considered to be of more importance than any which had or probably would occupy the attention of Congress during the present session. In vain have laws been passed for adding three regiments of riflemen to the present establishment, and making other provisions for the vigorous prosecution of the ensuing campaign, if the bill now under consideration should be rejected. It was the master-spring by which the whole warlike machinery of the country was to be set in motion, and if it were rejected we should be under the necessity of submitting to whatever terms the enemy might think proper to dictate and impose.

For his part, he was satisfied of the justice of the war; that it could not be avoided without sacrificing the interest and independence of the United States; that, in his opinion, the resources of the country were amply sufficient for its prosecution and ultimate honorable and successful termination. He did not, therefore, think with the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFER) that no appropriation of money for its support ought to be made.

That gentleman (Mr. S.) had, in the commencement of his argument, endeavored to prove, by a variety of facts and deductions, that there was too great a scarcity of capital for the purposes of trade within the United States; that the present measure was calculated to diminish the stock and transfer it into the hands of foreigners—so that, at the expiration of three years' war, the circulating medium would not be adequate to the ordinary purposes of internal trade.

This statement of the result of the present measure would, if correct, be productive of gloomy and painful reflections; but, without an extraordinary knowledge of the finances it could be easily demonstrated that the position was altogether erroneous.

When the Government want money, a quantity of stock is created equal to the sum required; which stock is nothing more than the undertaking of Government to pay the amount of the principal and interest of the money which they may borrow of individuals, in the manner and according to the stipulation which may be authorized and agreed upon; this stock or assumption is sold to the capitalists of the country, who pay the purchase money into the Treasury of the United States, and again it is disbursed in pay to the soldiers, mariners, and agriculturists, for the support of Government, and in the prosecution of the war. Thus, if ten millions be borrowed in the course of the year, it gets into general circulation; every person in the community receives a portion of benefit from it, because it is added to the circulating medium of the country; a part enables the farmer to pay his taxes, and the balance falling into the hands of individuals may constitute a fund for future loans to the Government, if necessity requires it.

But the gentleman from Virginia "contends the stock will be taken up by foreigners, and produce the evils he apprehends." Should Government have occasion for twenty-five millions—which is believed to be the sum required on the present occasion—we will suppose the stock to raise the money be sold in Europe;—the money for which it is sold will be introduced into the United States, and put into general circulation, as has been before observed; by which process an addition of twenty-five millions is made to the floating capital of the country, which will not escape for fifteen or eighteen years, the length of time dependent on the amount of interest which is annually paid. So far, then, from the opinion of the gentleman being correct, the very reverse of what he seems to apprehend will be the result; and the only danger is, that the too great increase of currency may produce a difference between the nominal and real value of property, or rather a diminution of the value of all property from which there is a fixed income. But it is believed that no danger is to be feared from this source, as the gentleman himself contends that the capital employed in trade and in mechanical operations is inadequate to the purposes required, and it is clear that improvements in any parts of the States would progress more spiritedly if the improvers could be possessed of a sufficient capital.

Mr. H. said he was sorry to differ in opinion with many of those gentlemen (in whose correctness he had much confidence) who declared the belief that it was improper on this occasion to inquire into the injuries practised by Great Britain, which produced the present war. He thought it necessary to take a slight view of the conduct of Great Britain for the purpose of refuting the assertion repeatedly made, both on this floor and elsewhere, that the war is unjust, unnecessary, and inexpedient.

As to the justice of the war, there could be no doubt;—when it was considered that evidence conclusive was obtained at the battle of Tippecanoe, fought before the war, and from other sources, that the Indians were excited to hostilities by the British; were supplied with arms, ammunition, and every disposition to commence war on our frontiers. Emissaries were sent from the northern to the southern tribes, and strong solicitations made, and promises of support given to the southern Indians provided they would join the coalition against the United States. The horrid and indescribable massacre which was perpetrated near the mouth of Duck River, in the State of Tennessee, by the Creek Indians—that which was committed at Fort Mimms, and the war which the brave people of Tennessee and Georgia now prosecute almost to the extermination of the deluded Creeks—may all be attributed to the barbarous and savage policy and management of Great Britain. These facts are sufficient to justify the endeavor to expel from Canada all British influence and power.

With respect to the conquest of Canada, it was perfectly justifiable. It was of the greatest importance to the United States if the war against Britain in the Canadian province should be considered an offensive operation, still it was legitimate and constitutional; but can any operation of this nation, whether by land or sea, be considered as other than defensive, if it be calculated to repel the enemy or disable him for the further prosecution or continuance of the evils of which the United States had such just grounds of complaint? The war was commenced for the defence of American rights, of property, persons, and principles; in the prosecution of the war every act may be considered as defensive, which will conduce to the attainment of the objects for which hostilities were commenced. The conquest of Canada, and the expulsion of the English power from the American continent, would operate most powerfully in depriving the enemy of the means of annoying our commerce and preying upon our citizens.

Halifax is the place of general rendezvous for the British vessels on the American station—the place at which they may be repaired, watered, victualled, and supplied; in a convenient latitude between the West Indies and England. The ports of the West India Islands are not suitable to shipping. Without a footing on the continent, without Canada, in fact (which, as early as the year 1762, was considered necessary to the British power in America) the same quantity of shipping could not be supported on the United States coast, nor remain for so great a length of time as at present. A small fleet would in general give us the command of the American seas, interrupt and almost destroy their commerce with their southern colonies, and force them to respect our rights more effectually than is in the power of the strongest maritime State in Europe; the British influence over the Indians would be wrested from them, and the women and children on the western frontier would rest in security and peace.

Mr. CULPEPER spoke as follows: Mr. Chairman, before the question is taken, I desire to assign some of the reasons which governed me in the course I have pursued, and for the votes which I have given, and which I expect to give, upon this and sundry other subjects connected with it, viz: embargo, non-importation, war, army bills, and appropriations. I connect the embargo with the question of filling the blank, not because of its relation to this subject, but because the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. McKEE) commenced his attack upon us by charging us with voting against the embargo in December, 1807. I did vote against the embargo in 1807, and have voted against it every time it has been proposed since, for several reasons: First, because I did believe it would injure us more than the Europeans, by destroying or diminishing the spirit of industry and enterprise for which our citizens are so remarkable. The farmer, deprived of the prospect of a profitable sale for his surplus produce, will have fewer inducements to industry during the continuance of the embargo, than when he has the prospect of a profitable market; and it must, and certainly will, have the same effect upon every branch of industry. Second, because, if it does affect the enemy in any degree, and I admit it will, it must fall almost exclusively upon the poor, who are already miserable, and who have little or no voice in the Government of England. Third, because we have an extensive maritime frontier, blockaded by a formidable navy, which though it consisted (as gentlemen on the other side of the House tell us) of one hundred ships, was unable so effectually to guard our coast as to prevent us from a profitable commerce. I believed, when we blockaded the whole of our coast by our embargo, the one hundred British ships, then stretched from the Bay of Passamaquoddy, on the north-east, to the Gulf of Mexico on the southwest, a distance of near two thousand miles, would be relieved from the arduous task of such a blockade, and have little else to do but to concentrate their forces, and annoy us much more effectually than they have by their blockade. These, sir, are some of the reasons which induced me to vote against the embargo, and I have seen or heard nothing since to alter my opinion. I fear my scruples will be confirmed, for I place no reliance on the magnanimity, justice, or mercy of the British, as an enemy. But, if I had doubted the correctness of my vote upon this subject, the effects of your embargo, since it became a law, would have removed all my doubts. I begin with a circumstance which happened in Alexandria, which, though limited in its effects, may be of some importance: A citizen of this place had purchased sixty bushels of oysters, which he had put on board of the packet which runs daily from Alexandria to this place; he also purchased a few barrels of flour, (perhaps four or five,) which he was about to send on board; the collector, who I understand had just received notice of the embargo, considered it his duty to demand security, conformably to the provision of the act laying an embargo; the owner or conductor of the packet, either unable or unwilling to give the security, or for want of time to draw a bond, omitted to comply. The consequence was, the packet had to be detained until the oysters were disembarked; and the men (as I am informed) had to give three dollars to a cartman to haul a load on the turnpike the next day. In North Carolina, the State which I have the honor to represent in part, it has prevented the manufacturers of salt from procuring the lumber necessary for extending the manufactory of that all important article; and when my honorable colleague, (Mr. KING,) the other day, proposed so to amend a bill upon the subject as to extend the privilege of transporting lumber to be exclusively employed in manufacturing salt, the proposed amendment was rejected.

But we have been charged with moral treason for not supporting this war. The gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY,) the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) and the gentleman from New York, (Mr. FISK,) have given us several lectures upon moral treason and the doctrine of morality. I know not by what rule these gentlemen try our morality; not by the Constitution or laws of the United States I presume, for I have not wilfully transgressed these laws, and I trust gentlemen are not prepared to charge us with the violation of either the Constitution or the laws. So far from it, sir, I have given the war my constitutional support, and shall continue to do so. When the law requires me to part with a share of my property to secure the remainder, I do it cheerfully, and I advise my friends, and have the vanity to believe they will, when called on to defend their country, march with alacrity; but I never shall advise them to enlist for the purpose of invasion. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFER) has proposed conscience as the rule of morality—I prefer that to any rule proposed by gentlemen on the other side of the House; but I know of no unerring rule of morality, except the unchangeable and eternal rule of right, which the Author of our existence has given us to govern our conduct by, and in which rule our duties to our Creator and to each other are briefly described. By examining these duties, we find they originate in and rise out of our relation to God and dependence upon him; or our relation to and dependence upon each other, and are unchangeably and eternally the same. What does this say? Kill, capture, burn, sink, and destroy? No, sir—it says: Thou shalt not kill; thou shalt not steal; thou shalt not covet any thing that is thy neighbor's, &c. I had no idea of introducing the subject of morality into this House; but, as gentlemen have been pleased to introduce the subject, let us have the principle fairly settled. I do not say gentlemen who voted for and are in favor of war, have violated this rule; but I will say, I have not violated it by refusing to kill. This, sir, is the rule by which I expect my morality to be tested in the presence of an impartial Judge, by whose decisions we must all abide. While it is the passion of some to rule, of some to accumulate, and of others to shine, I hope the leading passion of my heart will be one which Heaven inspires, which reason rectifies, and which conscience approves; that of preventing all the evil and doing all the good of which my humble powers are capable.

In 1812, eleven millions were borrowed; in 1813, sixteen millions were borrowed at first, and afterwards seven and a half millions; in 1814, thirty millions is proposed to be raised by loans and Treasury notes. The estimates for 1814, are said to be $45,850,000. But can any gentleman in this House recollect that with an effective force of eighteen thousand men, our expenses have been forty millions of dollars, and say if our ranks are filled, and sixty-six thousand men raised, we can support such an army, and defray the expenses of the current year with sixty-six millions of dollars? Certainly not. But gentlemen call on us to support the war because it has now become popular, not the war of the Government but of the people. How do gentlemen prove this? Not by the elections for members of Congress, I presume. In New Hampshire three or four members voted for the war—all have been left out. In Massachusetts six or seven voted for the war, and all but one have been left out. In Vermont one voted against the war, who has been turned out by a general ticket, but is since chosen Governor of the State. In Rhode Island, Connecticut, and New York, few changes have taken place, as very few voted for the war. In the Middle States little or perhaps no change has been made. In Virginia, three gentlemen have been turned out for voting against the war, and two for voting for war. In North Carolina one has been turned out who voted for war. It does not appear from this statement, and I presume it is correct, that the war is very popular. Nor does it appear from the recruiting service. We began with a bounty of sixteen dollars, we have raised it to one hundred and twenty dollars, and our ranks are not filled; our regiments are many of them mere skeletons. The sixty-three regiments amounting to perhaps twenty-five thousand, sick and wounded inclusive. If applications for office prove the war popular, why then indeed it may be pronounced a very popular war. I presume we have ten or twelve thousand officers, and perhaps as many more applicants for office, and if we could form an army of officers and march immediately to Canada, I presume the province would soon be conquered if they could procure provisions.

A small majority are, perhaps, in favor of war. The citizens of the United States are strongly attached to a Republican Government; which certainly is the best form for a people who have virtue to enjoy and improve the blessings of liberty. This war was declared by those who call themselves Republicans, and who I hope are, but not exclusively Republicans, for we prefer a Republican Government. Many of the people, therefore, consider this a war for republican principles. They have been told, and no doubt honestly believe, the British contend for a right to impress native born Americans, and compel them to serve on board of their navy. Possessing, as they do, a high sense of liberty, and considering this a republican war clothed in the plausible dress of free trade and sailors' rights, perhaps a small majority would at this time vote for war. But strip this war for conquest of its borrowed plumage; let the people know that the King of England, although determined to adhere to his maritime system as a necessary measure when contending with the gigantic power of France, assisted, though perhaps reluctantly, by many of the powers of Europe, for the national existence of Great Britain, and what he (whether correctly or erroneously) considers the independence of the world, did, as early as 1806, give his cruisers instructions to respect the rights of American citizens, and gave the most positive assurance to the American Commissioners that prompt and immediate redress should be afforded on any representation of injury sustained by the Americans. Let them know that the Prince Regent, when the British and their allies are everywhere victorious, has proposed to appoint Commissioners to treat with us either at London or at Gottenburg, in Sweden, upon principles of perfect reciprocity, not inconsistent with the maxims of public law, and of the British maritime rights. That the President has acceded to the proposal, and has appointed five Envoys Extraordinary to repair to Gottenburg, and commence a negotiation for the adjustment of our differences. Let them know that this war has, with a force too small for successful offensive operations, already cost the United States (this year included) as much money as the whole Revolutionary debt at the adoption of the Federal Constitution. All which they ought to know, in order to decide correctly. And then ask them if they desire to prosecute this Quixotic war of conquest, at an expense of from fifty to seventy-five millions of dollars per annum, either to prove our ability to conquer Canada, or for the purpose of holding the inhabitants as hostages, or the country as a bond for the good behavior of the British Government in future; and, my life for it, the answer will be no. In examining the causes, progress, and effects of the war, and the motives for supporting or opposing a continuance of it, I have said but little respecting the conduct of the French, the American, or the British Governments, only as they were concerned in producing the present state of things. As to the French Government, or the Emperor of the French, I have uniformly detested his ambition and admired his talents, both as a politician and as a warrior, and I have been somewhat alarmed at his progress, though never disposed to change my course on that account. But discovering from his own acknowledgments that his plans are disconcerted, or, to use his own words, that all have turned against him; that Kings whom he had made have forsaken him; and his power appears to be broken, and the confederation of the Rhine dissolved; and that he appears convinced of his error, and disposed to be at peace, believing if he is reformed as well as convinced, he will be a great and good man—I had rather hear of his reformation than his overthrow. I hope France, confined within her natural boundaries, will remain a great and become a happy nation; and I am willing for them to enjoy the privilege I claim for myself, that is, of doing their own business in their own way; and if the Emperor Napoleon is the choice of the French people, I have no objection to his reigning over them.

MONDAY, February 14.

The Loan Bill.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing a loan for 1814.

Mr. HANSON addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: With difficulty I have been brought to participate in this discussion. Many days after the bill was reported, the intention had not entered my mind. By engaging in it I knew a burden would be imposed upon me, under the weight of which, a more vigorous mind and constitution than I possess might stagger. I shall, nevertheless, with as much calmness and temperance as the magnitude and character of the subject will admit of, examine it in all the relations embraced by the reflections I have been able to bestow upon it.

FEBRUARY, 1814.]

The Loan Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Personally convenient and necessary as I have found it to abstain, heretofore, from any active concern in the current business of the House, or, indeed, to afford my due proportion of aid in the more important proceedings that have occupied the attention of gentlemen, yet, on this occasion, it seems to be required of every member to be an actor in place of a looker-on. I am influenced by feelings more lively than a mere sense of obligation to my constituents, in lending a hearty opposition to the bill under consideration; or, if the gentleman who occupies the post of honor in the Foreign Committee (Mr. CALHOUN) prefers the expression, I will say a "systematic opposition." Such an opposition I shall be always prompt in affording to the bad acts conceived and executed by incompetent men.

After the exhibition of such commanding powers of elocution—such rare faculties of reasoning—by the honorable gentlemen who have preceded me, I confess it is with extreme difficulty that I have brought my mind to encounter the mortification of following at so great a distance behind them. I will follow them, longo intervallo, well pleased if I have the speed and vigor to keep even in sight of them. Though I cannot hope to approach, much less equal their uncommon efforts, I may be excused for an humble attempt to emulate their bright example.

But, sir, now that I have taken the floor, when I look before me, and survey the vast and boundless prospect which the subject presents, my mind is almost overpowered. I scarcely know where to begin, how to proceed, when to conclude; not that many topics of interest and magnitude do not remain untouched, through the considerate politeness of those who have preceded me; not that there is any dearth of reasons why the capacity should be withheld from those who evince a fixed determination to pursue a mad and ruinous career; nor that there are not still higher obligations than those imposed by a love of country, which command the patriot to break and diminish as he can the force of a blow aimed at her best interests—but it is setting one's self adrift upon the wide ocean; it is like hunting for arguments to prove an axiom—to assign reasons why this loan should not be granted—this war should be no longer persisted in. Could one plausible reason be assigned for its continuance, sufficient arguments might then be called for to demonstrate the propriety and necessity of its termination. Could encouragement be derived from the past, keeping alive hope for the future, to stimulate us on the one hand; on the other, more than a countervailing depression and despondency would be produced, by a calm contemplation of the wonderful revolution in the affairs of the world, since the fatal, ever-to-be-lamented hour when the Administration first had recourse to its "attitude and armor." Every consideration which can be suggested by minds devoted to the good of the country is arrayed against this bill. We have still much to lose, every thing to fear, nothing to hope, and as little to gain.

For a long series of time, this Administration has been pursuing a phantom—grasping at the shade of a shadow. At this hour they are no nearer their unattainable object than when they first started. Like the infatuated alchemist, they have persisted in their experiments until the very means of continuing them are well nigh exhausted, and without the most distant prospect of realizing their visionary expectations. It may truly be said, the sword was drawn against ourselves. Failing in the hopeless attempt to subdue Great Britain, we were disgraced, humbled, deprived of many valuable lives; the nation was loaded with immense debt; the public safety jeopardized, or made to rest upon the humiliating and precarious reliance of an enemy's forbearance; successful, the sword was sheathed in the bosom of our own country. England conquered, where should we have concealed ourselves from the searching eye of the fell destroyer—where found shelter from the tyrant's fury? Victorious, we were conquered, defeated, ruined. Such is the nature of the contest we are engaged in—a war without hope, carried on for objects unattainable.

Is any motive to be found for its continuance in its conduct, the events which have attended it, or what all must now join in believing will be its issue? With the same weak counsels; with the same incompetent men to direct our armies; with a divided, disheartened people; contending against a formidable nation, united to a man against us by what they conceive to be the justice of their cause; flushed by the success which has everywhere attended their arms, left without a rival on the globe;—what must be the consequence of adherence to feeble and desperate counsels? Released from her struggles on the Continent, let England pour her veterans into Canada, can we conquer that province? Let her resistless marine, no longer restrained by motives of humanity, lay waste our seaboard, where are our means of defence? Already has army after army been driven out of Canada, captured or slaughtered. Loan after loan has been negotiated and wasted, and without our rulers condescending to tell the people the causes of these disgraceful failures; but, when called by a solemn vote of this House to make known the causes, referring us to a mass of unmeaning documents, from which nothing is to be extracted but evidence of the incapacity and ignorance of all who have helped to swell the volume of trash; declaring it would be unsafe to trust the people's Representatives with a knowledge of the actual state of our army; refusing to tell, or unable to say, what has been the cost of the war, or how the supplies already granted have been applied; keeping the people in the most agonizing suspense and painful ignorance of the state of the nation. And yet we are called on to unite in a vigorous prosecution of this war! My moral sense, sir, revolts at the invitation. Neither threats, denunciation, nor entreaty, can force or seduce me to plant a poniard in the breast of my country, already bleeding and languishing under so many wounds.

I am already admonished, sir, to prescribe limits to the range of debate I find myself gliding into. I proceed, at once, to examine the budget before the House. It is with some diffidence I enter upon an examination of the estimates submitted by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. That branch of the debate I was content to have confined to the two honorable gentlemen (Mr. PITKIN and Mr. SHEFFEY) who preceded me. I must, however, endeavor to supply some striking omissions in their luminous exposition of the public finances and resources. The prominent and great defect which runs through the exposition of the honorable chairman of the Committee of Finance is so important that I must claim the indulgence of the House while I attempt to explain it. Though the House has been amused by fanciful, fallacious, and exaggerated estimates, to show the capacity of the people to lend, it has failed to elucidate the ability of the Government to borrow. That ability depends upon the disposition of the people to invest money in the public stock. To produce that disposition, their interest must be consulted. It must be made their interest to lend, by furnishing sufficient Government securities, providing indemnity against loss. If a permanent, efficient fund is created, coextensive and coeval with the public debt, and that fund pledged for the payment of the interest, the capitalist may then see his interest in becoming a public creditor. You then create the ability to borrow, by producing a corresponding disposition to lend, which, in finance, are convertible. But if, from a fear of losing popularity by resorting to an odious system of taxation, you fail to provide a permanent revenue, adequate to the punctual payment of the interest, and looking to the gradual extinction of the principal of the debt to be created, the public credit must suffer, and the moneyed men will find it to their interest not to aid the loan. I have too much respect for the understanding of the House to enlarge upon this topic.

After a fair and deliberate examination, I pronounce the system of ways and means, submitted to the House, deceptive and disingenuous. These are strong and harsh terms, but I speak in the language of the distinguished gentleman who now presides in this House with so much ability, dignity, and impartiality. I speak the language of the late Committee of Finance, and of this House, who adopted the memorable report of that committee, which denounced and reprobated in the strongest terms the very system now recommended. I speak the language of every financier and political economist, whose opinions are respected in free and well-regulated Governments, when

I say it is ruinous and destructive of public credit to enter upon a system of loans without providing the ways and means commensurate with the demands of Government; without creating and pledging a fund securing the public creditors in the punctual payment of the interest, and ultimate reimbursement of the principal of the public debt. It is a maxim in finance—a fundamental principle of public credit—never to borrow without providing the means of paying the interest, and finally extinguishing the principal. To act upon a different system—to rely upon loans to pay the interest of loans—is to adopt a most desperate system of fiscal gambling; sapping the foundation of public credit, and conducting to national bankruptcy. Well versed in finance, the predecessor of the present chairman of that committee could not be induced to sanction, much less recommend, a system of ways and means founded in a studied concealment of the public finances, and not built upon the substantial resources of the country. Disdaining to act upon a system of temporary expedients, to preserve the people's favor at the cost of the country's interest, he frankly communicated to the House the real state of the finances. He acknowledged the wants of the Government; he introduced a system of revenue to meet the public exigencies, and preserve the public credit. Gentlemen cannot so soon have forgotten the letter addressed by the Hon. Langdon Cheves to Mr. Gallatin. The reply of that Minister must also be fresh in their recollection. So direct and explicit was Mr. Gallatin's answer in regard to taxes, that many at the time supposed—I was fully persuaded—his object was to deter the Congress from declaring war, by holding up to their view a frightful picture of internal taxation—the inevitable consequence of war.

The present men in power have not only endangered the public credit by a violation of "all those principles held sacred by every country," but they have deliberately violated the public faith. The fact is demonstrable. The eight million sinking fund, pledged for the payment of the old public debt, has also been pledged for the payment of the eleven million loan, the sixteen million, the seven and a half million loan, and it is to be again pledged for the twenty-five million loan. The same sinking fund is also pledged for the redemption of the Treasury bills. These Treasury bills, by law, are made receivable at the custom-house for the imposts. These bills, possessing no intrinsic value—a mere artificial value, imparted to them by the fund pledged for their redemption—destroy the value of that very fund. The sinking fund is rendered valueless, and may ultimately, as far as it is derivable from commerce, consist merely in these bills, which are a legal tender for commercial duties. This position is so evident that it requires no illustration.

I must now be indulged with a few remarks upon the ability of the Government to borrow, or the capacity and disposition of the people to lend. It has been admitted by one gentleman that the loan would be filled. I entertain no such opinion. I believe it will fail. Unless a most exorbitant interest is given, it must fail. Nor is it certain that any premium will insure success.

The Eastern States, being free from blockade, have become the depot of most of the foreign articles imported into the United States, for the supply of the whole American continent. These articles, owing to the combined efforts of the public enemy and our own Government, cannot be paid for in the produce of the Southern and Middle States, and must be met by specie. If the coasting trade were not destroyed—if the trade of the several States with each other had to contend only against the public enemy, the debt thus accrued, in favor of the North, would have been discharged during the Winter months, by the bulky articles of Southern growth, easily transported by our coasting craft.

The President, in a manner not to be disregarded, recommended to Congress to stop this traffic. The mandate was obeyed; and specie alone must go to meet the demands of the merchants of New England. This causes such a pressure from the East, on the banks of the Middle and Southern States, as will deprive them of the means, if they have the disposition, to fill the loan. The accumulation of capital in the State of Massachusetts alone, enables that State, by pressing New York, to reach the extreme Southern end of the chain of banks. It cannot be concealed, or denied, that a very general alarm is felt for the critical situation of the banks, produced by an accumulation of capital to the North in the manner mentioned. The consequence is, that the whole circulating medium of the country is in danger. Sir, gentlemen seem not to be aware of the difficulties with which they are beset. I do not wish to ruffle their serenity, by exciting apprehensions; but they should be prepared to encounter troubles which they have hitherto been strangers to. They should be prepared for an explosion, the noise of which may not reach their ears in time for their retreat. The very foundations of the Government tremble beneath it. The ground on which Ministers stand is hourly washing from under their feet. Let them fail in their loan, and they are undone. They have no excuse for not providing the ways and means called for by the public exigencies, but the fear of offending the people, and yet the popularity of the war is the favorite theme of its authors. A crisis has arrived in the finances of the Government, which, unless promptly and vigorously met by efficient measures, will bring on certain ruin. The credit of the Government once destroyed, cannot be easily reinstated. It must be destroyed if this system is pursued.

Mr. Chairman, upon this question of impressment, allegiance, protection, and retaliation, which has been connected with it, gentlemen here may fret, rail, and argue, until doomsday. They may set up new-fangled doctrines, unknown to public law, and deny old and established principles, but as far as depends upon the opinions of the ablest jurists, and the practice of the oldest regular Governments, the point in controversy is long ago settled. It is immutably determined. It is inherent in the very nature of society and Government. If it were otherwise, every political society would contain the seeds of its own dissolution and destruction, instead of the great inherent principle of perpetuity and power. Sir, we have no right to the service of the subjects of a foreign Prince. We can, if we choose, and have the power, protect them against the superior claim of their native country—we may declare a war for such an object, but we derive no such right from social regulations or the public law of nations.

It is a fundamental maxim of the common law of England, which, I believe, we have no power to repeal, or just pretension to render nugatory in its operation, "that natural allegiance is perpetual, and cannot be affected by time, place, or circumstances, nor can it be changed by swearing allegiance to another Sovereign—the subject may to be sure by such means entangle himself, but he cannot unloosen the bands which connect him with his native country."—[See Blackstone's Commentaries.]

Availing themselves of the indulgence of pursuing their happiness in whatever climes their fortunes may lead them, if they form engagements with another Government inconsistent with their prior and permanent obligations to their native country, it is an act done in their own wrong. They enter into a contract from its nature void, ab initio, because it requires two parties, both able, to make a valid contract. In the case mentioned one of the parties to the contract of naturalization was disabled from contracting. If the foreigner, owing original and permanent allegiance to his native country, from which he has no power to absolve himself, except by her consent, express or implied, engages to perform opposite and irreconcilable duties, he alone is to blame for the difficulties in which he may find himself involved. This I conceive a full answer to every thing alleged of the hardship of naturalized citizens being forced to perform conflicting duties. Is it said naturalized citizens may be forced to bear arms against their native country, and therefore are entitled to protection from their adopted country, as native citizens are within, and without our territorial jurisdiction? They were not forced to abjure allegiance to their Government. The fault is their own, if they have "entangled themselves" by an act done in their own wrong.

Mr. Chairman, when we look for a moment at the present situation of our country, and contrast it with the power, resources, prosperity, and fortunes of England, it ought to bring gentlemen to a pause. They should determine at once to travel no further in the road to ruin, and to retrace their steps. I repeat, we have nothing to hope, every thing to apprehend, from a continuance of this unequal ruinous contest. It must be abandoned, or its authors will be driven headlong from power by the people.

How much better for the honor and fame of our rulers, for the glory and prosperity of the nation, would it have been, had their principles permitted them to pursue the counterpart of the memorable, never-to-be-forgotten example of the Crown Prince of Sweden. The name of this illustrious warrior and statesman was introduced in debate by an honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON.) He named a prince, sir, second only to "Alexander the Deliverer," in the glory of saving a world from bondage; a prince, bound by no natural ties to the people whom he governed; raised to that Government by the hand of Bonaparte himself, yet declaring, that a sense of honor, gratitude to a people who had received him into their bosom, and a determination to maintain their rights against foreign encroachment, compelled him to resent the insolence and resist the violence of France. Bernadotte would not tolerate the insolence of an upstart French Minister, who assumed towards him the tone and port of a Roman Proconsul, talking to his slaves. He, too, was by turns wheedled, flattered, deplored, and threatened. No arts or menaces were unessayed to draw or force him into the French Confederacy; but he preserved his integrity, he maintained his independence and honor. He did not cringe, and bow, and coax, and in the spirit of meanness, "like a reptile crawling on the belly," entreat the tyrant's insolent Minister to take back his insults—or, only to erase from the records of his mission the evidence that they were given. He did not send a favorite right-hand Cabinet counsellor from Stockholm to Gottenburg, to persuade a French Minister to recall or modify his abuse. He did not pick a quarrel with a British Minister, and dismiss him to propitiate the tyrant, and soothe the anger of his irritated Minister. No, sir, this detestable Crown Prince, now so odious in the estimation of the present republicans; this "traitor" disdained to truckle to a tyrant. He would have cut off his right arm—he would have laid his head upon the block and bled, as every man of true courage and honor would have done, in preference to such a dastardly sacrifice of honor; in preference to such high treason against all that adorns, and exalts, and dignifies, individual and national character. No, sir, "Bonaparte's Sergeant," as he is now contemptuously denominated, because he too would not be tied to the imperial cart-tail, and consider it a distinction to be dragged through the same mire and thorns that have so beslimed and wounded this people, appealed to the sword, and maintained his own honor, and the independence and glory of Sweden. No bribes, nor menaces, nor temptations, could compel or seduce him to adopt that fatal system of the Destroyer, which was the commencement of our suffering, and is the continuance of our degradation.

Mr. Chairman, how much more solemn and impressive are the considerations which should have found their way to the bosoms of men, elevated to the highest offices in the gift of a free people, by the fair exercise of their elective franchise. The Prince Royal was a stranger, placed to rule over a people to whom he was bound by none of the tender ties of country, yet he set an example of fidelity and attachment to the Swedish cause, to the great cause of humanity, for a parallel to which we may look, but look in vain, into the policy and measures of our rulers. We must turn our eyes to the vassal States of Europe, if we search for examples that have been followed here.

Mr. INGERSOLL spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, this appears to be the saturnalia of legislation; when the servants of the people, laying aside the performance of the duties assigned to them, together with all regard to business for the time being, take an annual occasion of entertaining themselves in saying just what each one thinks proper of persons in authority. The state of all the nations with which the United States have any connection, is brought into discussion in a debate on the state of the Union, according to the indefinite views of which so inexhaustible a subject is susceptible. I beg leave, sir, to avail myself of the privilege which I presume I may claim, in common with all others, to present such considerations to notice as have suggested themselves to my mind. Though I may not approve of the custom of unlimited debate, it is not for me to oppose it; and I flatter myself with at least the indulgence of the committee, however I may trespass on their patience.

As it is but turning up the mere surface of our commercial embarrassments to begin with the Berlin and Milan decrees, and the contemporaneous British orders, with which gentlemen preceding me have bounded their inquiries, I shall make no excuse for rather a deeper exploration into the recesses of maritime aggrandizement and national hostility; referable, as they are, to these inherent pronenesses to ambition and control that are at the bottom of all human actions. I beseech the committee, however, not to take alarm at this declaration. Though it is impossible to understand the subject without striking at any rate beyond the dates of our recent foreign annoyances, yet I have no design of wearying their attention with any disquisition at length into this diversified controversy. Even the extraordinary latitude which practice affords to our debates would be insufficient for such an undertaking. I shall, therefore, limit myself to the selection of certain prominent and memorable points of observation, and endeavor to make them answer all the purposes of exhibiting an outline, which every mind will be able to fill up as I proceed.

The position most natural, as well as most

The Loan Bill.

[H. OF R.]

necessary to begin from, is, that according to the ancient, the uniform, and the legitimate law of nations, to be collected from treaties, from established usages, and from international convenience; according to the law of nature, applied to nations, which constitutes the law of nations—free ships make free goods. From an invasion of this reasonable and settled principle have proceeded most of the difficulties we are now contending with. I am not to be understood as breaking ground with an assertion that this country is bound to maintain in arms against Great Britain the abstract principle that free ships make free goods. Not at all. But I do mean to say that such is the ancient and recognized law of nations, and that, as a power, whose policy is to be generally neutral and always commercial, it is most clearly and emphatically the interest, as it is the right of the United States, to assert and adhere to this great safeguard for the integrity of their flag and foreign trade. I mean to say further, that the origin of our prevailing troubles is to be traced to infractions of this undeniable principle, interpolated by belligerent exigency on neutral immunities; and that the war we are now reluctantly waging, with all the odds of military and naval experience and capacity against us, is a struggle forced upon us by the aggravated consequences of original infringements of this rule. To support this ground, I shall first ask the attention of the committee for a few minutes to some of the principal features of the celebrated Treaty of Utrecht, which was concluded in the year 1718. It is not necessary for me to recall the circumstances under which that great leading international compact was adjusted. All the commercial and principal sovereignties of Europe were parties to it. All the points of maritime controversy then in existence were arranged by it. Its authenticity and authority are of the highest order. Its conditions are explicit beyond contradiction. Its construction of the law of nations is conformable to those bases which the experience, the usage, the reciprocal pretensions, and views of the various nations contributing to it, had laid down as the best foundation for maritime peace and national independence. In a word, sir, it is one of the most remarkable and solemn testimonials on record of the principles of public law and justice. Now, sir, by this important instrument, the point that free ships make free goods is ratified and promulgated in its broadest acceptance. But one century ago neither England nor any other nation of Europe felt a doubt upon the subject. The points of maritime contest, then, were limited to the question of search and blockade, both of which are fixed on conditions, which then were of universal influence. The rule of 1756, as a certain mischiefous and wholly unauthorized irregularity has been designated, is of much later birth. As its very title implies, it never appeared until forty years afterwards. The extravagant addenda to contraband, the monstrous presump-

tions of proclamation blockade, the various other enlargements of maritime wrongs which have since found victims and advocates in America, together with impressment, are all of very modern introduction, though commonly defended as parts of the ancient stock of British maritime rights. At the time of the Treaty of Utrecht, sir, England had not the naval ascendancy she now holds by the sole tenure of conquest and usurpation. She did not, at that period, give law to the seas, nor had her statesmen and merchants, her naval commanders and Crown, the motives they now cherish for establishing those naval impositions which are to drive all laws and usages of nations from the credit they have heretofore received, at the same time and by the same means that they usurp their places. Before Great Britain became the first navigating community, the Republic of Holland enjoyed more commerce than all the rest of Europe put together. After reclaiming their territories from the ocean, the inhabitants of Holland, without any other articles of export than a little cheese and crockery ware, spread a greater quantity of canvas on the sea than covered the commerce of all their competitors. But the policy of Holland, unlike that of England, was pacific and conciliatory. The Hollanders relied on their enterprise, their skill, and their credit, rather than their navies, for success; they became the genuine champions and examples of neutrality and justice. The commentators on the law of nations, Grotius, Bynkershoek and Hubner, are to this day what they have always been, the most respectable and authentic witnesses of the original provisions of that law. It is true, that Grotius's well-known treatise contains nothing particularly appropriate to the doctrine of maritime neutrality. But we are given to understand by Burigny, his biographer, that he did compose a work, which, though unfortunately lost, expressly asserted the rights of a prior state of neutrality against the subsequent emergencies of a state of war. It is to such sources, to this nation, to these authors, that we are to look, not to Great Britain, for the first great principles of international law.

But I shall not rest on the Treaty of Utrecht alone for the English avowal or acknowledgment of the principle, that free ships make free goods. I need not rest this on the ground of either concession or merely treaty law. It is a position not conceded by England, but asserted by her, and long since the date of that treaty, in the terms not to be disputed. The book, from which I am about to trouble the committee with the reading of some passages, will abundantly sustain this declaration. It is the seventh volume of Parliamentary Debates, and so conclusively pertinent to my purpose, that I hope the committee will excuse me for praying their attention to it. It will be recollected that, about the year 1787, Spain insisted on a right to stop, overhaul, and search British vessels, in order to ascertain whether they contained any articles contravening her interpretation of the Treaty of Seville. The relation then of England to Spain was very much what that of this country has since been to England. During three and twenty years did Spain persist in her seizures and condemnations of the ships of England on arbitrary and unfounded pretexes; and, during all that period, did England contain herself within the pale of unavailing expostulation and disregarded remonstrance. The language, however, of English remonstrance was much stronger than the American. It did not concede, even by implication, the right of search. It did not even tacitly acknowledge that free ships do not make free goods. On the contrary, England, so late as 1787, was first a sturdy beggar, and afterwards as powerful an advocate for British maritime rights as she has since been inexorable and outrageous in the perpetration of maritime wrongs.

But is there no additional cause for our hostilities? Has nothing been superinduced by the war itself, adding to its original inducements most unparalleled aggravation? Mr. Chairman, yes, an atrocity overlooked by our Government, familiarized to the minds of the people; but one, nevertheless, against which every cottage should be hung with mementoes, every parlor tapestried with remonstrances. I allude, sir, to the barbarian subornation by England of our Indian borders, whose savage thirst has been slaked in the blood of our women and children, under the direct encouragement of English agency. I mean to take some notice of this nefarious inhumanity. The Executive Government of this country, which is accused of so much unfounded hostility to Great Britain, has omitted in my humble opinion the most imposing and overwhelming complaints with which a nation ever was rebuked, by their silence on this subject. But I shall not follow the example of the Government; and shall make no apology for presenting this atrocity in its true colors. The British manifesto of the 9th January, 1813, which puts forth their justification in this war, states expressly that Mr. Foster had instruction to repudiate the foul charge of their employment of our Indians. Did he do so? Never. I am aware at least of no solemn protestation from that Minister against this imputation, this indelible, deadly blot on the annals of this nation. But supposing that he had, would that alter the fact? Should that disprove it? There was indeed a period when the drawing-room and the cabinet were hung with specious but most insidious trappings of amity; but even then the trans-Alleghanian wilderness was rustling with the preparation of the savage, licking his chops in ambush, and hankering for the promised repast. There was a time when we examined the powder, and the arms, the muskets, and weapons, that fell into our hands at the battle of the Wabash, in order to ascertain whether the ear-mark of England was upon them. There was a time when, if such signs were declared to exist, ten thousand voices and pens and prints rose up to contradict the ungenerous aspersions. But that time has passed away. The Englishman and the Indian, like the mastiff and the wolf, since then have always roamed abroad together; the one decorated with the collar and other indications of refinement, but without its heart; the other bounding in native ruthlessness; and kept each other's company scouring our forests, contending for their prey.

Nor is this a new outrage, though never so substantiated as now. In his celebrated speech on the British Treaty, Mr. Ames admits that the unauthorized agents of England might be expected to stir up our Indians, though he denies that the English Government participated in this excitement. But what was General Washington's impression of the Indian war which carried Harmer, and St. Clair, and Wayne, into the field? General Washington, sir, was satisfied that Colonel Beckwith, the formal British agent, who preceded Mr. Hammond's mission to America—that this agent had fomented the fury of the Indians. He directed the Secretary of State to remonstrate with Beckwith concerning it. And what did he offer in his excuse? After some prevarication, he acknowledged his own interference in that way, though he denied that he had acted by Lord Dorchester's authority, and asserted that the step was merely his own. So long ago as 1792, was this iniquity in preparation. Within the last two years, every disguise has been thrown off, and it stands forward before the world in all its horrid incarnation of avowal. Before General Hull's capitulation, the first blow that was struck in the present hostilities came from the Indians deep in the Northwest, against the post of Mackinaw. And what was that unhappy man's extenuation of his surrender? That the savages were swarming for his destruction; pouring down upon his army from the West and the North, and hastening to their annihilation. Where has the battle been fought since, in which the English have not owed their success, wherever they have had it, to their Indian allies? Where has a British regiment or a British soldier met an American fairly face to face, and staked the issue on the valor of Britons and Americans alone? In every instance the terror of the tomahawk has been their strongest, their only protection, their buckler and their sword. At Detroit, at Raisin, at Queenstown, everywhere their allies have been their saviours. Not a single general order has appeared from Prevost, from Brock, from Proctor, or from Vincent, in which these wretches have not been officially thanked for their material assistance. The British armies have traversed Canada with hordes of Indians for their wings, like ravens, like vultures of the desert, whose ominous flight portends death, and who banquet on the victims of their massacre. And is this lawful, or accustomed warfare? Will self-defence justify, should invasion provoke, or will any thing atone for this? Is it lawful to poison your wells or arrows, though your territory be overrun by an enemy? No, sir, no. Nothing can excuse or extenuate such barbarities. Nor is excuse or extenuation sought for. They are referred to the detestable expediency of Lord Suffolk in 1777, whose rebuke by Lord Chatham we all remember, for his impious declaration, that England had a right to employ the Indians against the Americans, as means (to use his own infernal language) which God and nature placed at their command.

The Loan Bill.

Such being the causes of this war, let us next inquire, what are the events that have succeeded its declaration, which should drive us to abandon it? It has been disastrous, say its antagonists. It has so. I must confess it has had to struggle with unexpected difficulties, and unaccountable reverses. But is it therefore we should give it up? Remember the price paid for the privilege of declaring it. Call to mind the members of that illustrious Congress, who during the Revolution were often obliged to fly, like conspirators, by night, from their beds, to places of safety. From Philadelphia to Baltimore, to Lancaster, to York, to Trenton. Did they yield to the current of disaster? If they had, sir, our independence never would have been achieved. The years of the Revolution dragged on in delay, defeat, trial, and difficulty. With all its glorious circumstances, what was the battle of Bunker Hill? An overthrow. The invasion of Canada under Montgomery and Arnold; the affairs on Long Island; the capture of Fort Washington; the rout at Brandywine; the defeat at Germantown; the partial success at Monmouth; the predatory and wasting excursions into Connecticut and Virginia; the contest in the South, of which we have lately so well drawn a picture by one of the principal performers on that theatre: what was it but a succession of total failures or transient triumphs? The man whose memory is now the resting place of a nation's benefactions, for whose particular association the two parties of this country contend like the Greek cities for the birthplace of Homer, was then, almost as much as your present Generals, the object of American contempt and malediction. His army was wasting in sickness and inactivity; his fortresses were taken from him; his plans were frustrated; his troops were beaten. Yes, Mr. Chairman, there are venerable men of the delegation here, of which I am an unworthy member, who recollect these things; who have told me that in 1776 not a town, nor a village, nor a passenger on the road between Philadelphia and New York, but was full of complaints against WASHINGTON himself, clamorous with despondency of the cause he was engaged in. Let us imitate the example of his constancy, not their despair. Let us never forget for a moment that the character of our population, the structure of our Government, our experience in war, our long repose in peace, do not justify the expectation of never-failing victory over a nation injured to arms and vast in capacity of annoyance. Like our forefathers of the Revolution let us make the least of defeat, and the most of success. Like them let us nerve our councils to bear the reverses of our arms, and like them we shall finally be triumphant.

But this wanton and disastrous war is also partial in its pressure. What an objection to come from Massachusetts to Virginia! What an objection, while any of the patriots of the Revolution survive! I mention it but to say that if Virginia had made such an objection to Massachusetts in 1775, we should not now have been an independent nation. It is, however, unfounded in fact. The pressure is felt more severely in Virginia, Maryland, North Carolina, and Louisiana, than in any section whatever of the Eastern States.

The war is moreover unpopular! In spite of the majorities in this House, the majorities of suffrages all over the country, the people are opposed to the war! Majority, then, is not an evidence of popularity. No. It proves only the coherence of party. If this war were popular it would be successful in Canada! If so, Pompey's was the unpopular side, when he fought at Pharsalia with all the hopes of Roman republicanism under his standard, against Cæsar and his invading regulars from Gaul. Caractacus was unpopular when he fell before the legions of Claudius Cæsar. The ravage of the Palatinate by Louis XIV. is ascribable to his popularity there. In short, all England's efforts during the last twenty years have been unpopular while sustained in self-defence; all Bonaparte's foreign conquests completely unpopular; nor has the war become popular with the French nation until brought home to their frontiers and breaking in upon their firesides! The idea is preposterous.

The allusion I have just made to the altered state of Europe within the last few months, will justify me, I hope, in asking the committee's attention for a very few minutes to that subject. It abounds with interest, with instruction, with advantage to us. Russia, the power with whom we have never had a difference, whose maritime views and interests are precisely our own, has finally proved victorious over France. Sweden, another Northern power, another advocate for the freedom of the seas, whose Crown Prince, like his great competitor on the French throne, is legitimated by talents beyond the divinest rights of kings, Sweden partakes with Russia of all her victories. Austria is to become a navigating nation by means of the ports she is to acquire on the Adriatic. Spain revives to greatness, without her colonies, or Inquisition; and in estimating the benefits of these emancipations, it is difficult to say which is the most to be desired, that from her colonies or that from her Inquisition. Italy is to be restored, probably without a Pope, in whose destitution she will be liberated from an odious combination of Christianity with temporal intrigue. Holland resumes the trade and the naval prowess which so long contested the balance with England; that trade which was freighted from every latitude ; that navy which was the last to oppose itself successfully against the fleets of England : I refer to the battle of the Dogger Bank in 1787, when the Dutch Admiral Kingsberry defeated Admiral Parker. France, within the limits of the Rhine, the Pyrenees, and the Alps, remains great, without continuing to be too much so. In all these amazing restorations, there is, however, one country on the continent whose omission I shall be pardoned for adverting to, to deplore it. I mean Poland—a country which afforded us many gallant auxiliaries in the war of our Revolution ; a country which, though its modern history is not much known in America, is more fertile of noble examples of the most heroic patriotism, and more instructive in great lessons of Republican integrity, than any other that exists. Within the last sixty years Poland, the only surviving Republic in the world except our own, has evinced, in innumerable illustrious instances, more of that immortal spirit which mankind admire in Greece and Rome, than the transactions of any other modern nation can afford. Barbarously subdued and mutilated as this remnant of the stock of European Republicanism has been by the despots surrounding them, I must confess, that there was something grateful even in the promise held out to them by the French Emperor, that their independence should be one of the fruits of his success. In the tempest of this man's career, such corruscations shed a splendor on the general gloom. In the abject state of Poland, even the promise of freedom is a beam of hope. I do not say that this promise would ever have been redeemed. But I know of no spectacle in our age more august, more imposing than the Polish Diet which sat on the 1st July, 1812, under the old Count Oztartozinski, as the French were advancing into Russia, when the prospect of liberty was once more lighted up before the Poles. If Spain and Holland have our commiseration, so should Poland. If Spain and Holland are restored to themselves, so should Poland be restored. I know of no sympathy for the one to which the other is not at least equally entitled.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, may a balance of power be really established in Europe. The iron crown of Lombardy has been melted in the flames of Moscow. The most terrific ornaments in the French imperial diadem have been plucked away and scattered aside at the battles of Borodino and of Leipsic. Mankind find their security at last in the infatuation of those who rule them. The restlessness of ambition betrays and overturns it. But shall we not flatter ourselves that the limits of naval usurpation are soon to be marked, as well as those of the subjugation of the land ? May we not hail the fall of universal France as the precursor to the fall of universal England ? The moment is auspicious to such a consummation. The indications are abundant of its approach. Proximus Ualegon : Great Britain goes next. In vain will the French be confined within their natural bounds, the Rhine, the Pyrenees, and the Alps, unless the English are limited to some retrenchment of their formidable maritime dominion. There can be no true balance of power when England wields the undisputed, the only sceptre of the seas. Europe feels this conviction, sir, and no doubt the same ardent and concerted resistance which has triumphed over despotism on the Continent will turn its efforts next against despotism on the ocean. The floating pediment of England's naval footstool is already troubled under her. Like France she is hastening her fate by her own encroachments. Like France she will find it on the soil of Spain. It is impossible that England can maintain at one and the same time the first navies and first armies in the world. Lord Wellington's splendid career is rapidly undermining the best springs of British naval enterprise. The army of England will prove itself the conqueror of the navy. The invasion of Spain checked the career of French conquests. The battles of her own cause which England has fought in Spain, against the invasion of France, have sapped, I trust, the foundation of her naval ascendancy. Let us hope the trophies of Napoleon and Nelson may be interred together in the Spanish soil. What the army of England has begun, the navy of America shall complete. The little streams that have issued from the rock of American maritime spirit, shall swell till they turn the sanguinary and sordid tides of British naval glory. The world has witnessed the meeting of these waters ; one a flood of avarice, piracy, and blood ; the other a current of enterprise, integrity, and fortune : the world has seen them meet, and has pronounced upon the consequences. Let us hope, sir, that from all the astonishing visitations of the two last years a general and permanent peace will result. I am not of those American politicians who pray for war in Europe as the field of commerce for America. I am satisfied, on the contrary, that a general European peace will be infinitely beneficial to American foreign trade. The carrying States, those who have ships without cargoes, timberheads without freights, may perhaps suffer ; though I doubt even their suffering. But the exporting, the agricultural States, those who can afford superfluities of breadstuffs, of rice, of cotton, of wool, of hemp, of all the indefinite products of their various territories, will be large gainers by perpetual peace. Peace is the element of their prosperity, war of their decline.

WEDNESDAY, February 16.

The Loan Bill.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing a loan for the year 1814.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, of Kentucky, resumed the floor, and concluded, in about half an hour, the remarks he yesterday commenced in support of the bill. His remarks are given entire, as follows :

FEBRUARY, 1814.]

The Loan Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. Chairman: The bill under consideration proposes to authorize a loan to defray the expenses of the war, in the present year; it is as yet blank; but from the report of the Committee of Ways and Means it appears that the sum of twenty-five millions will be necessary to be raised in this way; and the blank is proposed to be filled with that sum. The question which naturally presents itself is, whether it is expedient thus to fill the blank and report the bill? This question would, at the first view, seem to limit the discussion to a narrow compass; but it has been decided, and seems to be understood, that it is in order on this bill, to take a full view of our political transactions and condition in all their various relations.

I do not propose to enter into so wide a range of discussion as some others who have preceded me; but I have thought it might not be amiss to indulge in some remarks on the question whether we had just cause of war against Great Britain.

Sir, it appears to me that this nation has just cause of war, upon two grounds: 1st. For reparation of her captures and condemnations under her Orders in Council. 2d. For the impressment of seamen on board our merchant vessels. Perhaps it would be more correct to say, two distinct causes of war.

With respect to the first, I will say but little. It does seem to me quite clear, that if her Orders in Council were not authorized by those principles of reason and justice which civilized nations profess to be governed by, under the name of national law, that she is bound to compensate our citizens for all losses sustained under the operation of those orders. I do not hesitate to say, sir, that those orders cannot be justified by any principle of national law; and her rescinding of them amounts to something like an acknowledgment to that effect. I will not now dwell on this point.

I will now proceed to consider the question of the right of the British to impress her seamen on board our merchantmen, with a view to show that she possesses no such right, and that the practice affords to this nation just cause of war.

The fact of impressment is admitted on all hands; and, indeed, it is admitted that many, very many, of our own native born and naturalized sailors, have been impressed under color of impressing British sailors; the injury to our merchants is evident, and in many instances, great. The fact and the injury being clear, it seems unquestionably to devolve upon those who justify Great Britain, to show upon what principle of national law she is justified. Those who oppose her pretensions, might well rest upon the fact and the injury. But I will not stop here; I will endeavor to show that the practice is wholly illegal as well in relation to the law of England as the law of nations.

By the great charter of English liberty, it is provided, that no freeman shall be imprisoned, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land. This may be considered as a fundamental principle of the Government, and not to be altered but by the Parliament. A plain legal deduction from this principle is, that so long as it remains in force, every impressment, by mere Executive authority, is a trespass and false imprisonment. I would not be understood to contend, that it is the duty or right of this nation to intermeddle with the municipal laws of England, so long as they are confined in their operation to English soil or English ships; let them impress within their own soil, and on board their own vessels, to any extent which the King and the naval officers may deem proper; it is an affair between the King and those impressed, with which we have no concern; but when they choose to make our merchant vessels, on the high seas, the theatres of Executive trespasses and violence, the case is changed; when the contracts which their sailors have made with our merchants are, by force, violated, and our vessels deprived of the competent number of hands, and left to drift to and fro on the wide ocean, it becomes us to inquire by what authority this is done. But, perhaps it may be thought our merchants err in employing British sailors. To this I answer, that British laws permit her sailors to go abroad; they can enter into contracts with their merchants for a term of service, which may expire in a foreign country; our traders and navigators may innocently hire them, and when they have thus hired them and made the success of a voyage, ship, cargo, and profit, dependent upon their services, it does appear to me to be most flagrantly oppressive and unjust, on the part of the British Executive, to interpose and forcibly wrest, from on board our vessels thus circumstanced, even British sailors. I know it may be said, that the practice of impressment is part of the law of England, and long usage on the part of the Executive branch of the Government, and some adjudged cases may be adduced, to give some countenance to the doctrine; but I rest upon the great charter, and I apprehend no Englishman would feel willing to admit that its provisions could be changed by the King or the courts of justice. The practice of impressment, then, I conclude is not warranted by the law of England; it is a trespass and false impressment in relation to the English sailor, and when committed on board an American ship, a most wanton outrage, involving consequences which it behooves this nation to guard against.

Is the practice of impressing, a belligerent right, upon the principles of international law? I answer that it is not. According to Vattel, the right of seizing for carrying goods contraband of war; the right of seizing for being about to enter a port actually blockaded by a competent force; and the right of searching for and seizing enemies' goods, constitute the sum total of belligerent rights, in opposition to the freedom of the high seas to neutrals. These are so many exceptions to the great principle of the freedom of navigating the high seas, and all that have been acknowledged by the nations of Europe.

But, sir, it is not only contended here that the British Government have a right to impress sailors who have made temporary engagements with our merchants; but that they have even a right to impress those who have been naturalized according to our constitution and laws upon the subject of naturalization. This position is founded upon the British common law doctrine of perpetual allegiance, and the vague plea of its being necessary on the part of Britain to preserve her national existence. I will here take the liberty of answering those arguments. In the first place, the doctrine of perpetual allegiance is a mere municipal law, not binding on the Government of any other country; and I believe I cannot be corrected when I say it is not the law of any nation except Great Britain and France; and still less am I in fear of being corrected, when I say it is not a principle of national law. The contrary is laid down in Vattel, in Puffendorf, and in Burlamaqui, and various other writers on the subject of international law.

This doctrine of perpetual allegiance is moreover not warranted by reason or propriety. It is said to attach at the time of birth, and to depend upon it. What is there in the birth of man which can bind him by the tie of perpetual allegiance to the Government of the place where he is born? To my mind, it appears to be a mere accidental circumstance, in which the will of the individual is not concerned, and which of itself can be the basis of no obligation. Feeding, clothing, &c., certainly forms a strong basis for parental gratitude, and lays the child under obligation to make a suitable return to the parent in the same way, if necessary; but this seems to me to be an affair between the parent and child. What is done by the Government for the individual in his childhood, to lay him under such a perpetual obligation? I can conceive of no act. It is true the Government abstains from taking his life when the physical power of so doing was in it; but I cannot conceive that this can be any rational foundation for the obligation of allegiance; as well might I tell you, sir, that you were under a perpetual obligation of gratitude to me, because, having the power of assassinating you, I had failed to do it.

I will now come to the question presenting itself more directly by the bill under consideration. This bill proposes to authorize a loan, the object of which is to procure money to defray the expenses of the war. We have passed sundry bills with a view to the prosecution of the war, which are all dependent, as to their efficacy, upon this; all of which will be entirely useless without this. This is necessary to add sinews and give motion to the whole machinery. Is it not expedient to pass it? I hold that it is. In reflecting upon this subject, I have concluded in my mind, that it is always expedient, when a nation is engaged in a state of war with a strong power—with a power capable of taking advantage of its errors and endangering its rights—to prepare amply and prosecute the war vigorously, without reference to the original cause of the war. I would pursue this course, sir, because I would be unwilling to put to hazard any of the unquestionable rights of the nation, by a feeble and inefficient course of warfare; because, sir, I would rather the nation to which I belong would have it in its power to dictate the terms of pacification than to be dictated to. I am not willing to admit, that as an individual, there are not many acts of injustice which I would rather suffer than do; in which I would rather be acted upon, than be the actor; but, sir, I will frankly declare, that I would rather take upon myself the proper dividend of almost any act of injustice to a foreign nation, than my portion of the disgrace that might be consequent upon a war feebly and inefficiently prosecuted. The nation against which we are making war is a strong nation; of this we have ample evidence; very recently by her prowess, and through the means of her financial resources, the gigantic power of Bonaparte has been broken and dissipated in Spain and Portugal; she has been the very soul, the animating principle, and given sinews to that formidable league on continental Europe, which has defeated and driven the Emperor of France within the limits of his own empire. Have we then nothing to fear from her enterprises upon the supposition of remissness or negligence on our part? I apprehend we have. We present to her enterprises a frontier of about four thousand miles, vulnerable to her and her red allies at many points; already has she seized and held for more than a year one of our territories; it is still vulnerable; one of our States is feeble in population, and in a manner severed from the rest of the nation. If we are remiss, will she not have it in her power to seize upon some weak point and hold it, demanding as the price of restitution some commercial sacrifice not before brought into view? She may tell you, we will not yield this advantage without an equivalent; this equivalent may be some restriction on your commerce; or it may be the entire use of the lakes, with barrier towns on this side to secure that object, or both. Have we any pledge that our enemy will not have the disposition to make the most of any successes consequent upon our negligence? The history of her usurpations, exactions, and bloodshed in India, will answer the question; and the affair of Copenhagen will guarantee that answer.

Sir, the history of all nations and ages will admonish us against remissness or negligence in the conduct of a war. I will cite one or two examples. The history of the origin, progress, and termination of the second Punic war, between Carthage and Rome, exhibits to us an awful warning against any the least remissness. The ostensible origin of that war was the territorial limits of the two nations in Spain. Rome admonished the Carthaginians against crossing the river Iberus, and against molesting the people of Saguntum, her ally; she was probably right in so doing; she claimed not any thing of Carthage in Africa. The Carthaginians regarded not her admonition; a large, well-disciplined army under Hannibal, the general of Carthage, the greatest warrior of the age, commenced its march for the invasion and subjugation of Rome; this army crossed the Pyrenees, traversed the length of Gaul, crossed over the Alps, and fell down upon Italy; several great battles were fought, in which the arms of Carthage prevailed; and by the great victory of the Carthaginians at Cannæ, the power of Rome seemed to be almost annihilated; it seemed to be limited to the walls of the city. Here was an important crisis in this war; immediately after this victory the Republic of Carthage ought to have amply and promptly supplied their general with fresh troops and money. Carthage was remiss; the consequence was, that the power of Rome revived; and finally, the fate of Carthage was settled on the plains of Zama. She was compelled to sue for peace; she lost her possessions in Spain; she yielded Rome tribute, and was ignominiously restricted in her navy and commerce. Now, sir, although I do not indulge a fear that it will be as bad with us as with Carthage, yet I cannot but fear, that through negligence, we may lose much; that we may be compelled to submit to terms disgraceful in themselves; and as I would, as a Carthaginian, have regretted the lack of the means which, in all probability, would have led to the subjugation of Rome, in preference to the losses and degradation of my own country, without reference to the cause of the war; so, as an American, I would regret that we should sustain any losses, or be compelled to submit to degrading terms; and I would the more regret it, if it should seem to be the consequence of negligence. I would prefer that we could dictate the terms of peace, rather than be dictated to, without any reference to the cause of the war.

The Loan Bill.

A strong example, sir, to show how unreasonably nations at war will rise in their terms with success, is exhibited in the celebrated war in Europe for the succession to the Spanish throne. In that war, Louis XIV., with the greater part of the Spanish nation, was arrayed on the one side, contending for the right of a Bourbon to the throne; on the other, the Emperor of Austria, the United Provinces of Holland, and England, contending in favor of a descendant from the House of Hapsburg. In the progress of the war, Louis was so hardly pressed that he offered, in order to secure his own dominions, to withdraw his forces from aiding his connection; but so much were the allies elated with their success, that this would not satisfy them; they demanded that he should turn his arms against the competitor of the Bourbon family, his grandson. He refused this, and the result was such as it ought to have been. I am decidedly of opinion, that it is expedient to authorize the loan. The honor, interest, and safety of this nation, I believe, require it.

There has been much said on the subject of parties in a Republic; we have been eloquently admonished against the evil effects of party spirit in a minority. Sir, my opinion is, that the exertions of a minority may be productive of evil consequences, when steadily pursued as an embodied party; such exertions may encourage a foreign enemy to persevere in a course of hostile policy, and may have the effect of driving the majority into a crooked, wavering, and feeble course of policy. But whilst I admit the dangers and evils to be apprehended on the one side, I will not be forgetful that there are dangers on the other. Fearless, then, of the frowns of any party, I declare to you that I believe, that whenever the liberties of this nation are destroyed, it will be done by a majority. Party spirit seems to me to be growing apace in this country; and the arts of obtaining and perpetuating party power are fast developing themselves; to what consequences they will lead, I cannot say with certainty. But really, sir, I cannot but indulge in fears that I will live to see the day when every thing of rational liberty will be annihilated by some majority; when all the honors and emoluments of the nation will be disposed of, at the whim and caprice of three, four, or five of the leaders of the majority: and all these things will be managed with the forms and in the name of liberty, under the warmest professions of attachment to the public weal. I cannot fix upon any precise time for the happening of this event; but I believe I can give you many of the signs; and when all the signs are seen by men of discernment, they will verily know that the event has come to pass. When this event happens, there will be dispersed through this nation a host of hireling editors of newspapers, busily engaged in puffing their employers, and moulding and fashioning public sentiment by deception to suit their views. When this event happens, this country will swarm with little demagogues, whose appropriate business will be to sound the praise of their leaders, and misguide public sentiment; playing, at the same time, the part of sycophants to their leaders, and the deceivers of the people; looking for their reward, and willing to be sent here and wire-worked by the great political jugglers in the way which may best suit their purposes. In those days, every sentiment deemed important by the leaders will be made a test, an article of political orthodoxy, and all who will not assent will be considered as heretics: it will not be enough that a man is attached to the constitution of his country, and that he has acquired a character for integrity and good sense—he must praise his leaders—his sentiments must be in perfect accordance upon all points. Then will be heard denunciations against all who have not precisely pursued the course marked out; made for the purpose of whipping in the timid and crushing the firm. When this crisis arrives, this hall, which ought through all time be the great watch-tower of liberty—from which the language of the patriot might be heard in the voice of warning; and from which the rays of political truth might be shed abroad by open, fair, and manly discussion, will on favorite occasions be silent as death: by the use of the previous question, and upon the ready plea of the necessity of despatching business, discussion will be silenced; and this hall present to the eye a college of silent recorders. Then will the rights of all who have independence of mind to disapprove of the course of a party, however much it may merit it, consist of obedience to their will.

Whatever others may think, my judgment and feelings conspire and embolden me to say, that a majority may err. It was corrupt majorities, if my memory serves me correctly, that, by their intrigues with Philip of Macedon, paved the way for his subjugation of the Grecian Republics. The triumvirate of Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus, wielded a majority of the Roman Senate. Cromwell had his majority in the English Parliament—yes, sir, he had his entire Parliament. Robespierre had his majority in the French National Convention. Even Nero observed the forms of the Roman Republic, and had his majority in the Senate of Rome.

Mr. PEARSON addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The extent and variety of this discussion may, perhaps, tend to impair the real importance and intrinsic solemnity of the subject immediately presented to our consideration. It is, however, so intimately connected with the characteristic policy and avowed objects of the Administration, as to render their separation almost impracticable, and may well justify, if not positively demand, some inquiry into that policy and those objects. By the bill on your table, together with the issue of paper called Treasury notes, for five millions of dollars, it is proposed to obtain thirty millions of dollars on the credit of the Government, to be applied exclusively to the military and naval service of the current year; the whole receipts from taxes, and other sources of revenue, not amounting to more than the payment of interest on former loans, the stipulated reimbursement of part of the old debt, and expenses of the civil list. The first question which presents itself is this: Can the Administration borrow, on terms which they ought to accept, the immense sum now proposed? I profess not, sir, any peculiar skill in finance, and but a limited knowledge of the fiscal concerns of this country. I will, therefore, not hazard a positive opinion as to the practicability of obtaining the proposed loan, though I have no hesitation in believing that it will not be obtained with the facility imagined by some gentlemen, and that the practical resources of the country, in its present situation, have been greatly overrated.

Already has the Government borrowed within the last two years near forty millions of dollars, most of which has been obtained from the banks, and from individuals who make the banks the instruments of enabling them to comply with their engagements. The fair and honest ability of the banks to lend does not exist to a much greater extent, unless the stock of the Government is considered a safe fund on which they may issue their own paper to any amount.

If this be the case, it is evident the whole system is a tottering fabric of credit; the Government relying on the credit of the banks, and the banks resting on the credit of the Government. If this confidence does exist, and is likely to continue, I would ask, why not issue Government paper at once, and save the enormous interest now paid to the banks, and run the chances of depreciation, instead of depreciating it ourselves by giving a premium for other paper, which may depreciate equally soon? I mean not to advocate a project of this sort; my object is only to show that the present system is bottomed on credit alone, and therefore may fail.

The present unfortunate situation of the country adds much, in my judgment, to the force of those remarks. If we had a flourishing commerce—if there existed a free, reciprocal intercourse between the several States—if there were a perfect community of interests, and a riveted confidence between the various sections of the country, and especially between the moneyed men and the moneyed institutions in all the States, the prospect would be greatly changed. In those events, credit might be relied on to almost any imaginable extent. But, sir, this unfortunately is not our lot. Blocked up as we are by the enemy's squadron on our coast; corked up by our still more unmerciful Embargo and Non-importation laws, calculated, as it were, to fill up the little chasm of ills which the enemy alone could not inflict; the entire coasting trade destroyed, and even the pittance of intercourse from one port to another in the same State prohibited; the planters of the Southern and Middle States, finding no markets for their products at home, are driven to the alternative of wagoning it hundreds of miles in search of a precarious market in the Northern and Eastern States, or permitting it to rot on their hands. Many of those articles which are, or have become by habit, necessary for their comfort, are procured at the most extravagant prices from other sections of the Union. The balance of trade, if trade it may be called, from these and other causes being so entirely against the Southern and Middle States, the whole of our specie is fast travelling to the north and east; our bank paper is thrown back upon the institutions from which it was issued, and as the war expenditures are proportionably inconsiderable in the Southern and Middle States, where the loans have been principally obtained, the bills of those banks are daily returning, and their vaults drained of their specie, to be locked up in the Western and Eastern States, never to return but with the return of peace and commerce. The extraordinary and alarming demands which have lately been made from Boston on the banks of New York, and which I understand are progressing to the South, prove these remarks not to be the mere effect of fancy.

Mr. Chairman, I was not a little surprised to hear an honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) say, the other day, that competent protection had been afforded to the exposed parts of the country. Sir, the Government has not afforded competent protection; the melancholy scenes which have lately been witnessed on the northern frontier, prove, that whilst your armies were recovering from their late disasters, and securing themselves on the borders of Canada, threatening another assault in the spring, the frontier of New York, to the extent of fifty miles, was laid waste by a handful of the enemy's troops, and the innocent inhabitants delivered over to captivity or slaughter. Let the gentleman inquire of Virginia and North Carolina what protection they have had from the General Government; let him, on his return home, visit the tomb-stones of many brave and respectable citizens of those States, who either fell by the hands of the enemy, or became the untimely victims of exposure to a climate still more ruthless, and this, too, in the performance of that duty which ought to have been assigned to the regular soldier, for the want of that protection from the General Government which every State is entitled to by the express letter of the constitution.

Early in the last year, representations were made to the General Government of the exposed situation of the coast of North Carolina, and some small aid ardently required; the application was treated with neglect or contempt; the just apprehensions of danger on the part of our citizens were attributed to imaginary fears. Thus unprepared and unprotected, the enemy came—the State was invaded—some of our towns taken possession of; what depredations were actually committed I know not—what might have been committed, I leave to gentlemen nearer the scene than myself to inform the House. Such was the general alarm, and such the real danger, that the militia, nearly as high as the centre of the State, were called into service to repel this invasion; unarmed, unaccoutred, and unprovided as they were, they flocked, as they always will do, to the standard of defence; many of those worthy men were kept in service during the unhealthy months of autumn, exposed to a climate to them unnatural and more terrible than the enemy; many of them found in the swamps of Carolina untimely graves.

At this very period, too, there were at different rendezvous in the State several hundred regular soldiers, lolling in their tents and fattening on the public spoils; these precious mercenaries were too sacred to be employed in the inglorious service of defending the State; not a company were ordered to our relief; they were reserved for nobler purposes; they were destined for the glories and rewards of conquest, whilst the breasts of our respectable citizens were made the medium for the bayonet of the enemy, in defence of our families and our homes. If this is what the gentleman calls protection, I pray to be delivered from it. The same gentleman has also reminded us of our apprehensions and predictions in relation to our exposed towns and seacoast. I will only remark, that those predictions have, to a considerable extent, unfortunately been realized; and that they have not been fully so, is not owing to any efficient protection from the General Government. That gentleman ought to be the last to talk of prophecies; he, if I mistake not, once turned prophet, and told this people, as an inducement to embark them into this war, that Canada would be conquered in six weeks; this entitles the gentleman to a distinguished place among the false prophets.

In reviewing the leading policy of the Administration for the last six or seven years, the mind is struck with the peculiar tendency (whatever may have been the motives) of that policy to a direct and unequivocal co-operation with the avowed objects of France. What has been the great and primary object of France? The destruction of England. Despairing of effecting his purpose by invasion, or the chances of ordinary combat, the tyrant of France conceived the gigantic project of accomplishing the destruction of Great Britain by a total interdiction of her commerce with all other nations. All the great powers on the Continent of Europe were either compelled or seduced into a co-operation with this great continental system, which, in the language of Bonaparte, in order to be effectual must be complete. The history of the various decrees and regulations by which this system was to bind up the commerce of the world, and the practical conformity of this Government by its embargoes, non-intercourse, non-importations, &c., has been so fully and clearly stated by an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BIGELOW) as to forbid even an attempt at repetition. The honorable gentleman, however, seemed to think, that while France demanded and enforced compliance from the nations on the Continent, in the most public, official, and dictatorial style, there was no official document to prove that a similar demand was made on the Government of the United States.

It is true, sir, the public have not been peculiarly favored with official knowledge of our relations with France, and as Congress only gets such scraps and extracts as the Executive deems fit to communicate, and some of them most secret and confidential, it is not a matter of surprise that such a record as the gentleman speaks of should not be found on our tables in hæc verba; but, sir, we are not without evidence, and that, too, of the most public and positive character, given by Bonaparte and his Ministers on this very point. Turn to the Berlin decrees of 1806, and the Milan decree of 1807; there you will find all nations, without exception, required to conform to the maritime code of France, and denunciations, threatening the enraged vengeance of France to alight on those who refuse or neglect to comply. When the American Minister at Paris humbly asked whether the treaty which then existed between this country and France was thus to be violated, by including America in the scope of those decrees, the answer was at first a little equivocal, but soon became certain by the capture and condemnation of our vessels, and the explicit declaration of Champagny, "that the law was general and admitted of no exceptions." What demand could have been more public than those decrees; what more explicit than their practical operations on our commerce, and what more official than the written declaration of the Minister of Foreign Affairs? I ask gentlemen, what better testimony could we have given of prompt and ready acquiescence than by our embargo of December, 1807; the recommendation of which was the immediate consequence of despatches from France, and not a knowledge of the Orders in Council of Great Britain? This self-destroying measure met the smiles and approbation of Bonaparte; he pronounced it a magnanimous resistance to the maritime tyranny of Great Britain. While this measure was continued and enforced with vigor, it was applauded by the great author of the continental system. Whenever the sufferings and clamors of our own oppressed citizens caused a temporary relaxation, we were denounced and punished for disobedience. I will not tax you, sir, with the disgusting recital of the multiplied and uniform declarations of the Emperor of France, and the language of all his State papers, showing the character of his continental system, and proving the estimate placed by him on our compliance. Those decrees are declared to be the fundamental law of his Empire; the flag is to be considered an extension of territory, and the nation which suffers it to be violated, forfeits its neutrality. In March, 1811, (previous to a knowledge of our unfortunate non-intercourse law of that month,) the Emperor, in an address to his Council of Commerce, thus expresses himself: "The fate of American commerce will soon be decided. I will favor it if the United States conform themselves to these decrees. In a contrary case, their vessels will be driven from my Empire. The commercial relations with England must cease." Thus, sir, we are not left to conjecture to know what was the judgment of Bonaparte on those who refused to give full effect to his continental system. In what light he considered our restrictive system, and particularly the law of March, 1811, may be collected from the following extract from the Mercur de France, a Parisian journal of high authority, published in April, 1811; after speaking of the measures adopted against England by the European allies of France—"the Americans (says this journal) on their part, are establishing in the New World another continental system, which draws still closer the blockade to which England has subjected herself by menacing France," &c. The French Gazettes all hold a similar language, and take it for granted that we have become members of the Imperial League. These opinions emanate from the Emperor himself.

If further evidence of the demands of Bonaparte on this country to conform to his system, were necessary to prove that nothing short of unconditional compliance, or war with England, would appease him, I would refer to the correspondence of Mr. Barlow, our late Minister to France. When this gentleman submitted his project for negotiation, and placed, as he says, our relations in a point of view both novel and impressive, the Emperor did not know how he could reconcile the provisions to the principles of his great continental system. But, sir, in the absence of all other testimony on this subject, I have a document before me, the authenticity and official character of which is now no longer to be denied or questioned, which proves the most unequivocal and formal demand on our Government to accede to the maritime confederation. I allude to the celebrated letter of General Turreau, late Minister of France, to Robert Smith, Esq., late Secretary of State, dated June 14, 1809. Among the least of the abominations contained in this letter is the following paragraph:

"I have thought it was not incompatible with my duty to submit to the wisdom of your Government, the new chances which the changes brought about in Europe offer to the commercial interests of the United States, and the inconveniences which may result from their refusal to accede formally to the principles of the maritime confederation."

That we have been formally and officially required to conform to the views and policy of France, I think I have fully established; how far we have yielded to those and that policy by our restrictive systems, and how far embraced them by our war, I leave to history to decide, and the impartial world to judge.

Mr. Chairman: It is time we should pause; it is time we should seriously reflect, whether any, and what essential, practical, attainable good is to result from the prosecution of this war; the great object for which it was declared—the Orders in Council—has now ceased to exist. The question of impressment alone remains; this question I do believe can be so arranged as to exempt our native seamen from abuse, and to give to Great Britain reasonable security against the employment of her seamen on board our public and private vessels. The right asserted by Great Britain to impress her subjects from on board our merchant vessels may remain undecided. The abuses of which we complain have arisen in a great degree from the troubled state of the European world, and the peculiar inducements which our merchant service held out for the employment of foreign seamen, and not solely from the assertion of an abstract principle—a principle which, I may be permitted to say, is recognized and practised on by France and every maritime nation of Europe. But, sir, if the right is denied; if the claim, set up by Great Britain, to impress her own subjects, is totally unfounded, have we the power of compelling her to abandon it? Is there a gentleman in this House; is there an intelligent man in the nation, who does, or can believe, that the abandonment of this right is to be extorted by the war in which we are engaged? I believe not, sir.

THURSDAY, February 17.

The Loan Bill.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the Loan Bill.

Mr. JACKSON spoke as follows: Mr. Chairman, it seems agreed on all sides that this shall be a continuation of the debate on the Army bills—that the discussion shall be conducted upon the scale then assumed; in that vast extent the investigation will be legitimate.

Although it be true that the province of the majority is to act, and of the minority to speak, it is sometimes equally so that the majority should give the reasons for their measures, and above all, they should place in a just view the specious and fallacious ones of their opponents. This nation is progressing in intellectual acquirements as rapidly as its unprecedented increase of numbers and the development of its vast internal resources; and it is due to ourselves, to the politician of to-day who was not on the stage yesterday, and to the advancement of truth, to venture occasionally upon a larger view of our affairs than would be strictly admissible, if the argument were to be solely intended for this House, and did not find its way to the nation. These considerations have guided me in the investigation I have made, and which I shall claim the indulgence of the House in communicating upon the present occasion.

The minority urge upon this bill—contemplating a provision of the ways and means for carrying on the war—the same objections relied on by them when the Army bills were before us. These objections may be resolved under three heads—

1st. The justice of the war in its origin.

2d. The justice of its continuance.

3d. The mode of waging it.

First—It is unjust, say they, in its origin, because there was no real cause of war; and the pretences for it might have been avoided if the treaty of 1806 had been accepted.

In discussing this point I shall purposely pass over many, very many, minor injuries inflicted by the lawless violence of Great Britain—which, though constituting cause of war, according to the best-established opinions of intelligent jurists, this nation devoted to peace, and anxious to avoid all collisions whatever, has not made the ground of the war, or a condition of its termination.

In 1806, in consequence of the piratical seizure of many merchant vessels engaged in the colonial trade, the Government were called upon by the united mercantile interest of this country to put on the armor and assume the attitude of resistance. These merchants in their memorable memorials, &c., announced the seizure of their vessels by Great Britain as lawless and piratical; they showed incontestably that the trade had been carried on in express conformity with the rules prescribed by the British Admiralty, and the decision of Sir William Scott, the Judge of their highest Court, having maritime jurisdiction; in fine, that, by these fraudulent deceptions, they were decoyed upon the ocean to the prosecution of a trade lawful according to the settled principles of national law, and lawful according to the decisions of the British Government; and were awakened from their delusion, which reposed on the honor and faith of that nation, by a fraudulent concealed order, under which their vessels and cargoes were seized simultaneously in the four quarters of the world, and ruin and beggary entailed on thousands.

This detestable outrage remains to this day unatoned for and unredressed.

Prompted by the value of the spoils seized on that occasion, this grievous outrage was but the inconsiderable precursor of others more grievous. Our vessels trading from one port belonging to an enemy of Great Britain to another port of the same, or another enemy—and at that time she was at war with all the maritime nations of Europe—was held to be good prize, and the notice of this new principle was conveyed through the seizure of the vessels thus employed. Orders of blockade were issued in defiance of the rule laid down by themselves. And the rapid succession of injuries treading on the heels of each other did not permit the mind to dwell upon either, before it was excited afresh by more transcendent injuries.

The Americans deriving their right to navigate the ocean from the recognition of their character as an independent people, and the munificence of a beneficent God who made the sea free to all, were required by Great Britain, who had usurped dominion over it, to carry their cargoes to a British port, land them there, and pay a tribute for a license to carry them to their place of destination. And on discovering the national indignation which this measure excited, we were told, in language of superadded indignity, that they had gratuitously commuted the tribute for a prohibition of the trade altogether.

In the subsequent modifications which Great Britain adopted of her piratical orders, we were told that we might trade to the nations with whom she was at war, provided we compelled them to receive the manufactures and products which they had prohibited—a pretension which, however much it might have suited the interests of our merchants to see those nations accede to, we had no right whatever to contend for—a pretension, too, which is at war with the laws of the British themselves, who prohibit almost all descriptions of manufactured articles in time of peace as well as in war, and which the policy of this country in fostering our own manufactories strongly inclines us to imitate. To illustrate the injustice of the claim, let us recur to our laws which prohibit the importation of slaves; and suppose a foreign nation were to demand the privilege of sending slaves hither, would we, could we, listen to it for a moment?

It was admitted by the British, and those in this country who contend for their claims, that these measures would be unjust in the abstract, but were just in retaliation for injuries inflicted on us by France. In vain was it answered, that retaliation to be lawful must fall upon the head of the aggressor, and not on us, who were a third and innocent party; and although there might be some pretext for such retaliation, if we had submitted to injuries which were prejudicial to Great Britain, and thereby exposed ourselves to the imputation of conniving at the conduct of her enemy, we showed that they had resorted to it before a knowledge by us of the injury retaliated for; and that the United States possessed the spirit and determination to maintain their rights against lawless invasion from every quarter, and would do so if the British would permit them, either by doing justice, or cease the practice of doing injustice towards us. We gave them to understand that war itself would be resorted to, and had only been delayed from the consideration that we were unable to contend at the same time with two of the most powerful nations on the globe, but would not shrink from a contest with one of them, if the other would withdraw her hostile edicts. But this argument and these assurances were disregarded; the enemy had taken his attitude; it was war on his part, peace on ours; he had not declared war, but was in the daily habit of committing acts of hostility, while his language breathed peace and good will toward us. Yet, in defiance of all this fairness and pacific remonstrance, we were told here, and the sentiment was echoed back by the British Government, that the conduct of this nation proceeded from partiality to France, and unjust hostility to Great Britain; that to these alone all our embarrassments owed their origin. When the intelligent men of the two countries called for the proofs, they found nothing but idle clamors and bold assertions. The charge in the famous protest of the minority after the declaration of war, and the reiteration of it by the Prince Regent, were substituted for proof; and when a specification was demanded, the arrangement with France, touching a repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, was pointed to as affording it. On this ground, or any other, we were always willing to meet our opponents, and on this, as often as they were met, they had been already vanquished. They urged that the President had taken the promise of the French Government for the fact of repeal, and on it had founded his proclamation; that the French had broken the promise, and fraudulently precipitated us into war. To this we answered: if it were a new case, without precedent to support it, the confidence due to independent nations demanded a reliance on the declaration; that it was no answer to this position that the confidence might be abused, for without it all the advantages of civilization would be lost to the present generation, and we should be thrown back into the dark ages, and revive the deplorable doctrine, that no faith was due to the engagements of other nations; no reliance to be placed except on the sword of our own.

But our recent history afforded an example which Great Britain and her friends, too, must respect; for it was an example in her favor which elicited the most unqualified approbation of the Executive conduct; and gentlemen were so zealous to testify their pleasure at that time that a formal vote of thanks was proposed and supported by them in this honorable body.

In comparing the two cases, the mind is lost in conjecturing wherefore was the conduct of the President condemned for the latter proclamation, when it was so decisively applauded for the first. And a minute analysis of the facts connected with each but serves to increase the dilemma.

The arrangement with Mr. Erskine for the repeal of the British Orders, it will be recollected, promised their abrogation at a future day. I think it was the 10th of June; not having looked into the documents recently, I am not certain that I am correct as to dates, but this I well recollect, that it was adopted with avidity; in the language of the resolve, with a promptitude and frankness honorable to the President; and on the faith of it, before the day had arrived, the President issued his proclamation, notifying the fact and renewing the trade, then suspended by our non-intercourse act, from and after that day.

The repeal of the French decrees was notified by the French Government to take effect from and after the first of November, and the proclamation of the President in consequence thereof was not issued until after that day. If there was any departure from the course of unequivocal impartiality in the two cases, it was certainly not to the prejudice of the British Government, as in their case the proclamation was in anticipation of the time fixed upon by themselves, and in the French case it was not until after the time had arrived. When Opposition found that they were driven from this untenable ground, they took their stand on another; the French declaration they said was fraudulent on the face of it, and couched in terms that were offensive.

It was answered, that but two topics of just inquiry were presented in considering the subject—first, had the French promised and was it fair to presume a repeal of their decrees in virtue of such promise?—and second, was the promise unequivocal and in terms unexceptionable? 1st. That they did promise a repeal no one will deny, and in point of fact we have express proof that it was conformed to, and not violated; our agents abroad state this, and the exemption of our vessels from capture under those decrees, is confirmatory of the assertion. 2d. As to the mode of making the promise: it will be recollected that we had prescribed a condition in our law to be performed in the event that either France or England revoked their edicts, and the other refused to do so within three months after such revocation, and the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees was made to depend upon our fulfilment of this condition—namely, a renewal of trade with the party repealing; and unless the outstanding belligerent repealed his decrees, a non-intercourse with him. I cannot discover any just cause for the criticism. It was in the nature of a neutral compact, requiring the fulfilment by each of the condition it had prescribed, as the consideration of its observance by the other; and it was exclusively in our power by observing good faith to render the contract absolute, or by violating our engagements defeat it. We kept our promise, and for the honor of our nation let it be understood, in no instance of our history has it been imputed to the Government that its promise was disregarded. The subsequent decree of the French Government, dated in April, 1811, is a proof that they considered we had performed our engagements. And I understand it, as its terms import it to be, no more than an absolute confirmation of the previous conditional repeal—a declaration that we had performed the condition.

I say nothing as to the charge whether this decree was not ante-dated; it is certainly fairly liable, from the circumstance of its concealment, to all the animadversions heaped upon its suspicious appearance. I am speaking only of its character and tendency; and I insist that the construction I have given is fair and reasonable. If so, the assertion that the repeal was not until after the proclamation, has not a shadow of reason for its support. Gentlemen, in the fertility of their invention, attempt to derive an argument from the subsequent repeal of the British decrees, against the justice of the war, which they call an act of rashness and precipitancy. And they allege there was every reason for believing the British would repeal their orders when they were notified of the repeal of the French decrees. In vain have we referred to the declarations of Mr. Foster that such repeal would not take place unless France not only rescinded her decrees so far as they violated our rights, but permitted the British manufactures to be admitted into the Continent also. We also showed that their Minister for Foreign Affairs declared the same thing; and that all pretext might be done away we quoted the "declaration" of the Prince Regent to the same import. Affecting to disbelieve the confessions of the British themselves as proof of their intentions, a new species of reasoning was resorted to, which, as all new discoveries are to be secured by patent privileges, I hope the gentleman will obtain the exclusive right of using and vending. They said, you rely on the official declarations of the British Ministers and the Prince Regent to prove they would not repeal their Orders in Council unless the French decrees were unconditionally repealed—but they have nevertheless been repealed without such modification of the French decrees, and this proves the reverse; and, reasoning a posteriori, it stands thus: "we had a right to believe the event would happen because it has taken place," although they all declared prior thereto that it would not.

Mr. Chairman, although the subject of invasions of the right of property has been first considered in the order of my arrangement, I have always believed and still think it of most subordinate importance in the scale of national wrongs endured by the United States; for, in so far as the rights of persons are more invaluable than the rights of property, do violations of personal rights merit the prompt interposition of the Government; whilst spoliations of property admit of dilatory adjustment. Let it not be said that in the only free Government on earth, where alone all power is derived from, and frequently exercised by, the people; and the rights of persons not only constitute the key-stone of the arch of our political edifice, but the corner stone on which the arch itself is erected; and, above all, let it not be believed that in such a Government a freeman can be despoiled of his liberty, or a citizen can be torn from his country, without producing more excitement than the capture of a bale of cotton or a barrel of flour. Impressments of our citizens are most certainly a primary cause of this war.

We are met at the threshold of this inquiry with the assertion that impressment was not urged as an argument for the war, and this, if true, would be a non sequitur. The justice of our cause has never been made to depend upon the conclusiveness of our arguments. It would be a strange mockery of justice for a judge to say to a party before him—"Sir, your cause is just; and I would be compelled to decide in your favor, if your advocate had not discovered an incompetency to argue it; on that ground alone I am constrained to decree against you." I ask, sir, if gentlemen are not mistaken in this assertion? Has not the practice of impressment been always urged as an intolerable injury by the Administrations of Washington, Adams, and Jefferson too, as well as the present? General Washington, twenty years ago, declared that it was an outrage not to be endured, and threatened reprisals. And will it be said that the Father of his Country would seriously contend for trifles, and assume a principle as the head of this nation which was to be given up as untenable? Sir, I think too highly of the character and virtues of that great man, whose reputation is the common property of his countrymen, without respect to the political distinctions set up by those who claim exclusive right to it, to subscribe for a moment to the unworthiness of the imputation; and permit me here to say, that the first general impression made on my youthful mind, was love and veneration for that great man, which no excitements of party spirit have ever unhinged or eradicated.

And who, I ask, among us will have the hardihood to assert that he unjustifiably resisted the practice of impressment? Not the Washington Benevolent Societies, I presume; for their "Aristides" was the organ through which the Presidential instruction was communicated. Sir, I do not allude to the appellation given to the venerable gentleman in derision; I am willing to allow him all the virtues claimed by his admirers, and attribute his errors to human frailty. Another distinguished favorite of Opposition, (I mean the Chief Justice,) while Secretary of State, wrote with energy and ability against this growing outrage. The honorable Mr. King, too, when Minister at London, reiterated the same complaints; and Mr. Jefferson made it a sine qua non of negotiation. Now, I ask, with these facts staring gentlemen in the face, can they pretend that impressment was not considered an inadmissible pretension? Evading an answer where none can be given, they tell us that Washington, Adams, and Jefferson, did not go to war for it. It is true they did not, and still the admission proves nothing. The first found his country exhausted, and by slow degrees recovering from the shock of a revolution; the government of it, which the sense of common danger and the united patriotism of the times alone rendered capable of sustaining any pressure, suddenly changed for a new system, against which the talents of some of the firmest patriots and strongest champions of liberty in the nation had been arrayed. The predictions of these men floated as beacons to guard against the dangers they had imagined; and in reducing order out of chaos, they were neither to be despised nor disregarded. It was his policy, and a wise one, to give the nation time to breathe and to grow strong; and in the mean time to enter a protest against this abuse, rather than go to war then to redress it. Let it be remembered, too, sir, that the injury then was small compared with its subsequent extent. It grew with our growth, and strengthened with our strength. Under the last Administration, it was of most alarming magnitude; under those of General Washington, and Mr. Adams, though each injury was an act of war, it might be compared to the murder of Pierce and the attack on the Chesapeake, admitting in the first instance of explanation without disgrace, and ultimate reparation. But if a hundred vessels had simultaneously murdered as many citizens, and attacked and destroyed all our vessels of war, no one could have forborne to identify the Government with its officers, and to hold it responsible for the outrage. Forbearance, under such circumstances, would have been pusillanimous and dishonorable; we must have repelled the hostile blow by hostile acts on our part, or surrendered the rank we have assumed as an independent nation. So, too, the first impressions of our citizens being disavowed, and reparation promised, the Government wisely preferred to rely on the justice of the British rather than on their own means for obtaining redress and future indemnity. Experience fatally proved the fallacy of this security; the cries of one American were drowned by those of his brother, who clung to his country and to liberty until the violence of the enemy had torn him from both, and riveted on him the fetters which had been forged for our citizens. Thousands of them in this manner were seized and carried off and still endure the slavery and degradation to which they have been doomed, unless in cases where a kind Providence has been pleased to close their eyes in death. And yet, that justice might be done to the long forbearance and pacific policy of this Government, year after year it sought redress in vain, and the answers of the British were a practical commentary on the insolent answers of their commanders, that "his Majesty's navy must have sailors." The nation was driven to the wall, where individual resistance becomes lawful in the sight of Heaven and all human laws, even though death ensue; there the constituted authorities took their stand, and the war was declared for "free trade and sailors' rights." Not, however, contented with a discussion of the avowed causes of the war, which is artfully evaded by the Opposition, they venture to presume others never contended for by the Administration, and level their artillery against those pretended causes. They say we claimed that free ships should make free goods, and that there should be no belligerent right of search. Sir, I deny the assertion in toto; and I believe if we could procure, by the common consent of nations, the adoption of a provision that there should be no search whatsoever, our interest would forbid it. I will acknowledge, sir, that on this point my private opinions have undergone a change. I do not recollect that I ever avowed them. I had believed that if the flag covered the vessel and cargo against all search, it would contribute much to the freedom of the seas, if, as a necessary condition of this privilege, no vessel were allowed to abuse the flag; to carry any other than its own; or to violate the law of nations—in relation to contraband of war, and carrying enemies in the military service of an enemy. Without these securities the privilege would not be desirable; and when I look to the experience of other nations as well as our own, I look for them in vain. Unfortunately for the honest merchant, and we have many, there are others of a different stamp, whom no laws will restrain, by whom no principles will be respected—even now they are in secret correspondence with our enemy, and subserving his schemes of murder and conflagration, by furnishing the instruments of death, and the means of subsistence. To illustrate my views, I will suppose a case. We are at war with a foreign nation who effects a landing in Louisiana; our navy nevertheless gives us the command of the American seas—and I am indulging in no improbable hypothesis, for we are destined to become a great naval power—the invader cannot subsist his army without fresh troops, other implements of war, provisions, &c., and these he knows will fall a prey to our naval superiority; a corrupt neutral, stimulated by gain, ministers to his necessities, carries men, arms, and ammunition, to relieve him. Our gallant tars believe this fraudulent trade is practised; but they dare not search the vessels employed in it, because of their abused immunities. Should we restrain them, and stay their hand from tearing the flag from the mast of the enemy in disguise, and making him pay the forfeit?

The Loan Bill.

It is said, too, that we are fighting for the establishment of a new law of blockades, that “there should be an investment by land and water;” this is equally incorrect. We stand in regard to them upon the British doctrine; we demanded the observance of their own rules; which they disregarded by substituting proclamations and orders for men and ships; it was their paper blockades, against which this Government contended. We are accused of insisting on a violation of the public law of Europe, in protecting naturalized men. And whilst the genius of free Governments, and of our constitution, as well as the uniform practice of all the nations of Europe, and of Great Britain in particular, are overlooked, gentlemen gravely advocate her abstract rights and municipal regulations. If a plain man were asked what is the public law of Europe? I apprehend he would answer, the universal practice of all the States of Europe, exercised by each, assented to by all, disputed by none. Yet, if tested by this construction, the advocates of the British pretension in regard to us, have nothing whereon to predicate an argument. The question of impressment, however, has nothing to do with the others, although gentlemen attempt to hide it in a mass of imposture, and in the jargon of the law of despotism. The single point is, will you protect your natural-born citizens in the enjoyment of their personal liberty at sea, as well as on the land? Let the career of our sailors be the answer, those gallant spirits who have borne our thunders on the mountain wave, and taught the enemy that he is not invincible; who carry from the mast head the motto of “Don’t give up the ship,” as an earnest that, so far as the badge of sovereignty is confided to their keeping, the national honor has nothing to apprehend, if the Government respond to the sentiment—as I would have the Legislature speak to the Executive in relation to the execution of his functions, Don’t give up the crew. I ask, Mr. Chairman, will you tear such a man from his ship; from his family; from the wife of his bosom, and the children of their love; from his aged parent who assisted to rear the fabric of liberty, and rejoices now in the evening of his days that his eyes will be closed by a brave son worthy of his father? No, sir; rather tell Liberty to tear the constitution to pieces; to depart from this Hall, and scatter it to the winds; to pull down the dome of this magnificent temple; to raze the monuments of freedom to their foundation; to leave us forever, for we have insulted her, and all our pledges and pretensions were a disgraceful mockery of her principles.

It is said we have gone to war to protect British subjects; that we naturalize and employ their sailors. In the very nature of things, few if any can be naturalized; and it is a pretence merely. The seaman who conforms to our naturalization laws, which require five years’ residence in a State or district, and testimonials of good character, rarely, if ever, returns to the sea, so long abandoned by him; and, in fact, as I have been informed by an honorable gentleman in the minority who is conversant with such subjects, (Mr. JACKSON, of Rhode Island,) but few naturalized seamen are to be found. Sir, we don’t want naturalized seamen, as our law which forbids their employment evinces. I have said, on a former occasion, and the remark has been recently quoted with an air of triumph, that the men who come hither from Europe in search of an asylum, securing to them civil and religious liberty, go to the interior, they follow the plough or some mechanic art, they are valuable men and good citizens; but there are others who infest the seaport towns and wear our privileges to hide their foreign connections, who are a pest to society and a curse to the country; and I would rejoice to see a provision in our laws preventing them from engaging in commerce or navigation. I would say to them, in explicit terms, Whilst you live among us and obey our laws, we will protect you; but the moment you go to sea beyond our territorial limits, you cease to be a citizen; you have no right there, and our duty to protect you then ceases. But the rights and duties change in relation to persons in our territory, on the soil of our country. We have, by the constitution, a power to naturalize foreigners, and I did not expect it would be contended that man has not a natural right to dwell where he pleases, to choose his form of Government and political society. This power of naturalization has received the sanction of all parties; it was first exercised by the Washington Administration; and even the old Congress of the Revolution, in their addresses, particularly to the inhabitants of Ireland, in the most eloquent language, invited them to come and live with us as members of our political family. Although no direct invitation is now given by this Government, yet when a foreigner comes under the faith of our constitution and laws, conforms to their provisions, and becomes a citizen, a contract is entered into of the most solemn character and binding validity on his part, that he will serve the country faithfully as a citizen, and, on the part of the country, that it will protect him in the enjoyment of his rights; he owes obedience to our laws, is bound to give his money in taxes, and his personal services in battle, and, if taken prisoner, it would be disgraceful to us as a nation to permit the enemy with impunity to hang him up as a traitor. As a militiaman, suppose he is called to Hampton, that memorable scene of British honor and humanity, and while contending in your ranks to repel the ruthless invader he is captured, would you consent to his immolation? I have said that man has a natural right to choose his country and his political society, and even this proposition, so reasonable and just, is controverted, and a new principle of social duty is assumed here. "The sovereign (it is said) is absolute over the subject; he becomes a tenant of the soil on which he is ushered into life, and cannot be transplanted; he owes a perpetual allegiance to it, and is punishable for acts inconsistent with that allegiance." This definition of the sovereign power suits only the regions of despotism, where man is a slave; the whole of it reduces him to the condition of a Russian serf, who is sold with the estate of the lord to whom both belong.

Much as I detest the Godwinian principle, that the son owes no duty to his parents, (if, as the gentleman contends, such be his doctrine,) that which assumes that the duty of man to the land of his birth is as strong, is equally abhorrent. What! man belong to the soil? Man, whom God created in his own image and likeness, and to whom he gave dominion over the earth and sea, and all that in them is? Shall he be bound in gratitude to the land where he is accidentally born—from which his parents and all his race are either driven, or were destroyed there in his infancy by the tyrant hand of oppression, and from whose persecutions he flies to a clime where civil and religious liberty are consecrated by the laws, and enjoyed alike by the great man in his palace and the peasant in his cottage? We are asked with seeming triumph, if France invades us, will we permit a citizen to go off, join the standard, and add to the force of the enemy? I answer, no. In time of war between two nations the migrations of the citizens of one to the other nation is unlawful; in time of peace it is far different. In war, the motive is clearly hostile and treasonable to his country; but in peace, the just presumption of reason and humanity being in favor of its continuance, no such idea is inferable from the act, which is not only not unlawful, but permitted. The case put is in nowise analogous. Pursuing the argument, which, in effect, justifies or palliates the British practice, the gentleman

(Mr. SHEPHERD) tells us impressment is only the abuse of the usage (I really apprehended he would say the right) of Great Britain, long established. Sir, I deny that the practice is of ancient date, and I deny, too, that it has been exercised against any nation, even the most unimportant, except the United States. Prior to the Revolution, this country being colonies of Great Britain, and our merchant vessels subject to the regulations of the parent State, any practice then need not be mentioned, because not applicable. During the Revolutionary war, impressments, in the nature of things, could not be practised, as nothing but superior force placed our seamen in the power of the enemy, and then they were held as prisoners of war only. Since the treaty of peace, this ancient usage, as it is called, was first commenced against the free citizens of this country. It was promptly met and resisted by manly remonstrance, indicating that, unless redressed, resistance of a different character would be resorted to.

Impressment, it is said, could have been arranged, in the opinion of high authority; and Mr. King has often been alluded to as being of that opinion. It is true that the English Minister agreed with him to desist from impressment altogether, except in the narrow seas; but there is no doubt that the exception insisted on was to prevent any arrangement, as was in effect avowed since. Mr. King refused to make the exception, and he declared he would rather lose all than agree to it. Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney are also alluded to, as proving that the accommodation could have been effected. It will be recollected that after the death of Mr. Fox, who was the head and soul of his Ministry, and whilst the remnant that remained were descending from power, a treaty was formed with Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, in which they would not consent to insert any provision in relation to impressment, but agreed to an informal note, which it was supposed contained something valuable. Mr. Canning, soon after, was at the head of the Foreign Department, and on receiving a communication notifying him of the promise contained in this note, he addressed a letter to the ex-Ministers, Lords Holland and Auckland, who had written it, to know if they had promised any suspension or discontinuance of the practice of impressment. They referred him, at first, to the note itself, and, on his pressing them further, they declared that they "only intended to promise the utmost caution in the exercise of the right, but no suspension or discontinuance of the practice of impressment." (I quote the correspondence from memory, but I know I quote it substantially.) Mr. Canning then wrote to our Minister that no engagements were entered into by Great Britain except such as appeared on the face of the treaty. Sir, Great Britain never claimed the right to impress our natural born seamen. They always professed to exercise the utmost caution, and this was no more. An avowed disregard of it would have been war at once. Yet what had we to expect for the future by recurring to the past? Thousands of our seamen had been impressed; the cries of "I am an American citizen," were disregarded, and, as if to manifest a contempt of all appearances, Danes, Swedes, Germans, and negroes, were taken from our vessels under the plea that they were British subjects.

The gentleman from Virginia is for drawing a strange line of distinction. He will risk nothing for persons coming here for the last fifteen years. He will permit them to emigrate, but will not naturalize them. What! make the alien a nullity; like a monk, professed in good old common law, civilitur mortuus? It would be a dangerous situation to society to have persons in it owing a temporary allegiance here, and a paramount permanent allegiance elsewhere. If they have no rights they can be subject to no duties; neither entitled to hold property, nor prosecute suits, nor liable to pay taxes. Their situation must be that of an outlaw, who may be hunted and killed as a wild beast. To my mind, the apology offered for British impressment, that it is a "municipal regulation," is the most exceptionable. What! shall the municipal regulations of Great Britain be exercised on board our vessels? If so, with equal justice may they be exercised on the land also, and thus we shall see British officers traversing our country, seeking out and seizing their victims, and carrying them off in defiance of our national sovereignty and independence.

We are reminded of the pretences under which other nations justify their wars, and are told that Great Britain goes to war for fooleries, such as the Spanish succession, &c.; and gentlemen advise us to pursue a more laudable course. It is worthy of remark that this Government was censured for refusing to become implicated in this Spanish war, which is now denounced from the same quarter as a foolery. And can it be that the rights of these States are compared to the fooleries of madmen, and debauched, corrupted monarchs? Our Government was formed for the common defence and general welfare; its primary duty is, to preserve the immunities of persons and the rights of property inviolate; and whatever may be said by the malcontents of the present day of the manly efforts to maintain these, posterity will not fail to do us justice.

It will do justice, also, to the opinion advanced by the Opposition, that we should have gone on, clamoring more and more about the Orders in Council, and prosecuted the culprits who kidnapped our sailors, by actions of false imprisonment in the Court of King's Bench, in England; and, instead of protecting our citizens by the national arm, we should have fed the lawyers who practice in their Inns of Court to recover indemnity in damages, to be assessed by a British jury in a British court. Sir, there are some propositions too outrageous to admit of discussion, and, permit me to say, I rank these among that number.

We are told that the rejection of the treaty of 1806 produced the war, and that it should have been ratified. I regret that a want of time prevents me from a re-examination of this question, because it is much pressed by Opposition, and may be fully refuted; perhaps a simple denial would suffice for a mere assertion, for it is not attempted to be shown that the assertion is justified. I deny that the treaty afforded any security against the abuses we have recited; it contained no indemnity for the vast spoliation of property; and it is a principle of common law and reason, applicable to individual transactions as well as to national controversies, that a claim advanced in a settlement and resisted, for which no provision is made, is considered to be barred by such settlement. So far from healing up existing differences, and preventing future ones, the seeds of controversy were sown deep by the British, and the outrageous pretension was set up to chastise us for French aggressions, unless we resisted them in the manner they required. I refer gentlemen to the official note delivered by the British Commissioners at signing the treaty, in which they state that it is not to be considered as binding on their part, unless the United States, by their conduct and assurances, give security to resist France; and when the Minister was told that we had, by our conduct, given those assurances, he declared he was not satisfied therewith. Thus, sir, we were to bind ourselves by a treaty, which was or was not to be obligatory on the enemy, according to his capricious opinions of the degree and character of resistance we were to make to the encroachments of the French. And no one can be so credulous as to believe that any measure short of war would have been satisfactory. The acts of the British were obviously founded in the belief that we had no intention to maintain and enforce a respect for our rights. Gentlemen even now admit that they considered the intimation of the necessity of war as an idle threat. No doubt they did, sir; their friends here had asserted the same belief, and on this error their impositions were predicated. If after all that had been said and done by our Government, and the contempt with which it was treated, we had succumbed, we should, after having become the scorn and derision of the world, by refusing to fight for our rights and honor, have been compelled at last to fight for our existence as a nation. Among nations, as between individuals, no point should be urged unless sanctioned by right and justice; but, once urged, it should be maintained manfully and bravely. The advice of the good old Polonius to his son should be followed—"Beware of entrance on a quarrel; but, being in, be firm, and then thy enemy will beware of thee."

We are accused of abandoning the prosperity and happiness of 1809, by going to war. I am at a loss to know in what that happiness and prosperity consisted. Was it in the depredations on our commerce and the capture of our seamen? If so, we were eminently happy, as every day's experience testified; and that species of happiness continued down to the declaration of war. Yet gentlemen say that Great Britain considers our war as an offensive war, and they concur in the opinion.

No doubt Great Britain thinks so; she argued herself into the same belief when she attacked the Spanish frigates, but the world did justice to her motives; their high offence was, that they carried millions of dollars, and Great Britain wanted the money. So, too, in her attack upon the peaceful Dane, when his capital was destroyed and his fleet was captured; when fire and the sword laid waste Copenhagen, and deluged its streets in the blood of its innocent women and children. The plea in both cases was the same—"Bonaparte, my enemy, will get your money and fleet, and thereby increase his means of annoying me, and I will defend myself against this apprehension." Such, in effect, was her language to us, in her just and defensive retaliation. Let us simplify this ground by applying it to individual intercourse. A man travelling on the high road is accosted by a robber, who demands his money, and accompanies the demand by a vindication of his conduct to this effect: "I rob you not with a desire to enrich myself, but I have an unprincipled enemy living on the road, who has need of your cash, and unless I get it he will, and it will add to his means of destroying me; besides, he will, after robbing, murder you, and to guard you against the perils that await you, I will rob you myself, and make you my prisoner, out of pure good will, and in my own defence." Such is the practice, such alone can be the justification, of Great Britain, and I do not wonder that she considers ours as an offensive war.

We are reminded of the pretences by which the partitioners of Poland affected to justify themselves—not that Poland had done them injury, but that the Polish principles were dangerous to the safety of crowned heads, who were alarmed at the example of a people capable of self-government. The gentleman might have referred, also, to the famous confederacies of Pavia and Pilnitz, which were formed on the same plea against France, and in which the British Government performed a conspicuous part. Sir, these examples afford other evidences of the facility with which the British cheat themselves into the belief—kind, honest souls!—that all their wars are defensive. Yet, strange to tell, they are illustrations of the opinion entertained here by the Opposition, of the soundness and justice of the American claims. I ask, emphatically, is it possible that any man can believe that our war is of a similar character, and waged on such flagitious pretensions? Gentlemen say yes; you have a lawless hostility against Great Britain, and your measures proceed from that source. I refer to two memorable examples of the pacific temper of this nation, where the conduct of the British was universally condemned, viz: the murder of Pierce, and the attack on the Chesapeake. When the murdered Pierce arrived at New York, all parties vied who should manifest the strongest resentment. The Federalists, with Mr. King at their head, paraded the streets with the dead body, and one cry of vengeance animated the nation. So, too, when the Chesapeake was taken, all parties cried aloud for war; and, had the Congress been convened, and a declaration of war recommended, I do verily believe it would have passed almost unanimously. But the Executive then, as had been done by Congress on a former occasion, clinging to peace as a sheet-anchor of safety, resolved not to identify the Government with the act of its officer, but to admit of pacific explanation and atonement. Gentlemen mistake the fact; it is Britain that is hostile, and not this nation. Look at her conduct towards the Indians before the war was declared, and even whilst her Minister was denying the justice of opinions drawn from that conduct; these people, to whom we sent the missionaries of the Gospel and the implements of husbandry, were enticed to take up arms against us, by the holy "bulwark of religion;" they were made hostile by promises and by presents; by spirits to inflame their passions, and by arms to destroy us; and these facts, coming to the Executive from every quarter, were verified by corresponding circumstances. A vast body of armed savages were assembled at Tippecanoe, threatening the frontier, which more than once had been recently smoking in blood and conflagration. There, with the language of peace in their mouths, like their employers, they attacked our force, and, being defeated, they left behind them British arms, British scalping knives and tomahawks, and British ornaments. Their open, avowed, and immediate employment of them as soon as war was declared, is conclusive proof on that head; for how, I ask, could they otherwise have concentrated such a large Indian force in so short a time? Sir, I am humbled to find it necessary, in this House, to discuss the justice of the war, and to answer objections taken by my countrymen against the cause of our common country. I do greatly mistake if I have not shown that the war was just, necessary, and unavoidable at its commencement; which brings me to the second point, viz: The justice of its continuance.

We are told that the war should be discontinued, as the Orders in Council have been repealed. Their repeal was conditional merely, and the terms certainly not the most satisfactory. We were informed that, unless British vessels and British goods were freely admitted into our ports, the repeal would not be respected, and the right of passing the orders was expressly asserted. But, waiving these objections, I insist that impressments either are or are not justifiable. If not, as I have attempted to show, they should be provided against; and the Government has done all it could to terminate the war, by proposals to entertain for discussion this important question. The British were not required to abandon it without a reasonable indemnity; they were not even required to do more than suspend the practice during a suspension of hostilities, or to continue the war, and to negotiate on that point in the mean time. Yet, strange to tell, the British peremptorily rejected all these offers, although they well knew that in time of war they cannot impress; that if hostilities be suspended, they cannot impress during such suspension, as it would be an act of war. Yet they refused to forbear the practice and try the effect of negotiation. What! shall we be bound whilst treating of peace with the enemy, and he be at liberty to make war on us? The idea is too preposterous and extravagant. The plea of Great Britain was, that we harbored her seamen, we encouraged desertion; we were not prevented, by the circumstance of being at war with her, from removing this pretence, and the seamen's bill was passed. Yet, strange to tell, its passage was opposed by the minority.

The Emperor of Russia, the friend and ally of England, offered his mediation to effect a reconciliation. It was promptly accepted, in the liberal spirit in which it had been conceived; and our Ministers were sent on a peace mission. A stronger proof of the just views and sincerity of a nation than was then given by the Executive, never was afforded. The ally of our enemy was confided in by us—an ally at war with the nation to whom it is falsely pretended we are devoted: and a distinguished Federalist was appointed as one of the negotiators. The conduct of Opposition in regard to this mediation deserves particular notice. At first they accused the President of avoiding the mediation as long as he could, because of his aversion to a peace, and until he found the public sentiment running strong against him. After the mediation was accepted, and our Ministers had sailed, there were strong indications of its rejection by Great Britain, and it was finally rejected. Then it pleased Opposition to denounce the Executive for accepting the mediation, and its great leader declared that the mediation was tendered by the Russian Minister without the authority of his Emperor, and this tender was produced by the intrigue of our Government. The course the Opposition took on that occasion was not without example. They had practised it in the famous Erskine arrangement. Then the Opposition affirmed that they knew Great Britain had been always disposed to friendly intercourse, if they could meet a corresponding temper; and they hailed the accommodation as evidence of its commencement. They carried that feeling into this House; here a vote of thanks was proposed to be tendered to the President; he was called the man of the people, the friend of his country, &c. But Erskine's arrangement was rejected by his Government; and then, in the true spirit of liberality and consistency, the same gentlemen condemned the President for imposing on the young, credulous Minister; and a member of this House, who advocated the vote of approbation in the first instance, came forward and censured the President for confiding in the honor of the Minister, and stated that he should have first seen his patent powers under the sign manual of the King. Suppose the President had done so, and the Minister, feeling the indignity, had demanded his passports, and left the country—we should then have heard a general cry of condemnation. Whilst the Opposition were of opinion that the Russian mediation was sanctioned by Great Britain, the acceptance of it by us was wise, pacific, and just; it met their cordial approbation; but when Great Britain rejected it, they too condemned it, as an imposition, which the Executive had practised, knowing it must necessarily fail. I request gentlemen to mark the language of Alexander, in the tender of his good offices—he is satisfied the United States have done all they could do to avoid war. Let them mark, too, his relation to England, engaged in an alliance with her, receiving her assistance in a struggle he was making for his throne, his empire, and independence. At this interesting crisis, Alexander bears testimony before all the world of his confidence in the just views of America; let Opposition learn a lesson of forbearance and liberality from his magnanimity;—he, if present feeling and interest would sway him, would have been ready to espouse the cause of England against us. Yet he, rising above such narrow selfishness, manifests his confidence in decided terms—whilst Opposition, having a common interest with a majority in the welfare of the nation, takes the unjust side of England. Great Britain foresaw that a refusal of the Russian mediation would expose her to just censure, unless covered by some plausible pretext, and has attempted to shield herself by the expression of her unwillingness to unite our dispute with the affairs of the Continent. What affairs, I ask? Not French affairs; there was no danger of the phantom “French influence” to be apprehended from the proffered mediation, as Russia was at war with France. I will answer the question for England. It was the desire manifested by the Baltic States, on a former occasion, to maintain the maritime rights of all nations, that Great Britain deprecated; they too like us entertained the notion that when God separated the sea from the land he made it free, like the air we breathe, for all nations. And I hope and trust that Alexander will add to his title of “Deliverer of Europe” the more glorious one of Deliverer of the World; that, having called into action the energies of his great mind, and the vast resources of his Empire; after having rolled back the mighty wave of French power which inundated the neighboring States, and swept away the ancient boundaries of Russia until it penetrated to Moscow, the capital of the Czars; after putting down the tyranny of the land, which threatened the subjugation of the Continent, he will not lay down his arms until he has executed the vast design, worthy of the cause which has produced the development of his powers, of putting down the tyranny of the seas.

This Russian mediation teaches another important fact, which must stamp with eternal infamy the charge of French influence. To Russia, fighting against France, the United States have confided their cause and its object; and have thereby shown that no relation whatsoever subsisted with France, which the enemies of France could regret or disapprove—in fine, that none of any kind existed not known to all the world. Great Britain has proposed to treat directly with us at Gottenburg, and the offer was accepted without delay. Not disposed to resent the rejection of all previous overtures made directly by this Government, and the indirect one which the mediation afforded, but zealously anxious to obtain a speedy and honorable peace, we find a steady perseverance in that object, nay, even a solicitude which the enemy may mistake for timidity, and which some warm spirits in this nation have reprehended, which brings me to a conclusion of the second point, viz: the justice of a continuance of the war; and I hope I have established the justice of its continuance, as well by showing that its object has not been attained, as in recurring to the proofs that the Government have made and are now making every honorable effort to produce its termination. Indeed it is said, that Administration are bent on peace, and we shall soon have it; that they have struck their flag, and gentlemen are glad of it. And a lame attempt is made to distinguish between the national flag and the flag of Administration—it is admitted that the flag of Administration is to give protection to “free trade and sailors’ rights,” and I think those five words contain a constitutional definition of all that concerns us with foreign nations beyond our landed limits. This anticipated surrender, which affords so much pleasure to gentlemen, might have been communicated by the King’s messenger; but that would not suffice, the supremacy of the Pope was to be duly acknowledged, a King must hold his stirrup, five Envoys with badges of humiliation must carry our submission to England; for it was thus the keys of Calais were surrendered. What are the proofs of this submission? this surrender of sailors’ rights? Gentlemen say, the Prince Regent refers to his maritime rights, and asserts that the United States have not discovered a disposition to treat on the basis of their recognition—that Lord Castlereagh proposes to negotiate on those terms, and that the acceptance of the offer is submission. We never contested the maritime rights of England, it was her maritime wrongs we complained of. The public law of Europe and the maritime rights of Great Britain are common to all nations; her maritime rights are as well defined as ours; we are all equals; and usurpation and oppression, though successful, constitute no new “right.” Sir, I object to the authority introduced by the gentleman, as well as to the justice of his deductions. Shall America be judged by the Prince Regent? shall its cause or its intentions be decided by his assertions? I hope not, sir, as on his evidence the United States are leagued with France; and on that of his representative, Lieutenant General Prevost, we are the allies of France. I shall not engage in the idle controversy, whether a surrender of our rights be or be not intended—I will not attempt to convince gentlemen of what Administration intend to do, when they will not understand or believe what they have done.

I do not envy those feelings which induce the assertion, that the surrender of our rights affords pleasure and cause of rejoicing. I thank God mine are of a different stamp. I shall rejoice to see not only the rights of commerce and seamen, so far as my countrymen are concerned, excepted from oppression, but the rights of all the world respected and consecrated by the laws and usages of nations.

I will now consider the third point, the manner of carrying on this war; which has also met with marked condemnation. It is said the war, as carried on, is an offensive war; it is not for the maintenance of our rights, but is a war of conquest. It is worthy of remark here, that Opposition asserted the same thing before a blow was struck, at the time of declaring war. Although the charge has been exposed with much ability by my honorable friends, I will venture to offer a few remarks in addition to theirs; and, before I do so, permit me to express my opinion in relation to Canada, for it is due to this investigation that I should be rightly understood on that point. Canada as a territory is not worth one cent to us—I would not have it; and as affording the means of stirring up the savages alone can it be important? If Great Britain remains pacific and just towards us, and does not excite the Indians, they may keep Canada with my approbation forever; it is intrinsically of no value to us. I speak more particularly as a Western man. We have already territory enough for many years to come, and, by refusing to enlarge it by acquisitions on the Northern frontier, we secure to the West a continuation of the vast emigration from the Northern and Eastern sections of this Union, which not only contributes to increase the ratio of our numbers and enhance the value of our lands, but by degrees will effect a more important object. The emigrants will communicate to their friends who are left behind, that the jealousies which wicked and designing men are industriously exciting are unfounded and unjust; and they will by-and-by learn to judge of us correctly, and we shall thereby acquire the greatly desirable object, a national character, which is only to be attained by extinguishing sectional jealousies. Conquest, Mr. Chairman, is not our character; the Louisiana case is a memorable instance of it. When the right of deposit at Orleans, which was sanctioned by treaty, was prohibited by the unauthorized act of the Spanish Intendant, leading members of Opposition were then for buckling on the armor of war; they proposed raising an army of fifty thousand men to take the country, which they said we must have at any sacrifice; for, that the Island of New Orleans alone would justify the expenditure. The Government concurred in opinion of its importance, but rejected the course advised for its acquisition; it would not wage war—"first strike and then hear" the explanation which Spain had to offer. The Spanish Government disavowed the act of its agent, and the country was acquired by cession for $15,000,000, about one-third of the price of one campaign.

The Loan Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Yet, when thus acquired, the same gentlemen condemned the acquisition and declared the bargain was a bad one. I repeat the assertion; a desire of conquest does not constitute a trait in our character, as this celebrated instance proves. But, say gentlemen, your operations are offensive in their nature, and this changes the character of the war. My friend from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) gave the proper answer to this assertion—"the character of the war cannot be affected by the mode of conducting it; the causes of its origin alone give it a character, and that never changes unless the war is continued after the causes cease." This was the idea, if not the language of my friend, and surely the reasoning is conclusive. If the war was declared for just cause, how should a wise Government conduct it? I answer, make it fall as heavily on the enemy as possible within the lawful rules of warfare, and as lightly as it can on our own people. In order to do this it must attack him—put him on the defensive, and not wait to repel his attacks. It was said in the British Parliament, by Mr. Canning, that one of their "ablest friends in Congress" had declared that in a few months the British would destroy our towns and ravage the seacoast, and he upbraided the Ministry with the omission to verify this prediction. If the enemy had the power, we know he would have executed it, as the defenceless villages on the Chesapeake show. And how has this been prevented? I answer, by invading his territory, compelling him to draw his forces there, and putting him on the defensive. If the character of the war depend upon the mode of carrying it on, if invading the territory of the enemy constitute offensive war, the war is offensive on his part; and thus, by the process of reasoning indulged by gentlemen, it is proved that each nation is carrying on an offensive war against the other at the same time, which involves the grossest absurdity. I suppose the enemy will be justified in his warfare—indeed he has been already—and we shall be told he attacks for his own defence and safety. It was for this purpose he carried his arms into Michigan, to the river Raisin, to Fort Meigs, Sandusky, Hampton, Erie, Black Rock, Buffalo, &c., where his footsteps were marked with butchery and bloodshed, conflagration, and rapine, which would have scandalized a cannibal. There was a paramount motive for invading Canada—there the Indians were hired by their cruel employers—there they were set on to deeds of blood, and there it was, that a price was promised them for the scalps of infant innocence and unprotected helpless women. And while the frontier man rushed to the battle at the call of his country, and opposed in fair and honorable combat the open invader—the red ally of England, who had been fattened and made strong by the bounty before he was so cruelly excited against his protector—the savage who was drawn from the wilds of his forest crept in behind him like a wolf into the sheepfold, and awakening his family from the midnight sleep by his horrible yells—the conflagration of their dwellings lighted him to their hiding place, and with more than savage fury he tore the infant from its mother's bosom and beat out its brains against her head. When the soldier came back to find his family and his home, not a vestige of either remained; all were consumed by the fell destroyer, who had fled with their bleeding scalps to the British Proctors and Elliots, who paid the stipulated bounty.

Sir, I refer gentlemen to the celebrated speech of their friend (Mr. AMES) upon the British treaty. He urged its adoption because it gave up to us our own posts, where the British, as he admitted, influenced the Indians to make war; and I believe the treaty went down in consequence of the eloquence with which he pressed that subject. How, I ask, then, can gentlemen reconcile it to themselves to condemn the Government for exercising all its efforts to prevent this outrageous warfare? The British attempt to apologize for their barbarities by stating that they cannot restrain the Indians. This, if true, is no palliation. The ready reply is, you violate all the rules of civilized warfare by the use of any means you cannot control within them, and are answerable for such use. But the assertion is not true. We have been, at last reluctantly constrained to employ the Indians in our just defence, and in no instance have they scalped the dead or murdered the prisoners; they have obeyed the orders of the American officers; and no doubt the British have been equally obeyed by those in their service. Suppose this system of carrying on the war on the defensive plan recommended were adopted; it would lead to consequences the most absurd, and humiliating, and destructive. The enemy invades your territory, and then, and then only, he is liable to your attacks. After striking his blow, your forces are marched against him, and he is driven to the line with his booty and prisoners;—with difficulty he eludes your grasp, until he rushes, exhausted and resistless, into his own territory, and a few hundred yards beyond your boundary he pitches his tents in security; the soldier's arm is paralyzed, his musket is stricken out of his hands, and the enemy riots in security before his eyes, surrounded by the inviolability of a contemptible policy. There he recruits his strength, strikes another blow elsewhere, flees again to the place of security, and is safe. Just like the felons in the iron times of feudal vassalage, who ran to the consecrated places of safety, where the sword of justice could never reach them. Then, indeed, would the Cockburns of England have verified the predictions of their "friend in Congress;" the disposable force of Canada, which was kept in check, might have been transported to attack our seaport towns in succession, and the cruelties and outrages of Hampton would have been tender mercies to what we should have suffered. The plan of the Administration for the conduct of the war is not only condemned in unqualified terms by the minority, but they have had the kindness to give their advice how to manage it for the future. They say, "repeal the embargo, send all your vessels to sea, and we will unite with you there. Take the Lakes and the St. Lawrence in this, and we will support you." I consider that something is gained by this admission. It now seems that it is not immoral to rejoice with us for our naval victories; gentlemen are willing to aid us also in achieving others.

Let us examine this concession with the argument that the war is unjust; that the war is offensive, &c. Surely the war on the ocean will be peculiarly offensive to Great Britain; "the sea is Britain's own domain"—"all under sea is British ground"—"Britannia rules the waves." These are the favorite themes of the fast-anchored iale; and dare we invade her dominion? That will indeed be offensive war! Sir, I consider the point of the justice, &c., of the war as conceded by the minority, if we will consent to fight with them in their own way. I should like to know how the war is to be conducted there. "Free trade and sailors' rights" are to be given up; the flag is to be struck, and, I suppose, we are to fight if molested in the enjoyment of the degradation. Gentlemen say, you are injured on the ocean—seek redress there. Why, then, attack on the Lakes and St. Lawrence? There, too, the war will be offensive; it will fall upon the "innocent, harmless Canadians" and His Majesty's sailors, poor souls, who never did you harm, except you choose to call by that harsh epithet the impressment of your seamen and murders of your women and children. Let us test these professions of Opposition by their practice. We ask money for the navy, and even that is refused—we ask it for the civil list, for paying the interest of the debt themselves assumed, for the defence of our seacoasts, &c., and they will not give one cent; and the plea set up by them is, "we will not give you money to carry on a war which you have not competency to conduct." I am ready to admit that the war has been in some places badly conducted; though I feel convinced the disasters and disappointments are attributable to the officers who have been confided in, and not to any want of capacity or foresight in the head of the War Department. If candor and justice are more than an empty sound, there can be but one opinion on that subject, namely, that the genius, and talents, and capacity of the Secretary are of the highest order. But what, let me ask, is the amount of the objection? Nothing more than arguing against the cause by the effect, against the object of the operations by the failure of them. The failure of those operations has given rise to much eloquent sarcasm, and to a personality I regret. I regret that the gentleman from New York, who manifests so high a sense of his personal honor, and a determination to maintain his rights, should have thought fit to assail the honor of others. I am sure the gentleman in his cooler moments must condemn his attack on General Smyth, a gentleman whom I have only seen at this place some years since, whom I do not presume to vindicate, whose conduct I too have not approved. I have understood, however, from an honorable source, that Smyth is not a coward; and the act alluded to, if evincing cowardice, implicates other gentlemen who advised the course he adopted, and surely the honorable member will not say they too are cowards.

I will notice another remark of the honorable gentleman. He said that invading Canada, the cornfields, wigwams, and hunting grounds of the Indians, justify the employment of them, to defend their rights and homes. What, sir, were they defended at Detroit, at Fort Meigs, the River Raisin, Buffalo, &c., where the Indian tore the scalp from the bleeding captive, before the tomahawk had terminated his sufferings!

Mr. Chairman, here lies the great misfortune under which our country groans: every thing this Government does is condemned in language of the bitterest invective. No considerations of country can stay the wrath of its opponents. On the other hand, every act the enemy commits is justified or palliated. Nothing—not the dying groans of the aged and helpless, nor the cries of violated innocence—can excite their displeasure against the enemy. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFERY) says this censure is all right; it will do no harm to arraign Administration if its measures are wise and proper. Do gentlemen perceive the tendency of this argument? It is calculated to discredit themselves with the people, when they are even right. Having avowed their principles of action, and so often been driven from the untenable ground they have occupied, they will not be able to make the people listen to them. Great Britain teaches us a valuable lesson on this point. They have unanimously resolved to carry on the war against us, although they all know, and many of their distinguished statesmen have avowed, they are in the wrong. While here, every attempt is made to degrade the Government, to destroy the spirit of the nation, and snatch from the gallant soldier the meed of praise; for in this Hall, during this session, it has been affirmed that "necessity and vice were the only stimulants to enlistment." Why, Pitt and Fox, and Barré, have done the same in England, say the gentlemen. Sir, I reject the English precedents altogether, as not suited to a Government elective as ours is. I deny the application of them, if they were admissible. When these men stood up as the champions of liberty against the tyranny of the Ministry, which our fathers nobly and successfully resisted, they plead the cause of the American colonies against usurpation. The fetters of slavery had been forged for us; the cords with which they had bound us were drawn tighter every day. But, Samson's hair was then unshorn, and, when he put forth his strength, they fell from his arms like slender threads. They opposed a wicked invasion of our rights; and if the same men were now living, and their principles were not changed, we should perceive a similar opposition to the subsequent invasions. Are the causes similar? Do we attack the unquestionable rights of England? Are we attempting the destruction of her commerce and enslavement of her seamen? No, sir, we are defending the great rights of this new, but wonderful people, whose high destiny cannot—will not—brook the lawless encroachments of any nation. Gentlemen pressing the example of England, say, "the Tories, when in power, were patriots in opposition; that there is no other difference among men than a change of situation produces." I regard this as a precious confession. It amounts to no less than an admission that they are engaged in a mere scramble for power; and if in power, they would pursue our course. Yes, I believe they would. Sir, the party who have so often manifested an extreme sensibility at the outrages they witnessed, while in power have given a pledge to the nation that its rights would not be prostrated by submission to British encroachments. "Our arms have failed, (say gentlemen.) What is the cause of it? The fault lies not at the door of Opposition." Yes, sir, I admit they have failed in some memorable instances; but I insist that the Opposition have been the cause of failure. The people of the United States are a thinking, calculating people. They are accustomed to confide their interests to men of their choice, whose candor and veracity are not questioned by them. They will not go with the Government, unless actuated by the impulses of their opinions. It is not sufficient that the Government have declared war; they, too, require to be convinced of its propriety. With this general temper—and it is certainly one of the characteristics of free Government—look to the means which have been pursued by Opposition ever since war was inevitable. The leaders have excited the people to distrust us; "trifles light as air" were adduced and urged as confirmations strong as proofs of Holy Writ. Their favorite presses diffused the poison far and wide, but the antidote was never administered by them to the people. I will venture to predict that the address of their leaders will prevent many of the people from ever hearing that the charges imputing the Russian mediation to the fraud and trick of the Administration has recoiled upon its authors. As soon as war was declared, these leaders entered their protest against it, in which they said that we had no cause of war, and impeached the motives of the majority who declared war. The clergy of these gentlemen's party responded to their accusations that there was no cause of war, and that it was an immoral and unjust one. Their Governors denounced us for "fighting against the land of our fathers, and the bulwark of our religion." They all proclaimed that Great Britain was fighting the battles of the world, and endeavored to enlist our sympathies in her favor. When we said to Great Britain, first do us justice before you demand our sympathy; do not attack America because you are fighting France; the partisans of England replied, you are under French influence. The citizen was dissuaded from entering into your army: it was said if he spilt the blood of the enemy in this war, he would become a murderer. When money was solicited on loans, a venerable gentleman, now a member of this House, said it would be wicked to lend money; he threatened, also, that the money would not be repaid—that the honor of the Government did not require a repayment. A most demoralizing sentiment, striking at the foundation of free Government: its basis is national faith, and he that destroys that, dissolves the Government.

I ask, sir, how stands the funding system? We all recollect the history of that nefarious speculation. The soldier's necessities, in the poverty of your Government, had compelled him to sell your scrip at 2s. 6d. in the pound. The speculator came with it into the Congressional Hall, and voted to give himself the full nominal value. The discrimination proposed, which secured to the soldier a part of the funded debt, and the residue to the speculator, was rejected, and he retired to the haunts of poverty and wretchedness to drag out the remainder of a miserable life—rendered miserable by the injustice of his country. Yet, with a knowledge of these facts, no man dared to propose extinguishing the debt thus created, but by an honest payment of it to the last dollar. This doctrine, which resolves the faith of the nation into the expediency of the measure that authorized the expenditure, was reserved for the pretended disciples of WASHINGTON, and its application to the payment of a debt created by the Government in its struggle to maintain the principles of the Revolution against the attacks of the same enemy who produced it.

Sir, the sinews of war are men and money. The Government appeals to the patriotism and interest of the people for those aids—they stimulate enlistments. The last, particularly, operates upon the money lenders; for, if it were patriotism alone that influenced them, they would not ask any interest, or at most six per cent., which is the general scale of legal interest; all beyond that, in legal acceptance, is usury. And, how can you expect that men who are induced by present interest, and ultimate security for the principal, will lend money, when the leaders of Opposition make them believe that they are sure of getting possession of the reins of Government soon, and will sponge out the debt?

These gentlemen say the people are against you, and that is in part the cause of your failure. When we ask why are they against us?—they say you prove yourselves enemies to commerce—you carry on an unjust, offensive war—you are unable to manage a war, and we prophesied your failure. Mr. Chairman, no prophets are so true as those who effect their predictions—none are so dangerous as those who endeavor to effect them; rather than be convicted of false prophecy, they would see their country humbled, its rights invaded, its liberties destroyed.

But how are the people against us, we ask? Have we had a new election since the war, and acquired increased majorities? Yes, it is answered, you have—but it was the force of party that sustained you. Unfortunate minority! the energies of party are always against you. You, that have every thing to gain by vigilance, are sleeping at your posts, while the great majority who apprehend no danger, alone are vigilant! You might as well tell me that the lamb is vigilant and the wolf sleepeth.

But we wish to destroy commerce—and by the constitution it cannot be restricted. This is a new notion. These sticklers for the constitution, during General Washington's Administration, authorized an embargo; to be continued, to be revoked, and renewed at his will, and to any extent he pleased; yet they deny us the power to pass a law definite in its object and extent.

Great Britain, we are told, destroyed our commerce; it kindled the fire of the Revolution: we resisted then, and we have the spirit and the means to resist now. I shall not reason as to this threatened resistance; it is too outrageous to be opposed by reasoning. Let treason rear its head, it will and must be put down though it have a thousand heads; and the very land where it is excited to overt acts, will furnish the means abundantly; they will give a new application to the favorite sentiment of its leaders, and they will prostrate the monster, "peaceably if they can, forcibly if they must."

Sir, the threat is idle; those who use it neither wish nor intend its execution; the commercial interests, which it is said were the strong advocates for the constitution, will not favor it for the same reasons that then influenced them. What is the course of trade and commerce in this country? The ship owners and navigators live in the North and East—I speak as to the great mass of them—the bulky products, the principal exports of the country, are from the South and West, and these products are carried to market by the owners of the shipping. Suppose, in a state of separation, we gave England a monopoly of our trade, the transportation of our produce to a market, and the exclusive supply of foreign merchandise. I need not give you a picture of the distress and ruin it would produce to them, whilst I hazard little in saying it would not injure us. They know this as well, or better than we do; and if patriotism cannot bind them to the Union, interest will. Is it pretended that our efforts in favor of free trade proceed from hostility to commerce; and that the destruction of it by Great Britain before the Revolution was no more than we practice? Cannot gentlemen perceive the distinction between regulating commerce by a foreign nation, and by their own Representatives? If they cannot they are fit tools for despotism and unworthy of participating in the blessings of a free Government. A new species of complaint seems about to be set up—not that commerce is regulated by the Congress; but that men presume to do it "who never saw a ship through the medium of the eye." What, are we to be told we are unfit to resist the usurpations of England unless we saw the vessels and cargoes of our merchants captured and confiscated? Cannot we imagine the tyranny of impressment unless we see the prisoner in his dungeon? Will gentlemen take no part with their country against the cruelties of savage warfare, unless they see the scalplings and butcheries of our women and children? I should be ashamed of the argument, if one of our flat boats carrying a cargo of flour to New Orleans had been seized by the Spaniards when they owned Louisiana, and the crew sent to the mines—if one of my Western brethren had gravely told this House:—Gentlemen you cannot understand this outrage; it is idle and wicked for you to think it an indignity to the nation; therefore, it is improper for you to interfere in it, for you never saw a flat boat through the medium of the eye.

We are told, sir, that Massachusetts alone could have taken Canada, and this is a proof that the people are against us. It is proof of an alarming character when the energies of Government are so far paralyzed that the Union cannot effect what one of the States could if it were not for the Opposition. This, say the gentlemen, is all right; Virginia did the same; she invited the people to meet and resist the Government of the Union. Virginia has been often misrepresented on this subject; it is to be regretted that the facts were not better understood and respected in relation to her course. When the constitution had been infringed by the passage of the alien and sedition acts, Virginia addressed the States as parties to the compact, inviting their serious attention and constitutional co-operation; not to violate the constitution, but to give efficacy to the constitution; not to resist these laws by force and violence, but to effect a constitutional repeal of them, either by changing the representation in Congress, or by a manly remonstrance calculated to convince the Congress of the correctness of their opinions, and produce the consequent adoption of those opinions. And what was the conduct of the States except Kentucky? What was the language of the party, then, who now profess a regard for the example of Virginia? They denied the lawfulness of the course taken by Virginia; and denied it too not upon a question of expediency, which alone is involved by the act declaring war, as the power is not denied, but a question embracing a construction of the constitution. Gentlemen advise us to desist from our efforts on the land, as Great Britain cares not for Canada. Sir, they are mistaken, as the force there and the allusion to it by the British Government serve to show. Stop, say the gentlemen, your war on the land. Raise an army to defend yourselves alone—quit the soil where you have the power to conquer, and go to sea where the enemy's force is all-powerful; do all this, and we will aid you—after peace in one line, viz: "Peace is restored between the United States and Great Britain," and we will assist you. I answer the gentleman, we cannot adopt your advice to obtain your assistance in the defence which you offer in behalf of your country. "Non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis tempus eget."

Mr. Chairman, we are now about to treat of peace, and the inquiry which each one puts to himself is, shall we have it? I say yes, because I sincerely wish it, and we easily believe what we wish. I say yes, because we seek it in the spirit of peace and justice. I say yes, because the only pretext which Great Britain had for refusing to make peace with us has been done away; and I will also say, if we fail to have peace, the Opposition will be the cause. The hopes of the Opposition for the possession of power, so ardently desired by them, depend on war alone in their opinion; and although I will not despair of my country by admitting that they can realize their hopes, even though the war shall continue for many years, yet Great Britain has been taught to believe this Opposition is a majority of the people; they have been repeatedly advised to discriminate between the people and the Government; and I almost fear they are deluded by these pretences; if so, it will require a seven years' drubbing to beat John Bull into his senses. It is said that the army is to be a paper operation, an idle threat, and Great Britain will not succumb to threats; so they were told in the Revolution; all then they said was mere threat, and they must fight us into submission. I differ with gentlemen as to the true policy of a nation at war whose views are sincerely pacific; while it offers the olive branch in one hand, it should grasp the sword in the other—not to threaten, for true courage disdains to utter a threat, but to show to the enemy that it is not impelled by pusillanimity and fear, to ask for the blessings of peace. Such a nation can make a concession if it please without infringing its honor; like a brave man, who extracts praise from his adversary by his actions, which if adopted by a coward would cover him with contempt. If we fail in the peace mission, and the dispute must be settled by the sword alone, we shall be prepared for the worst, and, learning wisdom from the past, we shall be formidable indeed for the future; then "let Greek meet Greek," and in the mighty tug of war, the conquered will preserve his honor. Our war measures are dictated by the spirit of peace; we will go on in the career of peace, and if it be denied to justice, it will be yielded to force; we will fight for it, notwithstanding gentlemen refuse their co-operation. The plea of some is, that the Government have no capacity to conduct the war; by others, that they have not and cannot procure the means of conducting it. These arguments are at variance with each other. When they wish to prove the incapacity of Administration, they say the means within their control have been adequate, and misapplied. When they arraign them for extravagance, they tell you the force was inconsiderable. I have made inquiries concerning the number of men in the military service for the first year, with a view to correct the statement of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFEY) as to the enormous cost of the army per man—and I find that we had

Making the expenditure about $300 each man, instead of $1,000, as by the computation of the gentleman.

We are informed, however, by him that ten millions of dollars are due for Army expenses, and the gentleman pledges himself there are at least five millions due, because, as he says, the claims were deferred at the War Office from month to month, in consequence of a rule that limited the expenditure in each month to one million and a half; and hence, in the scramble for the money, many claims were postponed for no other cause than a want of funds, and are yet unpaid. Therefore, the gentleman says he has a right to insist that the expenditure this year will double the appropriation. Sir, I deny the statement of the gentleman in toto; and I feel authorized to assert that no legal claim, properly authenticated, has been presented without being paid; besides this, advances have been made for the recruiting service, and for the Quartermaster's department. The gentleman seemed to think it due to himself to specify some case, and he refers to the claim of Virginia, which, he says, is an equitable claim upon the Government. I concur in the opinion as to the character of the claim of our State. It is equitable beyond doubt, and the admission of the gentleman that it is not a legal one is fatal to his argument, because Congress must provide for it before the War Department can apply the law. Gentlemen are not content with refusing to us the means of attempting to get money; they deny our capacity even if the means are afforded. They say the public land and improved lands of the country afford no basis for the capacity of borrowing. The capacity to borrow depends first upon the wealth of the nation, and secondly upon the ability of the money-holders. The first affords a security to the lender for the ultimate payment of his money; and the second, the means of borrowing. The second depends too essentially upon the first for its existence, for the wealth of individuals increases the wealth of the nation. The public land, therefore, may be fairly resorted to as affording this security, if it were not ample besides. And the improved land of the country is the substantial representative of the floating capital, as well as the solid wealth of the community.

The gentleman says we have resorted to oppressive measures to create a capacity to lend; we have compelled the merchants to abandon commerce that we may have the use of their money; that the farmers are told, because they cannot lend, of the value and importance of engaging in manufactories; and the merchants, because they can lend, that manufactories will be a losing business for them. Sir, the argument of my honorable friend (Mr. EPPER) has not been fairly treated. He said nothing like this. Speaking of the ability of the community to lend, he remarked, that the merchants would invest their inactive capital in the funds, in order that when commerce was freed from the impositions of decrees and Orders in Council, the merchants would be enabled to withdraw the capital thus invested, and employ it in its accustomed channel; that they could not, with equal facility, change its destination from objects of manufacturing employment, for the reasons he then gave, and they were certainly conclusive. My friend said nothing of the profits, but the investiture merely. As to the character of our measures, if it be oppression to prevent a treasonable intercourse with the enemy, or imprudent shipments of property, which he will necessarily obtain, and which will materially strengthen him to annoy us, I admit the justice of the charge. I shall say nothing of the motive ascribed by the gentleman. He says Great Britain will get your stock to the amount of one hundred or one hundred and fifty millions, and this should be avoided. If the prediction were to be verified, I answer agreed. I have no objection; it will be a lien on their friendship, and will induce the wealthy men of the nation to desire a state of peace, and therefore to have justice done to us. The gentleman denies that such lending by British subjects will add to our capital. The argument he uses is a strange one—the position he assumed is not less so. The capital of the nation is cash, if you please; and we want a hundred millions, which the British lend us, and receive our paper. Is not the capital increased one hundred millions? No, says the gentleman, no money will be sent. How then, I ask, can they buy our stock, unless the balance of trade be against us to that amount? If the balance of trade be against us, we must pay that balance in specie, and it will be immaterial whether we send the dollars or the stock; so that it will add eventually to the amount of our capital by retaining the money if about to go abroad, or by getting money, if no remittances shall become necessary. It will draw out, says the gentleman, six or nine millions annually; this is admitted; but whenever an individual finds it necessary for the purposes of improving his estate to borrow money, he will add greatly to its value, although he must pay interest on the money he receives.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen take great umbrage at the charge of "factious opposition" to Government; even when found opposing the wisest measures, which depend for their support on public opinion, and are maintained upon ground susceptible of demonstration; and they tell us the majority are a faction. Sir, the true definition of faction is not the spirit of the head but its members—a real majority cannot be a faction; there may be, by possibility, an accidental preponderance of a minority for a season, and if so, it is properly speaking a faction; but if we look to the examples of the wisest nations of antiquity, we find no instances of an actual majority combining or effecting the destruction of the country, which was always the tendency and result of faction. Greece, for example, under its head, was irresistible. But the factions began to operate on the members of the Confederacy; jealousies, intestine commotions, grew out of their intrigues, and the States were stimulated by Philip to civil war; and what the power of Xerxes could not effect by his armies when Greece was united, was produced by a factious spirit in the States, beneath which the grandeur and glory of the Republic fell. The example of Greece is fully in our view, and the same cause, the spirit of faction in the members, if it triumph over the patriotism of the people, will assuredly precipitate us into similar destruction. For the safety of my country and the last hopes of liberty on earth, I pray that this great national calamity may be forever averted.

Mr. JACKSON was followed by Mr. SHIPARD, of New York, who occupied the floor till the usual hour of adjournment, without concluding his speech in reply.

FRIDAY, February 18.

The Loan Bill.

The House again went into a Committee of the Whole, on the Loan Bill.

Mr. SHIPARD, of New York, concluded his speech against the Administration and its measures; the whole of which follows:

Mr. Chairman: If my honorable friend from Maryland, (Mr. HANSON,) as he observed, felt the task too great to follow the gentlemen who had so fully and so ably discussed the subject before the committee, I trust and hope that a recollection of what has transpired since, as well as before he made the remark, will be a sufficient apology in the mind of the committee, if the argument should droop in my possession. If, sir, a genius that irradiates and embellishes whatever it touches, approached the great and momentous question with awe, surely you will readily pronounce a lenient judgment upon the exertions of the humble intellect that engages in this contest with fearful emotions; that from no passion to declaim, no vanity of public show enters the list, but from a deep sense, a solemn conviction, that the bill on your table is a measure replete with ruinous tendencies to the best interests of this once happy nation. Yes, sir, a sense of duty has constrained me to take the floor, and in the language of expostulation, to raise my warning voice against a measure calculated to produce evils the most dreadful. Urged by considerations so serious and imperative, I cannot be silent; and although I may give offence, which is not intended, perplex and delay, which is not my object, I shall invite, indeed claim, your attention while the opportunity is permitted, of contending for my country's interest, and pleading her cause.

With these feelings, I must be excused if I proceed, notwithstanding the danger of giving offence to the advocates of this bill. And, sir, before your attention is called to the question immediately under consideration, I shall ask permission to notice a few remarks, made on the Army bill, by a gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. MURFEE,) whom I very much respect for his talents and integrity, and who in debate observed, if my doctrine was correct, and the nations of the earth should all adopt it, there would be no more wars; and because there would not be, inferred that I must be incorrect; and the strong emphasis used by that gentleman evinced the triumph he felt in a supposed victory over his antagonist, who had advanced opinions against usages on which depended the salvation of this country. Sir, the consequences drawn from my premises are admitted to be correct. There would be no more wars, if all nations adopted what has been stated by me as the only true doctrine.

And what then? Then, sir, there would be peace! Dreadful dilemma! What an unpardonable heretic the man must be that shall venture to maintain an argument in favor of principles, which are not only consistent with the precepts of the Christian religion, but, if adopted, would put an end to human butchery, and destroy the military profession altogether! I was not insensible of the risk which was run, in making the remarks that provoked the argument mentioned. It was expected that my observations would draw upon me the sneer and scoff of the sceptic, and perhaps the censure of men who maintain that wars are salutary, and tend to improve the condition of man, but it was not expected the honorable gentleman would have produced such an argument as he did.

Sir, I do most religiously believe the time is not far distant, when the clarion of war will give place to the voice of peace, and the arms of the warrior will form the ploughshare and pruning-hook of the husbandman; when the nations of the earth shall become brethren, and be linked in the chain of affection. Is there a gentleman in this House that could regret the approach of the happy time? Is there a benevolent heart in God's universe but would throb with joy, if the dawn of that propitious day was beginning to bless our world? Thus much for the argument of the honorable gentleman; and now, Mr. Chairman, you shall have my reasons against the bill on your table.

My opposition to that bill does not consist wholly in the idea, that it is avowed to be a war measure; but there are extrinsic objects which present themselves in formidable shapes, and which, I am of opinion, ought to prevent its passage.

First. By crowding the market in such rapid succession with loans—large loans—you cheapen the credit of your Government, and too obviously exhibit your poverty and dependence, and thereby produce a result much to be dreaded. The public stock will depreciate until the credit of the Government is ruined. I am much mistaken if this mortifying circumstance is not already in being, in some small degree, and which has arisen from the publicity of that bill.

While loans do not exceed the means of Government, stock, even at five and six per cent., is good property, and is subscribed for with avidity; but whenever it shall overleap the resources of the nation so much, that payment even of the interest becomes precarious, it is bad property even at twenty-five per cent.

Sir, no nation ought ever to borrow money beyond that sum, for the interest of which at least it can pledge a fund as security to the holder of the scrip, and out of which it will certainly be paid. By so doing your money is obtained at a low interest. These pledges of public faith are too much like your life-and-sacred-honor pledges; they afford no security to those who may wish or be interested in the performance, and on the whole are poor stuff; but if you ask for no more than can be secured, your stock goes into the hands of substantial capitalists at a fair price, and your credit is kept good. But, sir, go on in this way a little longer, with your laws to borrow, and the good faith of Government the only pledge, and men of capital will keep aloof from your paper; and if it sells at all, it will go into the hands of that class of citizens who are ever ready to risk, not their capital, having none but their personal responsibility, by buying in, below whatever is hoped may rise to par. Can gentlemen feel willing that the public paper shall be bandied about through the hands of unprincipled men, whose touch contaminates, blights, and withers? The bonus to be given for this loan is not limited; it is left to the discretion of your agent. He may sell your stock at a discount, which, of itself, would be proof of bankruptcy. There cannot be but one consequence of such improvidence—the ruin of your credit; and if gentlemen expect to continue the war, and satisfy its exigencies, by tempting the cupidity of Jews or note-shaving speculators, by giving eight, ten, and perhaps fifteen per cent. interest, or if they expect to borrow of those who borrow of the banks to lend them—borrow at low to lend on high interest—they must also expect that their war will be short; and, short as it may be, longer than the resources which are to supply it with means. And if any one expects a favorable result, he must feed his imagination on dreams that will never be realized.

Say what you will, sir, of the soundness of public faith and honesty, let the public be deprived of the means of paying, and how will their creditors be satisfied? They will not take their pay in public faith. Honesty, however valuable with means, is of no importance to the creditor without. Money lenders wish “to touch something solid.” Give them a guarantee, and you save the bonus; you save your credit; you save every way.

Should this bill pass, sir, and your stock not be purchased at all, the public credit would suffer extremely—the stock of the other loans will sink to the ruin of the owners. Well, sir, is there no danger of such an event; or do gentlemen flatter themselves that they can go on forever borrowing money, without a cent to pay it—without any fund from whence it can hereafter be drawn? If they do they must be disappointed; high interest must lose its influence where there is great danger that neither that or the principal will be paid. There is another evil much to be dreaded from these loans, bottomed on public faith. If they are taken up they endanger the banks; this effect has already been produced with those from which the money for the former loans was drawn; distrust excited vigilance, and hence the specie of the Union was suddenly put in motion. Let one bank of extensive business fail, and the whole moneyed world would tremble like an earthquake.

It is said we can pay the interest of our loans, and the principal may lie unpaid for a long time. By what means, sir, is this interest to be paid? Your commerce, from whence you derived a princely revenue, is no more. With your wars, non-intercourse, non-importations, and embargoes, you have dried up the abundant sources of income. It is true, notwithstanding the silly, unnatural and ruinous experiments which have been made with the commerce of the Union, by the vigor of its constitution, by the abundant strength it had acquired under Federal nurture, although smitten and wounded, it still was enabled to feed the mouth that traduced, and fill the hand that smote it. The last bold and deadly blow has ended its existence; all hopes of revenue from this once productive source must be abandoned; our last suicidal act has accomplished the great object—not of starving the enemy, but of impoverishing ourselves.

England, say gentlemen, borrows money, and yet their credit is not impaired. Yea, sir, England borrows money without jeopardizing her credit; and, if we would learn wisdom by example, we might do the same. Too proud to copy, we prefer a new policy, although engendered in moon-smitten brains, to the old, which experience has consecrated. England cherishes her commerce, and, in time of war, so far from abandoning, she doubles her patronage, conveys her vessels to the most distant climes, bestows every needed assistance, and as a remuneration, the Governmental coffers are filled with money. We might have done the same, and we, too, should be amply indemnified. But no, we will only imitate England in her worst examples—examples of folly—and instead of adopting those which would have a beneficial effect, in order to make all of a piece, we must have all wrong.

Will gentlemen venture a system of taxation, commensurate with the constantly accruing claims for interest and instalments of their numerous and large debts? Sir, the people will not submit to the unusual and oppressive burdens which taxation, equal to the object, would impose. They will seek in vain for a cordial compliance with such heavy requisitions, in the patriotism and loyalty of its citizens. Such expectations from a free people, long exempted from burdens, must arise in a mistaken opinion, that the patriotic spirit which animates the body politic is superhuman. I do not mean to doubt either the patriotism or loyalty of my countrymen in a reasonable degree; but I beseech gentlemen not to calculate for too much.

Love of country must and will depend upon the reciprocation of benefits by the rulers of the country. Do well by your citizens, if you intend to obtain a prompt and effectual support. Prove, sir, by your measures, a sincere desire to perpetuate the blessings of liberty, and protect the interest of your country, and you will then find in the affectionate liberality of the people means to answer all the exigencies of Government. You may for a while delude them, and by your slight of hand, your legerdemain, impose upon the understanding of the majority, but the moment your trick is discovered, you must be treated like other impostors, with their execration, if you venture to deceive them.

Let us now, sir, suppose our means to secure the payment of all these loans were ample, and thereby our credit was at par; where can be the policy of loading, not only the present, but unborn generations with debt? If we profess so much patriotism, let us evince it by our practice, act like wise and prudent politicians, sacredly regard the high trusts the people have placed in our hands for themselves and their posterity. Let us beware we do not attach to our memories the curses of those who are to follow us. The baneful effects of these indiscreet acts may be felt for centuries, and honesty and common philanthropy forbid experiments prejudicial to the interests of the future men of the Union. Sir, we are loudly admonished to hesitate and reflect well before we plunge down the precipice. As we value and would cherish the union of the States, cling to the constitution, and preserve the country from revolution and civil war, it behooves us to avoid loading the nation with debt. The example of Great Britain would be dangerous to follow in this respect; the different nature of her Government renders those examples hazardous to be pursued. The unity of her Government, its consolidated strength, enables her to bear vastly more than this nation will ever consent to stand under; divided into separate States, any four or five of which might form a General Government, only load the people, until they stagger with the weight, and they will throw off their burden and seek their emancipation, by cutting the bands which, though once pleasant, will then be thought intolerable. And, sir, the debt will be more odious when the inducements to create it are remembered. It requires but common sagacity to perceive, that when the factious necessity of loans and taxes shall be discovered, the enthusiasm of the moment shall retire, sober reflection resume the stand, that it will be known with what prodigality the money of the nation has been lavished, and how causelessly it has been involved in debt. The people must sooner or later learn that the surplus fruits of severe labor will be required gradually to diminish that debt. An elevated sense of justice and moral obligation alone will then induce them to drudge on through life, deprived of the comforts, luxuries, and elegancies, to cancel the obligations of folly, and redeem the pledges of profligacy, made in the delirium of resentment, and goaded on by the thirst of revenge, for injuries which existed more in the heat of dis-temper'd fancy than in reality; more especially as it will be known on what disadvantageous terms the debt has been contracted. Certainly, sir, if we dispassionately examine this subject, we shall and ought to fear that the people, rather than be doomed, with their descendants, to pay what was at least indiscreetly contracted, will barter their Union for a release in full, and abandon their creditors, obligations, allegiance, and Union, by one bold stroke.

Mr. Chairman, if all that has been said is unsubstantial, yet there is another ground which certainly is tenable; and although the reasons which may be offered shall fail to convince the advocates of the bill of their error, they will at least leave the consoling impression on my mind that they ought to convince; and, therefore, I have discharged my duty in offering them to the committee.

This money, if borrowed, is to be appropriated to the further prosecution of an unjust, impolitic, and unhallowed war; if, therefore, I had no other objection, I could not vote for the bill consistent with my feelings; and I design to vote for no measure which is avowed an auxiliary to the war.

Mr. Chairman, possessing the feelings and views of this subject that I do, I need not examine the causes of the war. On a former occasion, I attempted to prove that no cause could justify an offensive war; be the cause, therefore, what it may, I will not lend my aid to continue its prosecution. I shall only here remark, that the principal cause alleged ceased directly after the war was declared; when the news arrived, the people flattered themselves with deceptive hopes, that the Administration, being governed by the principles that generally actuate public men, would have put an end to hostilities before much blood was shed. But as one cause is taken away, another, which was esteemed of far less consequence, is made to possess vast importance. The impressment of seamen is now, as has been almost from the beginning, the ostensible cause of hostilities. Here, sir, I wish to be understood as saying, that in every instance where our native seamen have been impressed, I join the minority in pronouncing the deed execrable, and the perpetrators or abettors deserving of severe punishment. And as much as any man, I feel the strongest indignation towards men so lost to a sense of humanity and common justice. I have before said, and now say, if the evil exists, the Government have been remiss in omitting to provide a sufficient maritime force to convoy our vessels, and resist the aggressions. However, let it be remembered that the British Government pretend to no such right; they justify no such conduct in the subjects of the King; and if gentlemen on the other side are accurately understood, the war is continued for no such cause. The bone of contention is the claim on the part of the enemy, to take from merchant neutral vessels, in time of war, their own subjects, whether naturalized in a neutral country or not.

For those seamen are we fighting, and I am happy, on this part of the subject, to have the authority of an honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Jackson) to assert, that few indeed must be the number which has cost us much calamity, much suffering. That gentleman frankly admitted that few seamen were naturalized in this country; the nature of the case proves the correctness of the statement of the gentleman. Foreigners must reside in our country five years before they can become citizens, and seamen are not in the habit of residing on shore. We ought to presume that but few are naturalized, and still fewer, of course, are impressed.

This consideration most indubitably proves, that if the error was truth, that we are bound to protect such citizens on the ocean as well as by land, and avenge the invasion of their rights; that but very few of that description of seamen have been impressed. Admitting, however, that the number was much greater, the question then occurs, are we under any obligation to protect them, when their allegiance to us ceases beyond our jurisdictional line? Protection and allegiance go hand in hand, and who will pretend that a sailor on the ocean, or in a foreign port, owes allegiance to our Government? Whoever does, pretends without reason. The right to emigrate is warmly contended over the way. If a subject of a foreign prince has a good right to emigrate from his native country, a fortiori, he has a good right to emigrate from his adopted. If he can come here and be naturalized, and temporarily at least lay aside his native allegiance, no one can with reason deny his right to go back and resume it. If so, what becomes of this more than native allegiance? Sir, the position contended for by our Administration will not bear the touch of reason or argument. I understand the laws of nations to interdict expatriation; and although a subject may emigrate, he nevertheless is under obligation in time of war, if required, to return to the country that gave him birth. This is a right claimed by all civilized nations, and probably not disputed, until it was found to be a convenient subject of controversy with Great Britain.

Sir, I shall leave the further discussion of this question to other gentlemen, or to another subject, and shall only say, it appears very foolish to contend for a principle, which, if we could now compel our enemy to acknowledge, would be planting the seed of perpetual wars between us and the commercial nations of Europe, and would, in other respects, be sadly against our interest as a navigating nation. But the European nations will never be flogged into a belief that we are right; they know their own interests too well to yield to our demands; we must, therefore, either abandon this Executive phantom or doom our country to everlasting hostilities. Nothing can discover a more degraded state of the public mind than to see native American blood flowing to defeat the legitimate claims of a sovereign to his subject, and to maintain principles which I should much regret to see settled as a part of national law.

If our adopted citizens stay within our territory, it is admitted we are bound to protect them, and, by the act of naturalization, they are entitled to participate in all the blessings of our free Government; but if they will risk themselves on the ocean, where all nations have an equal common right, they must, and ought to expect, to take care for all consequences, whatever they may be. If we are to protect them there, the naturalization law will be a sore thing to us. Rivers of native blood, and millions of wealth, must be wasted to protect a few score of men, whose services can be but of little value to our country—men who, for a better price, would abandon us on the first fair occasion. It cannot be denied, that a vast portion of the foreign seamen have obtained protections as native Americans, by the perjury of their companions, and for such men our country and its citizens must be devoted—immolated.

Now, sir, let us inquire who are the men that most loudly complain for the violation of "sailors' rights and free trade." Merchants? No. Those concerned in navigation, the only employers of sailors? No; but men who rarely ever saw a ship or sailor. These men, who have not, nor ever will have any concern with foreign commerce or navigation, not only feel the most aggrieved by the impressments, but, strange to tell, they seem to know much more about the number and circumstances of the impressed, than the very men who own the ships and employ the hands, and we are considered guilty of a barbarous incredulity if we doubt the testimony of those gentlemen, when opposed to the evidence of men who employ the sailors, and who live in the great commercial cities of the Union.

Gentlemen from the interior possess amazing tenderness—they profess to feel a melting sympathy for their sufferings, and burn with indignation to avenge their wrongs, while the North and East, who employ nine-tenths of the sailors of the Union, are so hard they cannot feel for, and so blind they cannot perceive those mighty wrongs and agonies so pathetically described on the other side, of the suffering sailors kidnapped by the unrelenting Britons. There is good reason why they neither feel nor see. The evils complained of exist chiefly in the distempered imagination of party zealots, are seen with jaundiced eyes—hence, men with good sight and cool heads are not beset with these phantoms.

Mr. Chairman, I have pointed out the men who are fighting for "free trade and sailors' rights," and I have shown you the men whom gentlemen charge as being the enemies of both. Who are the former? Men who have no immediate interest in the subject of controversy. Who are the latter? Men who have acquired the support of themselves, their very subsistence, their wealth, by ships and by sailors. The former must have no experimental knowledge—the latter perfectly acquainted with every minutia.

The very sailors, sir, for whose grievances you continue the war, I venture to say have been, and still are opposed to your policy. They, like other men, must regard their interests, so far as to value the services from whence they obtain a subsistence. They can have no greater fancy for a system of starvation than other men. It is true, in profession, you are securing to them important rights; but in practice, you are annihilating the occupation for which they are only fitted; you have "taken away that on which they live;" you have robbed them of their bread. Before the war was declared, before any of those abominable restrictions which have maimed, crippled, and annihilated our navigation, were fastened upon it, the sailors whose interests lie so near the hearts of the majority, notwithstanding the dangers of impressment, had not the least inclination to abandon the ocean; the high wages allowed them all the support, all the affluence, the heart of a sailor desires—food, clothes, grog, and tobacco. How is it now, sir? in redressing their wrongs you have destroyed their rights. They have been, and still are, compelled to pine in want on your shores, live on charity, or seek that employment and subsistence, which their country has denied them, in the vessels of the enemy; yes, sir, thousands of the very men whose supposed injuries have produced such calamities to this nation, have sought employment from the nation whose barbarity, as pretended, fills the sailor's heart with terror and dismay.

The Loan Bill.

You will perceive, sir, the effect of your officious benevolence to the American tars; you must perceive the melancholy fruits of your overweening fondness to intermeddle with a concern you neither understood nor regarded. There is no fiction here; the facts are true.

Can you, then, sir, wish any stronger evidence of the impolicy of your measures than to see the foundation of your resentments pronounced—practically pronounced—fictitious?—the merchant struggling, notwithstanding restrictions, to gain the element where the Government pronounced his interests in jeopardy, and preferring the risk to the safety you tender him? The sailor, whose cause it is said we are fighting, seeking protection, employment, and support from his despoiler?

Sir, who can be so blind as to believe your professions sincere? that you have laid your restrictions upon commerce from a friendship to that commerce; that you have declared war from a sincere desire to benefit the sailor, or the employment by which he lives? Experiments are not green; gentlemen must have learned the baneful effects of their policy long before the war was declared, and the opinions of men who best know, and are most interested in giving correct information.

It is a truth, sir, no one can contradict, that the party in power have ever been the foes of commerce, navigation, and all their appendages. From Mr. Jefferson down, the benefit of abandoning the ocean has been constantly urged. Long have they contended that our true policy consisted in leaving altogether the carrying even of our own productions to the carriers of Europe, and become terrapins. Indeed, the object was entertained with so much fondness by the late President, that in the raptures of prophetic vision, his strong passion burst forth while describing the glorious day "when the planter and manufacturer should be seated side by side." And, sir, this pleasing mania is by no means confined to that great inventor of modern hydrophobia. The last Message of the President to this House at the opening of the session, after recounting the splendid victories and splendid failures of the last campaign, congratulates us upon one glorious advantage gained by the war, that the people have been driven from commerce to manufactories; that our losses and disasters are overbalanced by this acquisition. This, although not a literal quotation from the Message, is its only obvious meaning.

An honorable colleague of mine (Mr. TAYLOR) some time since availed himself of this text, when speaking of the army bill, and delivered us a comment upon it to enforce the truth of the President's statement. I need not multiply proof that the party in power, from the beginning, have been the acknowledged foe of commerce and navigation. What blind infatuation, then, must bewilder the mind that can believe this war was declared to maintain "sailors' rights and free trade!"

To rebut the proofs of the impolicy of Democratic measures derived from the opinion and practice of merchants, it is said there are no patriots, but, their affection fixed on their money-making business, their hearts and feelings are not warmed with the generous patriotic glow, and therefore their testimony is not to be relied on. Well, sir, if this was really true; if patriotism is a plant of such rare growth that it cannot flourish but near the heat of a tropical sun, or far removed from the blighting sea-breeze; if our merchants of the North do not possess this inland, sun-burned patriotism, yet they have some regard to their interests, and from those interests we are to expect a correct statement. If measures are to be adopted for their benefit, nothing can be more fit or natural than that they who best know their interests, and who will declare the truth to promote them, should be consulted, and their advice adopted. Learn their interest, and you learn the interest of the sailor and of navigation. Who, then, sir, but perceives the counting-house to be the most authentic source of information? To that ought the Legislature when about to enact laws on this subject to resort, and from thence obtain the fruits of experience, opinions founded on practice, and lay aside the visionary theories that haunt the brains of political innovators.

Much as gentlemen may boast of their love of the sailors' and merchants' rights; much as they contend for "free trade," the whole have suffered more loss and privation from those laws, enacted professedly to protect their interest, than they would have done for half a century from the British, adopting the periods of the greatest spoliations as the data of calculation.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against this bill for another reason. It must be unsafe to intrust in the hands of men who have exercised their powers with the most palpable partiality towards the two great belligerents; whether this has been done with good or ill intentions, need not now be determined. It is sufficient for me if so is the fact. To be sure I have formed an opinion, but the argument requires not that it should be expressed.

When the war was declared, the wrongs for which we are fighting England existed unre-dressed against France, in a much greater or more aggravated degree. Their decrees, which had made such merciless havoc among our vessels and sailors, it is true, were repealed, but no atonement, no reparation, had been offered or obtained for the injuries they had produced. If war was necessary against England, why in the name of justice was France exempted from the vengeance of our injured, despoiled, and insulted people?

Need I mention the decrees, by the authority of which our property was confiscated, because the vessel had been spoken with by the British? Need I mention that unprecedented outrage of all principle and right, a decree made with an ex post facto sweep, so as to catch in the infernal net of confiscation a large American fleet, in the ports of France, of immense value? Need I mention the impressment of our seamen, burning of our vessels, imprisoning and starving their crews, by the French? Need I mention the insulting letters of the Duc de Cadore, a Turreau, and others? Need I mention the shameful concealment of the repealing decree, until it was well known in France, that we really designed to declare war against Great Britain? These are all old and well-known truths, but they are no less applicable or authentic on account of age or publicity. They still exist as truths, and they still speak a language which cannot be misunderstood. From all these facts, sir, an inference results as certain, as conclusive, as the demonstration of mathematics. It is in vain to attempt giving any other construction to such prominent, indubitable transactions. Conviction flashes from them to the unprejudiced mind, and they speak a language too loud not to be heard, too plain not to be understood; sophistry and quibble lose their wonted efficacy when opposed to demonstration so perspicuous, so cogent.

It must create some surprise that gentlemen can acknowledge (and many if not all of them do acknowledge) the existence of these outrages, and yet argue or pretend that the conduct of Government has been fair and impartial.

If England had really been guilty of all the crimes imputed to her, it is too evident to be denied, that France was incomparably more guilty. I challenge gentlemen to show an instance of British aggression to be compared, in turpitude, with the French burnings and confiscations; or, insult in the whole British diplomacy, for unblushing impudence, to be compared with the letters of Champagny, Cadore, and Turreau. Why, then, I again ask, should we discriminate? There was no justifiable cause. With France we had a treaty, which was violated; with England, none.

If the Government honestly believed it was good policy to spare France and fight England, why has France been spared on paper? We have too many samples of the ability of the Administration to sould, to believe its silence in relation to the numerous and continued injuries and injustice she had done us, originated in any want of capacity to complain, and denounce with skill. Yet it is a fact that these enormities and insufferable outrages have passed in complacent silence, save now and then a gentle murmur breathed in suppliant tone, by our Ministers to his Imperial Majesty, or now and then a sentence from the palace to this House.

It is a truth degrading and disgraceful to the American Government and nation, that the same Messages which have been replete with anathemas against England, have contained but a single short five-line paragraph, and that "soft as the kindest note of love" against France: "That she had not in every respect behaved quite as she ought to, but all would be arranged agreeably to our mutual wishes, and shortly the two nations would be on the best terms of amity." Or that "The Emperor had gone to his wars, and of course no opportunity had yet offered to settle the little difference between us." This is the kind of complaint, Mr. Chairman, that for many years past has been made against a nation from whom we were enduring every wrong which it had power to perpetrate.

But, if possible, let us suppose all this had been done by our Government from the best of motives. It will not be denied that the declaration of war against England was calculated, if not intended, to aid France in the great career of universal dominion. The nations of Europe had bowed to the monster, wore his chains, or were fascinated by his spells. The "fast-anchored isle," alone faithful to her own and the liberties of the world, was then, as appeared to human sight, "the world's last hope." And the declaration of war must necessarily tend to take away that.

It could not escape the perceptions of the advocates of the war, that if we were capable of weakening England, we should strengthen France. Every blow we gave her was a blow to promote the slavery of the world. It in reality, sir, was forming an alliance with the French Emperor. We were doing all he asked. Only fight his battles, and he would consent that we should give a name to the relation in which we stood. The practical effect, and not the name, was important in the mind of the tyrant. This objection, if alone, was sufficient to prevent a declaration of war against a nation who had stood single-handed the shield of mankind; and at that time the power and attitude of Bonaparte threatened subjugation to the civilized world. The British fleet seemed the only barrier to check his progress in his ambitious and sanguinary career to a despotism of the globe. For it will be remembered that then the Emperor Alexander had not hunted him from the regions of snow; had not chased him with scorpion whip, in disgrace and dismay, back to his country. No, sir, he had not; but if he had, confident I am that this war would not have been declared.

I am sorry to say, sir, that I do believe, not only too friendly an intimacy with the Emperor

Napoleon, but a too severe resentment against Great Britain, contributed to the unhappy state of our country. I do fear, sir, that this war owed its existence more to the inveterate ill will of the Government to the enemy, than any sense of wrong which we have suffered, or disposition to obtain justice for this injured nation. The conduct of the ruling party, their language in and out of office, has ever bespoken the most irreconcilable hatred towards that nation.

I need not produce cases where the unfriendly feelings of the Government have been manifested. For since the party came into power, the Executive acts of the Government, the debates in the Legislature, and the laws of the Union, have kept time with the malevolent notes of his Imperial and Royal Majesty. Every attempt at negotiation has been but an attempt to convince England how detestable she appeared in the eye of the American Government. I need, sir, only refer you to the palace messages, to debates on this floor, to the State papers in your library, for evidence enough to conquer scepticism, and prove what riveted detestation of the English nation occupied the heart of the government.

The British Minister, Mr. Jackson, was immolated to Executive prejudice before he reached our shores. He was insulted afterwards, and driven from his diplomatic station with absolute rudeness.

The same Cabinet, which but just before could tamely crouch under a load of insult from the French Minister, became of a sudden electrified with resentment of a very furious kind at some little insult of Mr. Jackson, who was then accused of misplacing his words, notwithstanding the difficulty was so trifling, that the critic's eye has since sought, but sought in vain, to discover it.

The Henry scheme was another instance, not only of ridiculous pusillanimity, but evincing the avidity which the Cabinet entertained to seize at every circumstance that could be used as an occasion of crimination against the British.

Although this miserable project, which could not spring from a sane mind, failed to excite any feelings but contempt for the projector, it no less proves how much prejudice may derange a mind which once had some pretensions to knowledge, and the incorrigible nature of that hatred which shall induce a man to attempt the destruction of a gigantic antagonist with straws.

So open and boisterous has been the resentment of gentlemen on this floor, that no one could doubt the design of the Government ultimately to have a rupture with the British. And one gentleman in the warmth of his malevolent zeal, invoked "the red artillery of Heaven." For what use? "To unmoor the fast-anchored isle." Pious wish. To engulf in the ocean a whole nation—for what? Because they were British subjects. There was no other cause. And, sir, permit me to say, the gentleman but echoed the language and bespoke the feelings of the ruling men of our country. Such is the deadly hatred that rankles in their bosoms, they would impiously court the weapons of Omnipotence to gratify their vengeance. And why, sir, all this hatred against England? A nation who has done more to enlighten mankind, to encourage the arts and sciences, and disseminate the knowledge of the Christian religion, than all the world besides. By the pious enterprise of those people "the solitary places have been made glad, and the wilderness to blossom like the rose." The ambassadors of the Redeemer have been encouraged and supported by the English missionary societies to carry the Gospel among the worshippers of Brahma.

Is it, sir, nothing to us that we descended from them, speak their language, have adopted their religion, from them drawn our maxims of jurisprudence? Is it nothing to us that their Government secures the liberty of the subject, and the uprightness and talents of their courts of judicature, his rights? Is the similarity of manners, customs, and pursuits adopted here, to those adopted there, nothing to the American people? The constitution we all unite in commending, most evidently was drawn in imitation of the British.

With all these inducements to a good understanding, and with the adoption of the amazing value of British commerce to us, strange as it may seem, they are the last nation on earth whom we should favor, and the first in the implacable hatred of our Government.

England has her faults—great faults—for them I am not her apologist. When criminal, I would neither excuse nor conceal her crime. But, sir, the honest mind which would condemn her vices will commend her virtues; and although now an enemy, we owe her justice—to withhold it, argues a degenerate soul.

For these remarks I may be represented by some lurking fiend of a "Tyro" as a British partisan, but whether so or not, I shall be bold to declare the truth. Thank God, the taste or feelings of the majority cannot by law govern mine, and I am left free to judge for myself; and while I shall not seek to give offence, I shall by no means stint the truth, lest men who profess to believe no man a patriot unless he hates and detests Great Britain should be offended.

I fear, sir, the hatred of England and attachment to France originated from one cause—in the vile principles of a Voltaire and Godwin, and the whole illuminated fraternity. Principles which have been wasting the nations of Europe, since the French Revolution, and which have too long trampled over the virtues and piety, and consequently the happiness of the American people.

It is avowed by gentlemen over the way that a conquest of the Canadas is one inducement for continuing the war. On a former occasion, sir, I had the honor to address this committee, in opposition to any further attempts to accomplish any object attended with so much peril. Permit me now to say if you had the Canadas, if we could show ourselves capable of conquering this people, I fear we should pay too dear for a trifling object at best.

A gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. INGERSOLL) observed, that Canada must be conquered for the glory of the achievement. Sir, there can be no glory if you do the deed. Does the gentleman pant for such cheap glory? A nation of eight millions, and the descendants of men who in a mighty and truly glorious struggle, bearded the British Lion in person, and wrested from his paws our infant Independence, and hunted him foiled and dismayed from our shores! To deserve fame, we must do more than conquer the Canadas, the whole population of which is less than a sixteenth of our number. If, sir, the gentleman wishes to ennoble his country by great military achievements, and spread a lustre over this epoch of her history, why not march at once to the mouth of the Lion's den, clench him by the mane, and drag him forth to slaughter? If he can do this, and fame is worth fighting for, the end would then be attained.

Only invade the island of Great Britain, march through the country, and compel the kingdom to submit to your superior strength, and our nation then will make a figure in the history of battles.

[Here, on motion of Mr. NELSON, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again, and the House adjourned. The next morning Mr. SHEPARD proceeded.]

Mr. Chairman, with much pleasure I pay the tribute of thanks to the committee for their vote yesterday, to rise at a time when I was exhausted. By so doing, they have afforded me the opportunity of pursuing my remarks, refreshed and invigorated. Particularly would I express my gratitude to the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. NELSON,) for the motion to rise; perceiving my strength much impaired by fatigue, he declared himself governed by this motive, to give me time for any farther remarks I should wish to make. Sir, this motion and the motive which induced it, was truly honorable. It was what might be expected from that gentleman, whose magnanimous mind disdains a mean advantage over an antagonist. He therefore acted like himself. It is the degenerate soul that would steal a victory; the noble mind wins it.

Yesterday, sir, when the committee rose, I was observing, if national glory was the object, it was not to be obtained in the conquest of Canada. Permit me now to observe, sir, if a wish to compel Great Britain to give up her claims of impressment, as is most probably the design of the Government, the conquest of Canada would be equally futile; for you would be no nearer the consummation of your wishes than you are now. Sir, Great Britain is not conquered if the Canadas fall, and you have done nothing even then towards conquering of her.

A nation omnipotent—for a gentleman on my left from Louisiana (Mr. ROBINSON) really declared that she possessed the most of the West India Islands—in alliance with nearly all the Continent of Europe; pursuing with her allies the most splendid victories the world has ever witnessed; with her forty millions of black inhabitants in the East Indies, and a thousand armed ships upon the ocean, will not submit as conquered, if we should obtain possession of the Canadas. This powerful nation, who holds the destinies of Europe and the trident of Neptune in her hands, who at no period of her history ever had the fame, the power, or the friends, as at this time, will not give up an iota of her pretensions, because a speck of her dominions may be for a time wrested from her. If all Europe combined could not make her yield, what ridiculous expectations must we entertain if we, for a moment, flatter ourselves that she will now yield to us that trident of the ocean, when all Europe are her friends? Before she would do so, sir, she would meet you on the banks of the St. Lawrence, with a mingled army of Sepoys from the East Indies, with the subsidized Tartar, Cossack, and Muscovite; the Swede and the Prussian; the Spaniard and Portuguese; the African from his native coast and the West Indies.

France, with whom she has been long contending, and for which contest her armies have been necessary, is now driven within her ancient limits. Spain and Portugal are emancipated. They have broken the tyrant's chains and are again free.

England can now send her armies to Canada, and were the two provinces in our possession, they would compel us to surrender them, or we must wage perpetual war.

Sir, do gentlemen believe that that proud nation would consent to make peace while Canada was in our hands by conquest? Is it thus they have learned the British spirit? Let gentlemen look into their own hearts before they form a definitive opinion on this subject, and then determine if we were invaded and a State taken from us, whether we would make peace, until it was either regained by force or restored by consent?

But other motives induce gentlemen to wish for the Canadas. The Indians, say they, are perpetually annoying our frontier, and if we had them, this great evil might be remedied. Sir, do gentlemen believe that the extending our jurisdiction over that country would tame the spirit of the savage, and make him contented to cultivate the arts of peace? I fully believe that those children of nature will continue fond of war, until their minds are enlightened by science, their hearts softened by religion, their conditions meliorated by the improvement of arts. It is idle to believe that in their obedience to law, you will find security for their peaceable behavior, even if you had the country where they live. Depend upon it, sir, while the savage spirit remains, they will have war; and if two contiguous tribes will go to war with each other, there can be no safety or security to us, in extending our jurisdiction over the wilderness they inhabit. Do gentlemen discover what should prevent their retaliation of injuries upon our people, who may reside near or among them? Injuries will ever be offered them by the whites; that has been the case perpetually, since the first settlement of this country by Europeans. They either have been unjustly treated, or they suppose they have, and whether one or the other, will equally tempt them to unsheathe the scalping knife.

The Loan Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Revenge is a law with them, and they will ever seek this kind of redress for injuries: and this is not confined to themselves, but is handed down—the son fights to avenge the blood of his father, or the grandson his grandfather, or the descendant his ancestor. Think you then, sir, if we had this vast wilderness, the residence of the numerous tribes which are now formidable to the frontiers, they would want motives to butcher the inhabitants who should live near them? Sir, I cannot but think it would increase, rather than diminish this great evil.

If you obtain their country by conquest, you fix in the savage breast an hereditary feud, which may continue we know not how long. It is a far-fetched argument to my mind, that you produce a peaceful, quiet spirit in the Indian, by tearing from him his country by force of arms.

Another reason is given by a gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. HUMPHREYS) for conquering Canada—it would be convenient to us to have it. Yes, sir, and it would be very convenient for the Canadians to have the United States; it would not only enlarge their territory and the riches of their King, but would prevent us from molesting them; and, sir, permit me to say, they are as justly entitled to the United States as we are to Canada; and they have as much reason to seize our country, to prevent our incursions, as we have to seize theirs, to prevent the incursions of the Indians.

The only difference between us in this respect is, that we have the most power; and shall we, from the mere circumstance that we are able, unjustly despoil any nation, savage or civilized? God forbid! Honesty is the best policy, and "righteousness will exalt a nation;" rapine and injustice will depress and ruin it. In my soul I loathe and abhor that avaricious spirit, as well in a nation as an individual, that covets all the wealth, convenience and territory which is in sight. It is the base offspring of low-minded selfishness, and degrades man even below his fallen state.

And shall a nation whose country has been denominated "the asylum of oppressed humanity," who boast of their love of justice, and sacred regard for the liberties and rights of man, avow a principle which would degrade the Hottentot? No, sir. Let us exemplify by practice, that it was not in vain our country suffered so many privations, to erect here the temple of Freedom, and when our constitution was finished, we held it up in one hand to the admiration of the world, and in the other the olive branch, as a token that we would never violate the principles of the former, or for ambition and avarice stain with blood the other.

Why that burst of execration from our lips, at the foul deed of conquering Poland, if such deeds are harmless? It would require nice discriminating intellects to distinguish between the turpitude of the two cases.

The conquering powers there forgot right and humanity, in the plenitude of their powers; and had we power to take Canada, and did it to suit our convenience, we should be guilty of the same abominable outrage upon the principles of common justice; and much as the Indian is condemned for coming on our land, and murdering our citizens, it is no more criminal than for our people to go there and murder the Indians. The life and property of the savage are as sacred in the sight of God as the lives and property of the citizens of this country. If there is any difference we are the most criminal—on account of our superior opportunity to learn justice and humanity.

The Indian, from his infancy, is taught that revenge is a virtue. The religion of the Messiah teaches us that it is abhorrent; therefore by how much more we know our duty, by so much more we are guilty if we depart from it.

Mr. Chairman, there is still another objection to the war. You are about to raise nearly seventy thousand men; for what? To defend your soil? No; but to invade the soil of your neighbor. The whole of these men are to be placed at the control, to obey the nod of a single leader. Who that leader will be is not known. Confident I am, he will not be a Washington, a Greene, or a Hamilton. They are no more; and if their mantles have fallen upon any of their survivors, no one of those survivors has been invited or induced to take the charge of our armies. The conducting of the military operations has, as yet, been chiefly placed in the hands of men who have given you pitiful security of future glory. What can we expect, sir, but ultimate ruin, when the Government shall select to high command men who have not scrupled to sow sedition among an army led by Washington, or barter away the independence of the country for Spanish silver? What security have you, sir, that such men, with such an army, will not, in despite of your interdictions, become Cæsars and pass the Rubicon of your liberties? The public ought not to confide in the integrity of such men. The risk is too great; and to derive confidence of safety from the impotence of the army when opposed to the people, or by reposing on the loyalty of the troops, would be but wretched security. Should the arms of such an army, headed by an ambitious demagogue, be turned against the country, it would experience sad scenes, horrid discomfiture, and it would be a miracle if such a leader, holding out the immense plunder to be distributed among his troops, should not be able to merge their loyalty and virtue in the sanguine hopes of gain. What commander of an army ever failed to corrupt his soldiers if he attempted? Depend upon it, sir, we should have no security from that source.

These suggestions may be received with the fearless smile of incredulity by gentlemen who advocate the bill; but it is not weakness or jealousy that leads the mind to fears of this nature. It is a subject worthy of consideration. Men are still men; and the same lust of power that could tempt the Jacobin Absalom to rebel against his good king and indulgent father, might tempt your chief to seek a throne erected upon the ruins of your Republic.

When invaded, sir, we must have armies; but in that case, there is far less danger of any ambitious project to turn their arms against the country. In such case the people are most generally united by danger and necessity of common defence; but where you teach your officers, your soldiers, the lesson, and prove it by example, that the idea of justice and humanity is lost in the power of your arms, what else can you expect in case an ambitious and unprincipled man shall be placed at the head of your armies, sent to commit acts which lay aside morality and religion, than that he, whether he should succeed or fail in the enterprise, should attempt to profit himself by the means in his own hands? Sir, the man who could wantonly and wickedly attempt to promote sedition among the American troops in the last war, with the same black and diabolical heart, grown more hard by a repetition of vile intrigue and occult villainy, would not hesitate to seduce from their allegiance the American army now; and that man still exists in our country, and, much to the disgrace of those who appointed him, in high and responsible office.

This war, Mr. Chairman, is wrong; it was wrongfully commenced; it has been wrongfully prosecuted. Such a scene of ridiculous misfortune and defeat perhaps never was known. Why then make further experiments? Stop while you have any thing left. You have gambled away the national character, destroyed the national credit, and nearly exhausted the national finances.

Should a new army be raised, and a new loan be filled, the men and money are to be subject to the same indiscretion, the same profligacy; and, sir, prudence forbids that the public money should any farther be placed at the disposal of men who merge the dearest interests of the people in their own, or sacrifice to any extent the public finance in gratifying some favorite feeling or passion.

Six hundred thousand dollars of the public money was most imprudently put into the hands of a little Governor of New York, (I mean no disrespect to that gentleman, but that he was not a proper officer, to whom it should have been paid.) Why was this money placed in the hands of a Governor? Surely he was not a paymaster, or any other officer of the Union, and could not pledge any official responsibility. This money undoubtedly was a favor to the Governor, and secured his last election. Whether it has been accounted for or not, is yet to be learned.

If there was no other objection to this bill, it is enough, that the money, if raised, is to be handled by men unworthy of confidence; I mean not to say that all are of that description. There are good men in office—nor would it here be proper to discriminate. It is enough for my purpose, that the Government will employ agents who deserve not to be intrusted.

Again, look, sir, at the two campaigns already passed, and read the future fortune of the army; and, sir, the more perfectly to understand what has been done, I point you to a little book from the War Office, containing the epistolary correspondence of your generals. That pamphlet alone is a sufficient sample to show the total want of arrangement, system, or concert. Time will not permit me to examine its contents; but take it in mass, and it proves how badly every operation was contrived, how wretchedly executed, and the jealousies, feuds, and insubordination of the officers. General Wilkinson attributes to the disobedience of General Hampton the failure of capturing Montreal; and in the same letter shows that there could be no necessity for his aid, as he expressly states, that six hundred men only guarded that city, while General Wilkinson's army exceeded five thousand effective men.

I am no judge, sir, but military men pronounce leaving the forts in Kingston and Prescott, to pour out an army upon the rear of the Americans, "to scratch them in the back," as an unpardonable oversight; and I confess reason seems to fortify the opinion. Whose fault this was seems not to be determined; indeed, the statements of the Secretary at War and the commander of the army are so equivocal, that those gentlemen, some time after, seem not to know what opinions they had given. What, then, but a disregard to the welfare of our country, or some fatal error, will induce us to make further experiments which promise but to waste the blood, the treasure, and the character of the nation, in abortive attempts to retrieve our losses?

Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen opposed to us do not agree in their opinion of what is right, what is the law of nations; and although their difference does not prove that they are all wrong, yet it is strong evidence that one is wrong; if, therefore, they cannot agree about their principles, while laboring to maintain the same cause, they cannot complain of the minority for differing altogether with one of them.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. INGERSOLL) declared that he was well satisfied all

FEBRUARY, 1814.]

The Loan Bill.

[H. OF R.]

our difficulties had arisen from the denial of Great Britain that free ships make free goods, and he exhausted much time to prove the correctness of the position. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. JACKSON) frankly declared that no pretension was made, that free ships make free goods. In this essential and important point these gentlemen are at issue. Strange, then, they should so severely reprobate the opposition from this side to principles which they cannot agree about themselves! The gentleman from Virginia also declared that he would not have gone to war for naturalized seamen; while the gentleman from Pennsylvania stated that no peace could be made until the British would abandon the right of impressing them. Here we find those gentlemen contending against each other, not only as to the freedom of goods which have a neutral flag waving over them, but as it respects the only remaining cause of war. Shall the war then be continued, so long as its advocates really prove the right for which we are fighting is of a nature so equivocal, that the advocates of that war hold different language and different opinions as relating to the cause?

The gentleman from Virginia advanced one proposition which I cannot omit to notice. That "retaliation to be just must not fall on the innocent third party." Now, sir, I admit this to be true; and if true, what will become of the President's system of retaliation upon British captives? Their innocence is not, cannot be denied. They have no other guilt than every man who is connected in a defensive war.

This remark of the gentleman leads me back once more to the French. He made the remark as applicable to the relation between the United States and Great Britain, to show the unjust character of the Orders in Council, which are pretended by the British as a measure of retaliation against the French; and, said the gentleman, "if they intended to retaliate on France, they had no right to injure us." Be it so. And then permit me to ask how can the gentleman from Virginia, in the same speech, in the same section of his argument, justify the decrees of Berlin and Milan, as a retaliatory measure against England, for what he calls her paper blockade? It will not be denied, either that we are an innocent third party, or that we have suffered great loss in consequence of those decrees; and if all this be true, what becomes of the boasted impartiality of our Government in relation to both these belligerent powers?

The gentleman further remarked that the late President did right in sending back the Treaty of 1806. Sir, this act of Mr. Jefferson cannot be justified. In the first place, admitting the treaty to possess such demerits as required its rejection, yet the President alone had no power to determine the point; he should have laid it before the Senate. And, secondly, I venture to say, the ratification of that treaty would have been a glorious thing to our country; and those glories, its peace, happiness, and prosperity, have been bartered away to gratify the scruples, the follies, and resentments of the then President against England, and his unjustifiable fondness for France. Sir, that treaty was a good one. It was so declared by the Ministers who negotiated it, one of whom is now the Minister of State, the other Attorney-General.

[Here Mr. SHIPARD read a paragraph of a letter from Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney to the then Secretary of State.]

Such testimony ought not to be overlooked or rejected. It is too high, too authentic. And yet it is said, notwithstanding the opinion of those gentlemen, the treaty was so bad that it was not necessary to lay it before the constituted authority to say whether it should be ratified or not.

One further remark, in answer to the gentleman from Virginia, and I have done. He declares that "the enemy have more patriotism than the minority here, for that he presents a unanimous front against us, while we are divided; although his course is bad and ours good." It is true, that the enemy is united and we divided; but I cannot believe it follows that we are less patriotic, or that our cause is better from these premises. Whatever the fact may be, it would really seem, that union of a people in a cause was some evidence that it was just, and division that it was unjust. In the last war, the state of the public mind was very different. England then was divided; we were united. They then invaded; we defended. We now invade and they defend. And if any conclusions are to be formed from the facts, they are, that we are now wrong, as we were right in the last war; and that a common sense of justice has produced the union of the one and division of the other. Yes, sir, we are wrong; we have sinned, greatly sinned; we have shed innocent blood, and we may look for calamity and disaster; for the judgments of Heaven to light upon us, unless we abandon the impious career, and seek by repentance the pardon of our offences.

Mr. SHEEWOOD spoke as follows: Mr. Chairman, after the very able discussion which the bill upon your table has received from both sides of the House—after the minute financial examination of the subject, the acute analytical investigation of the causes and effects of the war, and after the energy and eloquence of my honorable friends, it may seem presumption in one of my humble powers to claim the attention of the committee. But, sir, I will endeavor to tranquillize any rising spirit of impatience by an assurance of my disposition to be brief; I will promise the committee I have no ambition to detain them long, and, were I ambitious, I have not the vanity to believe I could long excite the interest of the House.

I am opposed to the bill before us for causes intrinsic, springing immediately from the bill itself—such as the immense amount contemplated to be borrowed—the enormity of the interest at which the money is to be obtained—the consequences to the Government in throwing itself into the hands of money lenders. And I am also opposed to it for causes extrinsic, arising from the ulterior application of the money to be obtained, and the consequences of such application.

The amount contemplated to be raised by this and the other bill is thirty millions of dollars—five millions by Treasury notes and twenty-five millions by loan. We have already for the purposes of the war raised by Treasury notes and loans forty-four million five hundred thousand dollars. Pass this bill, and the faith of the Government is pledged for a new national debt of more than seventy millions of dollars. And let me ask gentlemen if they are prepared to mortgage the estates of their constituents for the payment of this enormous sum? But, sir, the time is unfavorable for obtaining this enormous loan. The stock you have already thrown into market; much of it is not, as many gentlemen suppose, in the hands of your moneyed institutions; it is yet in the hands of your speculators, your stock-jobbers, who, without sufficient capital themselves, have contrived by obtaining liberal bank discounts, pledging their stock as collateral security, to raise money to meet the instalments which have not as yet become due. If, however, the pressure upon the banks, which seems to have commenced at the East, and is rapidly travelling on to the South, should increase, so as to diminish discounts, the consequence will be, that a large amount of the stock will be thrown into the market and sales necessarily forced. Should this event occur, and nothing is more probable, stock will be below par; and at this eventful crisis, when your stock of about forty millions may be below par, or, to say the best of it, not above par, you are to inundate the market with thirty millions of additional stock. And let me conjure gentlemen, before they thus put at hazard the credit of this Government, to pause and reasonably satisfy themselves who will vest his capital in this stock. Are your banks to subscribe any more? No, sir, it is believed some have gone already so far as to endanger their credit. Are your real moneyed capitalists to engage in it? No, sir, they have been tempted and entreated by your speculators, but generally tempted and entreated in vain.

But gentlemen tell us our merchants, whose capitals are restricted from their accustomed employment, will, at the present moment, readily invest in this stock; in this calculation the friends to this bill, I believe, are also mistaken. Merchants have no inclination to withdraw from their accustomed pursuits, and it would be very difficult to persuade them into a course which would prevent their resuming such pursuits whenever the channels of commerce are unlocked. Besides, sir, the merchant and other capitalists fear, if you load your Government with such an immense national debt, that some of your Western States, who will never own a dollar of it, will find that shaking off all liability is the most convenient mode of redeeming their pledge.

Again, we are told that our stock will fall into the hands of foreign capitalists. We shall, by the magic operation of this loan, extract funds from the enemy to enable us to carry on the war; and the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who last spoke upon this subject, (Mr. JACKSON,) approved and enforced the argument. And is it come to this, that gentlemen on the other side of the House are willing to have the stock of our funds placed in the hands of British capitalists? And are they who were so sensitive to foreign influence—so tremulously fearful of the power of British gold, when a reincorporation of the United States Bank was applied for, now so changed? Are they who were then so much alarmed at the possession by British capitalists of four or five millions of bank stock, now ready to throw into the hands of the same capitalists five times that amount of your national loans?

But let me ask gentlemen what reason they have to suppose that British capital will be invested in our funds? The first inducement to such an investment would be a full conviction of the faith of our Government, and that idea presupposes the integrity of the Union. And is not the latter supposition in direct hostility to the opinions which the gentlemen on the other side of the House daily make and pronounce for the British nation? Do not gentlemen daily tell us, the British consider this Government "formed of a divided people"—that "we are ready for a dissolution?" And from such premises can gentlemen draw the inference, that our loan is to be taken by British capitalists?

The enormity of the interest to be paid for this loan forms in my mind another important objection to the bill. The last loan was negotiated at a fraction less than eight per cent., while the interest at the banks, and the legal interest of most of the States, is six; private credit and the credit of individual States, obtain any amount at the same per cent.; and yet, sir, this Administration, under the management of its present rulers, pays eight. Sir, if the Administration would exert itself to establish the credit of the nation upon a basis as firm as private credit; if it would show the moneyed men a redeeming fund, instead of driving back from your Treasury fifteen millions of annual commercial revenue; if it cherished the just interests of the people, and soothed and allayed instead of exasperating their passions; if it gave to calculating men a rational expectation that the halcyon days of commercial revenue would again be restored to this country; if, in short, the "restrictive energies" the "anti-commercial policy" of your Administration had not exhausted the streams of public revenue, and, indeed, dried up its very source, we might either have had in the Treasury a supply for our wants, or commanded it upon terms advantageous and creditable.

The gentleman from Virginia, to whom I just

FEBRUARY, 1814.]

The Loan Bill.

[H. OF R.]

alluded, tells us that in loaning money to the Government there is "no patriotism concerned;" the exaction beyond legal interest is "usury." Now, sir, I cannot distinguish between the evil consequences of throwing the pecuniary concerns of Government into the hands of "usurers" and those of a private individual. To the affairs of the latter we know it would be ruin. If these gentry once get the noose about your neck, they are as relentless as death; give them eight per cent., they will ask you nine; yield them this, they will rise to ten; and so, drawing you within their grasp, the gripe of the usurer becomes the gripe of death. If the Administration must raise this enormous sum, why not apply to the people at once and collect it? Is it fearful the people will see and realize the ruinous tendency of its measures? Does it lack courage to show to each individual the proportion for which his estate is mortgaged? Does it suppose, by shuffling off the "hour of reckoning," its political life is "yet to be spared another day?" Does it suppose the people had rather pay twelve per cent., Government interest, (doubling the debt upon them in eight years,) than each now to pay his proportion, borrowing himself at six, if necessary? I believe, sir, the interest and feeling of my constituents, corresponding with my own, hostile to a national debt, which thus feeds and fattens the speculators and usurers of your country.

Again, sir, I am opposed to the influence which will be given to the money lenders, whom the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. JACKSON) designates as lacking patriotism. A moneyed influence in a Republican Government should ever be rigidly and firmly resisted. Every member of every branch of our Government should be kept free from temptation; free from suspicion of such an influence, and clear from the contagious atmosphere generated in its use. In aristocratical and monarchical Governments, perhaps, the reverse of this general proposition is correct; and hence, perhaps, the maxim in such Governments "a national debt is a national blessing." But in this country I trust such a maxim will never insinuate itself into the progress of our affairs, so as to reach and blunt the feelings of the people. Who can deny, however, that with forty millions of public stock, recently issued to the avarice and cupidity of the nation, and with an almost equal amount contemplated now to be issued, that our fears should be excited?

I shall regret to see, but the period may not be far off, when speculators, stock-jobbers, and usurers, will swarm about your Capitol, thrusting themselves into the very sanctuary of your Legislature; infesting your lobbies and galleries; kindly devising and advising the laws for your enactment. So deeply interested for the public good, their precious time will be wholly devoted to aiding you in financial arrangements. The period may be at hand, sir, when you will see them moving about your palace, and the departments of your cabinet, disinterestedly helping your Secretaries to select suitable persons for the offices of your Government. Let this moneyed influence get the advantage of your means, and your Government will be to it "as clay in the hands of the potter;" it will mould and fashion it to its own liking. Yes, sir, let these usurers get foothold, and they will prey upon your vitals; you will see them hovering about your Treasury like crows about a carcass, croaking for the last morsel.

My opposition to the bill, Mr. Chairman, for cause extrinsic, arises from the avowed application of the proceeds of the loan to the carrying on the war of conquest in which we are engaged; a war, the retrospect of which humbles the just pride which Americans did feel, and, I trust, may yet feel; a war, the prosecution of which reason and experience forbid; for, in prospect, our country's honor, and its fame, and hope, are cast in the shade, and we can scarcely collect a ray of light to irradiate the picture.

In viewing the subject of this war, avowedly prosecuted for the conquest of Canada, we are naturally led to consider the causes of its declaration, the cause of its continuance, and the consequences flowing from its prosecution. As it is not my present purpose to detain the committee with a minute or critical examination of either of these topics, I shall limit myself to very few remarks.

But, sir, we are to be checked at the threshold of this discussion. We are told by the majority that the causes and consequences of the war are useless discussions; that war is duly declared by the constituted authorities of the Government; and to hold and inculcate opinions against it is to oppose Government—it is moral treason. Gentlemen have not yet gone so far as to pronounce the expression of our opinions as actual treason, but have coined a new grade of offence, and christened us "moral traitors." Whether this newly-devised offence of differing with the Administration in opinion, and assuming the hardihood to express such opinion on this floor, and in this nation, is to be chastised with the arm and the power of the Administration, is yet to be learned. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. JACKSON) has told us, however, when speaking of this new species of treason, that it must be put down; the Administration must adopt a new motto, put it down "peaceably if they can, forcibly if they must."

Now, sir, before this motto shall be engraved upon the tablets of the Administration, I conjure gentlemen to pause! The people of this country are freemen in sentiment, freemen in action; and, before you can abridge them of the liberty of forming and expressing their opinions upon the measures of the Administration, you must abridge their existence. Are gentlemen aware of the consequences of establishing this motto? The mere suggestion is calculated to lead the sturdy yeomanry of this country to the jealous point of daring, and the attempt to enforce it would bring upon us the horrors of civil war. Before gentlemen assent to this motto let them trace the effects; let them count the costs. This Administration never could enforce a doctrine so absurd, so tyrannical. Sir, the single State of Connecticut, adopting the opinion of a just right, which they believed authorized and secured by the constitution, could not be put down by the whole force of the Administration south of the Chesapeake. I regret, sir, that this subject, in itself delicate, could not have been handled with a delicacy better adapted to assuage and soften down the irritations of human nature; but it is an incident to the freedom of opinion and discussion to resist every encroachment upon either in the language of truth and firmness.

The majority find it very difficult to agree on the just cause for the continuance of this war. The cause assigned for its declaration, the British Orders in Council inhibiting neutral commerce to certain French ports, ceased with their revocation. Whether these orders were really just cause of war as against Great Britain, or whether they were merely retaliatory of the French decrees, has been so often and so ably discussed, that I shall not attempt to consume the time of the House on that point. Suffice it to say they are now revoked. They were revoked within five days of the declaration of war. Nor will I take up the time of the House to inquire whether the Orders in Council were revoked in consequence of the repeal of the French decrees, or the coercive effects of our restrictive system. I will only observe that the British were pledged to revoke their restrictions whenever the French decrees were repealed, and due notice given of such repeal. They redeemed their pledge—they did revoke them. Neither will I examine whether it was the deception of the French Government practised upon our Administration, developed in their celebrated decree, bearing date 11th April, 1811, (now universally admitted to be fabricated,) that precipitately brought our Administration into this war.

The ostensible cause of war was these Orders in Council. So said the friends of the war in Congress when developing the views of the Administration; such, too, is the report of the committee who responded to the President's war Message; and so wrote the Secretary of State to our foreign Minister. This ostensible cause, then, is removed, and yet the war is continued. On receipt of the revocation of the British Orders in Council, the British Provincial Governor proposed an armistice by land, and Admiral Warren seconded his views by a similar proposition by sea. Our Government rejected the propositions. If our Administration was disposed for peace, why not, after the revocation of her Orders in Council, and a proposition from the enemy for an armistice, why not accede to it? Could a moment more favorable have been expected? If the Administration had then consented to have stayed the arm of hostility and devastation, its friends would not have been driven to the necessity of hunting up other causes for the continuance of the war.

We are now told that impressment is the principal cause. The British contend for the right of searching neutral merchant vessels upon the highway of nations, and taking out such of their own citizens as they may find on board such vessels. This claim set up by the British, frequently operates injuriously. From the similarity of habits and language of the two nations, mistakes are often made, and American sailors have been the victims of the enemy's policy; but whenever they have chosen to assert and manifest their citizenship, they have always been released. This claim of the British has uniformly been considered as one operating unjustly, and every Administration, from the days of Washington down to the present, have made it cause of complaint; none, however, have thought it cause of war. The principal irritations growing out of this subject have arisen from British subjects claiming American protections. Many worthless foreigners, renegade Irish, Scotch, and Englishmen, have not only attempted to palm themselves upon British officers as Americans, but have actually succeeded in the attempt. These impositions frequently detected, and, perhaps, attributable in some measure to the manner in which American protections are obtained, operate upon the real American sailor by alarming the jealousy, sharpening the scrutiny, and exciting the tyranny of the British officer. My object being to show that this complaint of impressment was not considered as a cause of war, I have merely adverted to the causes assigned contemporaneously with its declaration, and content myself with the inference which inevitably follows.

Gentlemen who feel the force of these recollections are driven to assign other causes; and, what is not astonishing, when ingenuity alone is to be exercised, they do not agree as to what was really the cause of the war. An honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. INGERSOLL) thought it was cause of war that the British denied the doctrine "that free ships make free goods." Another gentleman (Mr. JACKSON) of the majority, showed that the British were correct, and if you allow the neutral flag to protect the goods that sailed under it, it might lead to the most abominable fraud.

Another cause urged by gentlemen is, that the enemy instigated the Indians to hostility against us. One gentleman (Mr. L.) said it was a "momentous cause of war" and he was surprised the Administration did not think of it when war was declared; "there never was so fine an opportunity for making a declaration of war." If this gentleman is right, then it is cause of just regret to the majority that they were, at that period, deprived of talents so astute and brilliant as his, for they undoubtedly would have had a declaration of war, surpassing in its effects the most finished proclamation of the present era.

A recurrence to the history of the session of Congress, in 1812, will convince this gentleman

FEBRUARY, 1814.]

The Loan Bill.

[H. OF R.]

that he is mistaken as to the fact of the existence of this cause of war. The Administration were certainly not unmindful of the great advantage such a cause would have had in enlisting the feelings of the community in a vigorous prosecution of the then determined hostility; a committee of this House was therefore raised to inquire specially into the subject; and, although a labored report was prepared and printed, it was thought most advisable to suffer it to rest undisturbed upon the shelf—not unlike another late voluminous report. The barbarity of the circumstances is more apparent than their authenticity is satisfactory; and opposed to this doubtful presumptive testimony, was the positive disavowal of the British Minister, Mr. Foster, of the connection of his Government with the Indian aggressions.

The Orders in Council have ceased. Impressment is a subject of complaint, not a cause of war. The instigation of the Indian hostility lacks authenticity. Our war is therefore continued without a sufficient cause.

If our cause was just, and the feelings of the people were united to avenge it, this Administration ought not to be intrusted with conducting it. The history of the progress of the war has fixed upon the Administration a character too prominent to be concealed, too just to be denied; its principal characteristics are impotency of management, and profligacy of expense.

The minority, who resisted the declaration of war, in a course of manly prediction and almost miraculous prophecy, pointed out its evils. They warned you, as with a voice of wisdom, against the delusive scheme of conquering the Canadas; they foretold to you many of the disasters which have since been realized; they warned you of the danger of your seaboard; and they conjured you to avoid the desolation of your Western frontier: these warnings were regarded not, but they cannot be forgotten, and the truth of them will add poignancy to their recollection.

A recurrence to the events of the war is but little more than a review of our disgraces. Whether we commence with the "planting of our standard" in the enemy's province by Hull, or terminate with the progress of our last Northern campaign, the result is the same. Our armies wasted, our means dissipated, and a fair portion of our country laid in ruin. Though brave officers and good soldiers have labored to support the sinking honor of the country, their efforts have been counterbalanced by the weakness and the folly of the plans and the counter-plans of the principal managers. The report of the Secretary of War, on the causes of the failure of our arms, develops most strikingly the weakness, if not the wickedness, of those who conducted the last campaign. An examination of this correspondence will satisfy any gentleman that, instead of your armies being directed by the united energies of your officers, petty jealousies, malignant hatred, and much mysterious cunning, have distracted and defeated their operations; instead of seeking honorable fame, achieved by great and glorious deeds, they seem to have sought that comparative fame, which elevates itself by the destruction of others.

I will not detain the committee to show the various changes of the plan of the Northern campaign; how one day Kingston was to be taken by a "direct attack" of the army, crossing from Sackett's Harbor, and the next day by an "indirect attack" by the way of Montreal; nor will I point to the cordiality with which the principal Generals so manifestly "harmonized" in the great objects of the campaign; nor shall I attempt to describe with what deep skill the prime juggler behind the scene moves the puppets for their destruction or his eventual fame.

When the war was declared, Canada was to be taken in ten weeks. All the power that Administration have wished, or could derive under the Government, has been at its disposal. Armies as large as the majority chose to vote them have been granted; money, as much as has been asked for, has been obtained; in short, Administration has commanded the constitutional resources of the country, and what has it accomplished? We now have actual possession of Malden, and imaginary possession of the wilderness opposite Detroit, while the enemy have possession of the important peninsula connecting Lakes Erie and Ontario, and of the desolated remains of the once flourishing villages along the Niagara. Such is the progress your Administration have made towards the conquest of Canada—so they have fulfilled their engagements of glorious warfare.

But, sir, the profligacy of our present expense is equalled only by the diminution of the radical resources of the country. The estimate for the current year, and a reasonable allowance for claims of indemnity, added to a loss of commercial revenue, will probably fall little short of one hundred millions of dollars; while a permanent irreparable loss to the wealth of your country, arises from the diversion of foreign commerce, from a change of the industrious habits of the country, and from a want of the necessary labor for agricultural pursuits.

Two years have nearly expired since we have been engaged in this contest, which now is generally called a war for "sailors' rights"—a war to protect foreigners against their lawful sovereign on the high seas. Were it to protect the naturalized citizen on our own soil, who mingles and mixes in the homebred duties of social life, every feeling of my heart would be engaged; but for the protection of such "sailors' rights," I would not sacrifice one native American. And yet, sir, for these "sailors' rights," have you expended millions and millions of your treasure, loaded your citizens with taxes, and sacrificed the peace and happiness of every class in society. In this war for "sailors' rights," have your villages been pillaged, innocence violated, the peaceful dwellings of your citizens razed, and a whole country desolated? Yes, sir, armies have been swept away, many valuable lives have been lost—not so many valuable lives, for into your Army, generally, you have been unable to draw men either valuable to themselves, or valuable to the community.

From all these considerations, I cannot give my vote for this enormous loan. If, instead of purposes of conquest, the majority would devise a system for defending our own soil, I would yield them every aid, however badly I think of the original cause of war, of its continuance, or the managers of it.

I know my constituents are unwilling to barter their lives and their fortunes for the conquest of Canada, and, with me, would withhold every dollar which is intended for that object. Yes, sir, I would bar the main spring of your political clock, and let your journeymen politicians wind and wind in vain; no longer should be rung, in melancholy chime, the dreadful notes of desolation and distress from Georgia to Maine, from Champlain to Orleans.

When Mr. SHERWOOD had concluded—

Mr. GRUNDY addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I had determined to remain silent during this discussion, and nothing but the extraordinary course pursued by gentlemen on the other side of the House could have induced me to relinquish that determination. Not satisfied with replying to the arguments urged by the majority at the present, they have assailed sentiments advanced by me at the last session; nor has this been done by one or two only, but by all who have addressed you; yes, sir, from the greatest to the least—from the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PROCKING,) down to the gentlemen from North Carolina, (Messrs. CULPEPER and PEARSON,) who spoke a short time since—this has constituted the burden of their song. But for this, I should have been saved the trouble of speaking, and you the fatigue of hearing me.

Before I proceed to an examination of their arguments, the committee will indulge me a few moments in taking a view of the subjects under consideration, different from any yet presented.

The Committee of Ways and Means have recommended to the House the adoption of a bill providing for a loan of twenty-five millions of dollars; the majority seem disposed to grant the supply asked for, the minority say it ought not to be granted—the question then is, which party is right? This can best be decided by an examination into the effects which will result from the adoption of the one course or the other. If more public good will result from the passage of the bill than from its rejection, the minority are acting erroneously. If, on the other hand, more evil will arise from its passage than from its rejection, the minority are acting correctly. You are engaged, Mr. Chairman, in a war with a powerful nation, on whose magnanimity and justice, judging from past experience, you can place no reliance. Should this bill pass, you will be prepared to arm the American people, and (should negotiation fail) meet your enemy in the field of battle; you will be prepared to assert your rights by the sword; you will exhibit your Government in the attitude which is most commanding, with the sword in the one hand, and the olive branch in the other, saying to the enemies of your country—Choose ye which to select. This is what the majority recommend. What is the course advocated by the minority? Disarm the American people, lay down your weapons of warfare, and do what? Ask pardon and forgiveness for your transgressions, and accept of such terms as the enemy will accord to you. Is this a course worthy of a great and free people? Would you not by this demonstrate to the world that you are unworthy of that liberty which you enjoy? I confess, Mr. Chairman, I am almost tempted to doubt the sincerity of gentlemen's declarations, when I look at the low and degraded state to which the country would be reduced, should the opposition to this bill succeed. Further, sir, by the money contemplated to be raised under the authority of this bill, you can comply with all your engagements; you can pay the officers and soldiers already in your service; you can support that navy of which all parties claim to be the patrons; you can pay the stipulated portion of former debts; in short, you will support the public credit; reject it, and you cannot pay those at present in your employment; your navy must rot, your ability to obtain loans at any future period will be entirely annihilated; for, once let it be ascertained that your punctuality is not to be depended on, rely on it, it will be idle to attempt to borrow. What, sir, has hitherto kept up the price of American stock at home and abroad? It has been that rigid regard to justice and good faith which has at all times characterized this Government. There are cases in which, probably, a government might fail punctually to comply with its engagements, and still the public credit might not be greatly affected. This would not, however, be one of those cases; because, in this instance, there would not only be a failure, but it would be unaccompanied with an honest exertion towards compliance. If, sir, the idea shall ever meet with public sanction, that one political party may incur a debt and their political opponents stand justified in refusing to discharge it, I pronounce that public credit is at an end, and this form of government will soon follow it. At the last session, a gentleman from New York (Mr. OAKLEY) furnished the best apology that could be made for his vote against the loan bill; but I have heard nothing of the kind from others; and even his apology was not very satisfactory. After the passage of that bill, he declared he would have voted for it, only he knew the majority were bound to pass it. He seemed justly to appreciate the importance of preserving the public faith. I thought the sentiment honorable to him; but I confess it did occur to me that he had adopted too easy a method to get clear of the trouble of doing his duty for himself. I did suppose that the better way was for each individual to do that which appeared right to himself, and not leave it to others to perform it for him. If, however, that gentleman can reconcile such conduct to his own conscience, it is not for me to censure or condemn. Who, Mr. Chairman, complain most of the defenceless state of the country? The very men who refuse to grant men and money for its defence. They say they need protection, and criminate the Government for the want of it; and at the same time use all their exertions to withhold from the Administration the means of protecting them.

Sir, members venerable for their age and experience, and more so for their pursuits in life, (for they profess to be the interpreters of the word of truth,) have said in debate that this is a wicked and irreligious war: and quote the expressions "Thou shall not kill," &c., "Love thy neighbor as thyself" &c., in support of this charge. Do these gentlemen suppose that the book to which they refer, the authority of which all admit, is so little understood that misrepresentations of this kind can be practised successfully? Can it be believed that that Deity, who, on many occasions, expressly commanded wars to be made; he who led his favorite people to battle, and was a shield and defence to them in the hour of danger, should condemn all wars as unlawful? These gentlemen have forgotten that the British Government, which they consider as the great promoter of Christianity, is in the habit of shedding human blood by her wars. Yes, that moral and religious nation is more frequently engaged in war than any other; not defensive wars only, but offensive foreign wars. Examine her history, and you will find that within the last six hundred and ten years she has been at war two hundred and sixty-one years with a single nation; and during that period she has never been invaded, though at particular periods greatly threatened. The same gentlemen affect to value the blessings of civil liberty, as enjoyed by us, and to revere the Constitution of the United States: and can they not remember that these are the effects of the war of the Revolution? If all wars are forbidden by the law of God, the Revolution was an immoral and wicked thing, and those who achieved it are liable to censure, rather than entitled to that praise which all parties unite in bestowing on them.

It is also alleged that it is unjust to invade Canada. In the Revolutionary war it was invaded: and I defy those who pretend they are the disciples of Washington, to show any difference in principle between the propriety of an invasion then, and an invasion now. Yet at that period the illustrious man who commanded the American armies, and all those who were united with him in rescuing this country from the unfeeling grasp of a foreign tyrant, decided that the conquest of the Canadas was just and expedient.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to speak on that point which produced the necessity of my addressing you: Moral treason—that sentiment expressed by me at a former session, which has excited so much sensibility, and given rise to so much censure. To whom have I ascribed it? Not to those who exercise their constitutional privilege of opposing measures before they are adopted by the constituted authorities; not to those who shall, even after their adoption, deliver their sentiments freely against them; not to those who shall fail to join the army themselves, or decline to loan their money; but to those who shall exert their influence to prevent others from enlisting, and shall combine together for the purpose of preventing loans from being filled. Men of the latter description, I did say, were, in my judgment, guilty of treason in a moral point of view. I say so still. It is an opinion which reflection has doubly confirmed; it is an opinion I shall never retract. So far from it, would to God it were written in letters of sunshine in the very centre of Heaven, that all the world might read. It is opposing the laws after they are constitutionally enacted; it is attempting to prevent the operation of the laws by other means than a repeal of them; and the latter is the only way in which I believe the effect of any law can with propriety be defeated.

Gentlemen who are so very sensitive on this subject had better look back a few years, and see how they thought and acted when in power, and perhaps a review of this kind will show them the true difference between us on this point. We say such conduct as I have described is unjustifiable. We advise, we admonish, we entreat those who practise it, to desist. Not so in 1798. The party then in power acted; they passed their Sedition law; they recorded their disapprobation of such conduct; and a republican member of Congress, from Vermont, suffered the penalties imposed. And, sir, recollect, this took place in what is called the quasi war with France, and not at a period when dangers assailed the nation on every side, as at present.

Let us recur to that law, and see whether its provisions would not punish those guilty of such conduct as I have censured:

An Act in addition to the act, entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States."

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That if any person shall unlawfully combine or conspire together, with intent to oppose any measure or measures of the Government of the United States, which are or shall be directed by proper authority, or to impede the operation of any law of the United States, or to intimidate or prevent any person holding a place or office in or under the Government of the United States, from undertaking, performing, or executing his trust or duty; and if any person or persons, with intent as aforesaid, shall counsel, advise, or attempt to procure any insurrection, riot, unlawful assembly, or combination, whether such conspiracy, threatening, counsel, advice, or attempt, shall have the proposed effect or not, he or they shall be deemed guilty of high misdemeanor, and, on conviction before any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, and by imprisonment during a term not less than six months, nor exceeding five years; and further, at the discretion of the court, may be holden to find sureties for his good behavior in such sum, and for such time, as the said court may direct.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall write, print, utter, or publish, or shall cause or procure to be written, printed, uttered, or published, or shall knowingly and willingly assist or aid in writing, printing, uttering, or publishing any false, scandalous, and malicious writing or writings against the Government of the United States, or either House of the Congress of the United States, or the President of the United States, with intent to defame the said Government, or either House of the said Congress, or the said President, or to bring them, or either of them, into disrepute; or to excite against them, or either, or any of them, the hatred of the good people of the United States, or to stir up sedition within the United States, or to excite any unlawful combinations therein, for opposing or resisting any law of the United States, or any act of the President of the United States, done in pursuance of any such law, or of the powers in him vested by the Constitution of the United States, or to resist, oppose, or defeat any such law or act; or to aid, encourage, or abet any hostile designs of any foreign nation against the United States, their people, or Government, then such person, being thereof convicted before any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding two years.

Now, sir, examine the extent of the provisions I have read. It is declared, that if any persons shall unlawfully combine or conspire together, with intent to oppose any measure or measures of the General Government, which are or shall be directed by proper authority, or to impede the operation of any law of the United States, &c. Suppose the first branch of the sentence should be construed to extend to cases only where open force was intended to be applied, yet the terms "to combine or conspire together, with intent to impede the operation of any law of the United States," would clearly embrace those who combine and conspire together to prevent the filling of the loans, and the ranks of the army. Observe, Mr. Chairman, in the second section, how careful those who now talk so much about the liberty of speech and of the press were to guard themselves from the attacks of their opponents. "To defame either House of Congress, or the President of the United States, with intent to bring them into contempt or disrepute," was made punishable. And this bill passed the Senate of the United States, containing only the two sections I have read, and without any provision that the truth might be given in evidence on the trial. Thus far I speak of the facts as the public records prove them to be. I examined them on yesterday. And I am informed by a venerable gentleman, then and now a member of this House, that, with great difficulty, a predecessor of mine (Mr. Claiborne) procured, in the House of Representatives, the insertion of the third section, which declares that the truth may be given in evidence on the trial. Without this provision, what would have been the condition of men prosecuted under that law? The principles of the common law would have been applied, and every gentleman of the law will admit, that in cases of libels, the truth could not be given in evidence in justification of the defendant. Here, then, according to the act of the Senate, the President and each House of Congress had effectually secured their conduct from investigation; and to the citizen who should arraign them before the bar of public opinion, truth afforded no protection. Have any attempts of this kind been made since the commencement of the Republican Administration? No, sir. And have not the President and both Houses of Congress been slandered, and basely slandered? The present majority wish not to hide their conduct from public view and scrutiny. All that is wished for is, that those who are opposed to them should so act as not to injure the public service. Those whose object is the public good need not the aid of sedition laws. They only need them whose actions cannot bear the light of truth. We wish to effect our object, not by fines and imprisonments, as our predecessors did, but by making it disreputable in the public estimation to injure the country by indirect means.

So fully, Mr. Chairman, am I satisfied of the correctness of the sentiments I have at all times entertained on this subject, that should it be my lot to be placed in a minority, however freely I might express my opinions of measures, no impediment should ever be thrown by me in the way of the execution, or operations of the laws, when once enacted, except so far as an attempt to repeal them might have that tendency.

A gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) had certainly not well considered the application of a sentiment expressed by him, or sure I am he would not have relied on it as a justification of the conduct of the minority in this House. He says, that opposition is useful and beneficial, and to prove this, he declares that had it not been for the opposition members of the British Parliament, the American Revolution would never have been effected. Grant it. We are in the habit of admiring and praising those who opposed the British Ministry during that struggle, because much good has resulted to the American people from their opposition. But if the interest of Great Britain required that she should retain the then colonies as a part of her dominions, have the labors of these men benefited their own country—have the people of Great Britain any cause to thank them for their exertions? Suppose the Opposition here should so far prevail as to compel the Administration to yield the great points in controversy between the two nations and surrender essential American rights—the same language we now use in relation to the Opposition in England, during our struggle for independence, might be applied to the Opposition in this country by Englishmen; but the American people could feel under no obligations to them.

The Loan Bill.

Another gentleman from New York (Mr. SHIPARD) said that we, the majority, are prejudiced against the religion of England. Sir, this is the unkindest cut of all. I had hoped that the vanity of the minority would have been satisfied in claiming for their party all the talents and political integrity of the country; but, not contented with depriving us of all respectability and comfort in this life, they even attempt to deprive us of every hope for happiness in the world to come. This charge we repel with indignation. If we do not make as many religious professions, it does not therefore follow that we possess less true religion than our political opponents. Sir, what does the gentleman mean by the religion of England? I presume he means what is generally understood to be the Protestant, in contradiction to the Catholic faith. If so, how small a portion of the American people profess the latter? They are few in number and respectable, considering their number; but, they neither have the ability nor disposition to excite prejudices against the religion of England. The great body of the people composing the present political majority, profess the religion of that country from which they descended, and cannot therefore on that account feel any prejudices against Great Britain.

We not only feel no prejudices against that nation, but we feel our partialities for it. It is the land of our fathers, and therefore we are partial to it; the English language is our language, and therefore we are partial to it; all our institutions, except those of a political kind, derive their origin from that country, and therefore we are partial to it; we are taught knowledge from English sources, and therefore we are partial to it. I confess, Mr. Chairman, I am under the influence of these partialities. But shall I, on that account, forget my own country? Shall I be actuated by such feelings so far as to permit that nation to trample under foot the sovereignty of the United States? No, sir, I love my country better than I love England.

The same gentleman has said, that that Government has done more to christianize the world than all other nations. Sir, look to India, and the crimsoned flood of the sacred Ganges will tell you what that Government has done to christianize the world. View the idol of Jugernaut, and the mass of human misery and death which is produced by an idolatrous superstition, which is not only permitted, but promoted, by this christianizing Government, for the express purpose of raising a revenue for the British Crown. Sir, a strong British guard is there kept to encourage superstition, and exact a tax from the deluded pilgrims who resort to that place to worship. That there are many associations of pious men in England, who have done much to benefit mankind, is readily admitted; but their acts are not the acts of the Government; nor has the Government at all times approved of them, else how did it happen that the missionaries Gordon, Morrison, and Lee, were not permitted to depart for India and China in British vessels, but were compelled to come to America to obtain passage in an American ship, in the execution of their mission? Sir, these things I should not have brought to the view of the committee, had not the strange course in debate taken by gentlemen on the other side of the House rendered it necessary.

Mr. Chairman, it is insinuated that the Indian war has been produced by the conduct of the Government of the United States. I ask gentlemen to show in what manner this has been done. It cannot be shown; so far from it, every exertion has been used to ameliorate the condition of that unfortunate people, and save them from that destruction which a war with the United States must inevitably bring upon them. You have sent your agents amongst them to teach them the arts of civilization, and, while your Government was thus engaged, the agents and traders of Great Britain were employed in preventing the progress of your labors. You sent your teachers, your bibles, and your testaments; they sent their rum, their trinkets, and their baubles.

Sir, during the last Indian war, and after the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain, the agents of that Government furnished the Indians with supplies to carry on their savage warfare, and ever since they have been busied in inculcating on their minds sentiments hostile to the people of the United States. They have been told, as the public documents abundantly prove, to be prepared to strike the blow, whenever a rupture should take place between Great Britain and the United States; and it was owing to their being overcharged with sentiments of this kind, that induced them to commence hostilities in the Indiana Territory, before the declaration of war.

Mr. Chairman, look at that Indian war which is now raging in all its fury in the Southwest, and account for its origin. What cause of complaint has the Creek Nation ever had against the United States? None is pretended; it originated in the manner pointed out to me by the captive chief of that nation, who is now confined in the town in which I live. When asked why his people had made war on the United States, he replied: "A letter came from the North; a council of the chiefs was held; we were promised arms and every thing else necessary, if we could make war on the United States; we were told that the British would assist us in recovering our lands and driving the people of the United States from them, and that the ancient order of things should be restored—upon these conditions war was decided on." This, sir, is the way in which Great Britain christianizes the world.

A gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. PITKIN) says, that the Administration has abandoned the ground first taken with regard to impressment, and an arrangement on that subject is all that is now expected, and not a formal relinquishment of the right on the part of Great Britain. Sir, a security against impressment is all that was ever asked; and to us it is altogether immaterial, whether it be by a renunciation of the right, or an arrangement by which the officers of the British navy shall be prohibited from entering American vessels and taking from them American citizens. And it only requires that this point should be fairly stated, to prove that the enemy can settle it whenever he is disposed to act justly towards this nation. It has been alleged by Great Britain, that her seafaring subjects, whose services she needs, escape from her employment and enter into the service of the United States; and to reclaim them, she has been compelled to permit her officers to enter American vessels and seize them. By the passage of a bill, commonly called the seamen's bill, this Government has declared that this pretext for impressment shall no longer exist, for British seamen shall not be engaged in the American service, and adequate provisions are made to effectuate the object professed. If then Great Britain is disposed for peace, this subject can form no obstacle.

It is said that England and her allies, since the late great events in Europe, are omnipotent. On this point, gentlemen may calculate too strongly; it is one on which no man in this country can speak with confidence; but it seems to me not improbable that the influence of England on the Continent of Europe has already or will soon cease. Hitherto the power of France, which threatened to annihilate the Northern powers, united them with England in opposing the Emperor of the French. But now, when France is reduced almost, if not entirely to its ancient limits, and ceases to be a terror to them, is there not every reason to believe, that having humbled the tyrant of the land, they will turn their attention to the tyrant of the ocean? Sir, I cannot believe that Alexander the Mediator, or Deliverer, if you please, will consent to surrender to Great Britain those maritime rights for which his Government has at all times contended. True, sir, while Russia was struggling for her existence, while a powerful invasion threatened the capital of her Empire, her maritime claims were permitted to rest, but they were never abandoned; and let it be recollected, that her maritime claims at all times have equalled, if not exceeded those of the United States.

Another gentleman from New York (Mr.

SHERWOOD) has told you that the subject of impressment was never considered as a cause of war. This has often been said before and as often refuted—need I refer you to the uniform sentiment of this Government for upwards of twenty years, and under every Administration?

Sir, all parties when in power have concurred in declaring it to be an evil not to be borne. It is somewhat remarkable, that however great the differences of opinion on other political subjects, in this all concurred. Mr. Washington, Mr. Pickering, Mr. Marshall, Mr. Adams, Mr. Stoddart, Mr. McHenry, Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, Mr. Monroe, Mr. King, have each in their turn declared the impressment of our citizens as practised by Great Britain to be a sufficient cause of war—and if persisted in, it would result in an open rupture between the two countries; and although gentlemen now say that this formed no inducement for the declaration of war, at the session when it was declared, yet examine the public documents of that period, and it will be discovered that it was considered and treated as a prominent cause of war. Indulge me in reading a paragraph from the first report made by the Committee of Foreign Affairs at that session; the language of the Committee is: "Your committee are not, however, of that sect whose worship is at the shrine of a calculating avarice; and, while we are laying before you the just complaints of our merchants against the plunder of their ships and cargoes, we cannot refrain from presenting to the justice and humanity of our country the unhappy case of our impressed seamen. Although the groans of those victims of barbarity for the loss of (what should be dearer to Americans than life) their liberty; although the cries of their wives and children in the privation of protectors and parents have of late been drowned in louder clamors at the loss of property; yet is the practice of forcing our mariners into the British navy, in violation of the rights of our flag, carried on with unabated vigor and severity. If it be our duty to encourage the fair and legitimate commerce of this country by protecting the property of the merchants; then indeed, by as much as life and liberty are more estimable than ships and goods, so much more impressive is the duty to shield the persons of our seamen, whose hard and honest services are employed, equally with those of the merchants, in advancing under the mantle of its laws the interests of this country."

I could refer you to other documents of that session containing sentiments of the same kind, but this I deem sufficient to do away the effect of insinuations made by those who were not then members, and know but little on the subject. A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHERFET) has said, that the number of American seamen impressed by the British has been exaggerated. How is this proved? By bare assertion, and not otherwise. The official reports from the American Government, show the number to be 6,257: this statement I will rely on until its incorrectness is shown. But admit it to be incorrect, Lord Castlereagh, in the British Parliament, admitted that 1,600 American citizens had been impressed; this admission is surely good evidence against the British Government; and recollect these are admitted to be native American citizens, not British subjects, naturalized in this country. Now let me ask the gentleman from Virginia, whether if 1,600 men were forcibly taken from his district by any foreign power, he would not say it was sufficient cause of war, and would not condemn the Government that would refuse them protection? I am bound to believe he would; if so, is the principle changed when they are taken from any other quarter? Sir, so long as we are one nation, the same protection must be extended to every portion of the community.

The Loan Bill.

[H. OF R.]

One word more in reply to that gentleman, in behalf of my friend from Kentucky, (Mr. SHARPE,) who is detained by sickness from his seat in this House. I understand the gentleman from Virginia as saying that his (Mr. SHARPE's) constituents were so uninformed on political subjects as not to have known of the existence of the Orders in Council until last year.

Mr. SHEFFEY here explained, by saying that what he had said was in reference to a statement made by a member from Maryland at the last session, and not intending to make such charge himself.]

Mr. GRUNDY proceeded. It is then a matter of very little consequence; I will, however, suggest to the gentleman from Virginia, that he perhaps should be the last member on the floor, who should provoke an inquiry into the comparative degree of intelligence and information which is to be found in different districts. I well know that my friend's district would have nothing to fear from such a comparison with the district represented by the gentleman from Virginia.

We are told, that before the declaration of war, the minority warned the majority of the consequences that were to follow, and predicted all the unfortunate events which have taken place; true, sir, they did, and much more; they told us that Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, and Charleston, would immediately be reduced to ashes, and the whole seaboard laid waste. What, sir, has been done? Havre de Grace, Frenchtown, and a few other inconsiderable villages have been destroyed; what else? "Let the blushing streets of Hampton answer!" Sir, the enemy has made no solid impression on the country; they have carried on a kind of warfare calculated to irritate and unite the American people in the prosecution of the war.

A gentleman from New York asserted that we are waging this war to protect a set of renegade Irishmen. Sir, he is mistaken. It is an American war, carried on to secure American rights, and I have the fullest confidence that the nation will support the majority in every measure calculated to give vigor to it, until it can be brought to a just and honorable termination.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I fear I am about to engage in a very injudicious attempt—I fear that the patience of the committee is exhausted, and that it would be idle to hope for their attention. It was originally my wish to claim their notice at an early stage of the debate; but I found this wish was not to be effected but by a competition for the floor, and I thought such a competition not justified by the nature of the remarks which I had to submit.

The object of the bill is to authorize a loan to the Government of the United States. The precise proposition before you is to declare what sum shall be borrowed; "twenty-five millions of dollars." Enormous as is the addition which is thus proposed to be made to our debts, could it be shown to be necessary to accomplish any purpose demanded by the honor and welfare of the country, it assuredly would meet with no opposition from me. Is a loan wanted, or revenue required to enable the Government to pay off its just engagements? To give security and protection to any part of our territory, or any portion of our citizens? To afford to our gallant Navy (that precious relic of better days) such encouragement and extension as may enable it more effectually to vindicate our rights on the element where they have been assailed? My voice and assistance shall be cheerfully rendered to obtain them. Let the present proposition be withdrawn, and let it be moved to fill the blank with such sum as shall be adequate to supply any deficiency of the revenue wanted for these purposes, and I will second the motion. Nay, sir, should the present proposition be rejected, (for while it is pending a smaller sum cannot be moved,) and none of those who are most conversant with the state of our finances should come forward with a further proposition, I will myself undertake to move the sum which shall appear competent to effect all these objects. But, sir, this enormous sum is wanted not for these purposes; it is avowedly not necessary, except to carry on the scheme of invasion and conquest against the Canadas. To this scheme I have never been a friend; but to its prosecution now, I have invincible objections, founded on considerations of justice, humanity, and national policy. These objections I wish to explain and enforce, and thus avail myself of an opportunity of discussing some of the most interesting topics which grow out of the alarming state of the nation. I fear that all I can do will avail nothing; but, sir, representing a respectable portion of the American people, who are suffering with peculiar severity from the pressure of this unfortunate and mismanaged war; who, with me, believe no good is to grow out of it, and who apprehend, from its continuance, evils, compared with which, all they have yet suffered are but trifles light as air; I should be unfaithful to them and myself if I did not interpose my best efforts to arrest the down-hill career of ruin. In performing this duty, I shall certainly say the things I do think. Endeavoring to use such language only as is consistent with self-respect and decency towards those who differ from me in opinion, I mean freely to exercise the right which belongs to my station.

Right! did I say, sir? The expression is inaccurate; once indeed there did exist in this House the right of free discussion. It was once deemed a constitutional privilege for every member to bring forward any proposition he deemed beneficial to the country, and support it by whatever arguments he could adduce; to offer amendments to the propositions of others, so as to render them, in his judgment, more unexceptionable; and to state the reasons of his dissent from any measure on which he was called to vote, and endeavor to impress his opinion on others. No doubt a vast portion of the good people of this Republic yet believe that such is the course of proceedings here. Little do they dream of the complicated machinery, by means of which every privilege except that of thinking is made to depend on the pleasure of the courtesy, the whim of the majority. By certain interpolations into our practice, but which nowhere show their hideous first front in our written code, the system of suppressing the liberty of speech is brought to a degree of perfection that almost astonishes its authors. A gentleman wishes to bring forward an original proposition; he must first state it, and obtain permission from a majority of the House to let it be considered, before he can show the propriety of adopting it, or ask even for a decision upon it. Thus is annihilated the right of originating a proposition. But a proposition is originated by others, it is passed through the ordeal of consideration, and he is desirous of amending its defects, or of exposing its impropriety. This is, perhaps, deemed inconvenient by the majority. It may give them trouble, or bring forward a discussion which they do not wish the people to hear, or detain them too long from their dinners. A new species of legerdemain is resorted to. The previous question, utterly perverted from its original and legitimate use, is demanded; the demand is supported by a majority. In an instant all the proposed amendments disappear; every tongue is so fettered that it can utter but ay or no, and the proposition becomes a law without deliberation, without correction, and without debate. And this process is called legislation! And the Hall in which these goodly doings are transacted is sometimes termed the Temple of Liberty! Sir, this procedure must be corrected, or freedom is rejected from her citadel, and wounded in her very vitals. Inconveniences also result to the majority from the tyrannical exercise of power, sufficient perhaps to counterbalance all the benefits which can be derived from it. Gentlemen often complain that the minority do not pursue the practice which is adopted by minorities elsewhere. In England, say they, the Opposition address the House and the nation only on the great fundamental questions involving disputed principles, and do not hang on the skirts of every bill, fighting the Ministry through all the details of their measures. Why is not the same course pursued here? The answer is obvious. Here the minority are not allowed to bring forward these great fundamental questions; they have no opportunity of showing their views, except such as may be casually afforded by some measure of the majority, on which they are good natured enough to allow debate. Unless they avail themselves of such a bill in every stage of it, as a peg on which to hang their observations, they must be utterly mute. Thus happens, too, that there is frequently not any discernible connection between the topics discussed, and the subject supposed to be under debate. Perhaps the very course I am pursuing is an apt illustration of these facts. Some weeks since I submitted to the House a resolution which I thought eminently deserving of attention; a resolution "that pending our negotiation with Great Britain, it is inexpedient to prosecute a war of invasion and conquest of the Canadas." This resolution could not be discussed, for the House would not vouchsafe to it a consideration. But, as on the proposition now before you, debate is indulged, and has assumed a latitude that seems to permit every thing connected with the war, I am willing to embrace the occasion to support my favorite proposition to which a regular hearing has been refused. Grateful even for this opportunity, I acknowledge the courtesy which has been shown me by the majority; sorely as I feel the degradation of indirectly using as a favor what, as a freeman, and the Representative of freemen, I ought openly to enjoy as a right.

The "no search" clamor in England of 1737, which the gentlemen have produced the Parliamentary debates to prove, had about as much to do with the belligerent right to capture enemy's property conveyed in neutral ships, as the "no search" cry made about thirty years afterwards in the case of John Wilkes and general warrants. The dispute of 1737, with Spain, grew out of a municipal claim asserted by that Government, and of the rigorous practice of their guarda costas to search British vessels hovering on the coasts of the Spanish colonies for prohibited articles designed to be smuggled into them. A claim said to be repugnant to the Treaty of Seville, and certainly very inconvenient to the illicit trade between Jamaica and the Spanish main; and a practice enforced with all that barbarity which usually characterizes the minions of custom-house and revenue tyrants. How far the establishment of the gentleman's project would be beneficial to this country is perhaps not so clear. At a time when we had no capital to afford employment to our navigation, it certainly would have been advan tageous. But since that period has passed away, the most enlightened commercial men will tell you they wish for no such innovation. Its effect would be to give us, when neutrals, the benefit of being among the carriers of the commodities of the weaker maritime belligerent for freight. But the effect of the old principle is to give us the profit which results, not merely from the carriage, but the purchase and resales of these commodities, with almost a monopoly in either market.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has assigned another cause for the war, in which he has obtained the concurrence of several of his friends—the instigation by the British Government of Indian wars. Although, sir, this theme of popular declamation has almost become trite—although the tomahawk and the scalping knife have been so often brandished with rhetorical ambi-dexterity, that their exhibition almost ceases to excite interest—yet, far be it from me to think or speak lightly of the cruelties of savage warfare, or to conceal my utter abhorrence and detestation of them. But it is a different, very different question, whether the Canadians have armed the Indians to join in defence against a common invader, or had, previously to war, instigated them to hostilities against us. This last charge I do not believe—no evidence has been given to warrant it that I have yet heard. Over the affair of Tippecanoe, the commencement of Indian war, there hovers a mystery which ought to be dissipated, but which the Government will not dispel. I have sought, honestly sought, for information. Of official there is little or none. From private sources not likely, in this respect, to mislead, (for they are friendly to this war, and connected with the Western interest and feeling,) I learn that the great cause of Indian hostilities is to be found where experience and history would prompt us to look for it—is to be found in our cupidity for their lands, and their jealousy and distrust of our superior intelligence and force. Indian wars have been, until a few years back, almost uninterrupted in this country, both before and since the Revolution. They need no other instigators than are to be found in the inconsistent views, interests, claims, passions, and habits, of neighboring yet distinct races of people. Sir, General Harrison's treaty of November, 1809, was the mine of the great Indian explosion. The Indians complained, I know not how justly, that in that treaty they were cheated of lands which the parties to it had no right to convey, and never meant to convey. There are gentlemen in this Legislature who know that Tecumseh immediately avowed his fixed purpose to vindicate by force and by union of the red men the rights of his tribe and the menaced independence of the whole race. And we all know (the fact is on record) that shortly after this treaty the British Governor General of Canada caused it to be officially communicated to the Government of the United States that the Indians were meditating hostile designs. Sir, the holy command, "thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor," applies even to an enemy. I will not sanction this charge without evidence, nor against evidence, lest I violate this high injunction. I am not a disciple of that new moral school which would construe this divine prohibition, as the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY) has expounded the commandment, "thou shalt not kill," as a "mere municipal regulation, applying solely to the Jews."

But this war, say its advocates, nearly one and all, was declared to protect our seamen against impressment—in fashionable phrase, for "sailors' rights." There is no doubt, sir, that the conflicting claims of the two countries on the subject of seamen, and the occasional abuse of the practice of search for British seamen on board of American merchantmen, had excited serious dissatisfaction in America—yet I hazard nothing by the assertion, that the question of seamen was not a cause of this war. I remember full well the characteristic special pleading of the gentleman from Tennessee on this subject, at the last session, "that he really could not tell whether, if the Orders in Council had been repealed, we should have gone to war about seamen or not;" but, sir, I consider this as little more or less than adherence to a cautious form, as a protestando, by way of excluding a conclusion, or in the nature of the commencement of an answer to a bill in chancery, in which the defendant takes care to save to himself, now and at all times hereafter, all and all manner of benefit of exception to the errors that may be discovered in complainant's allegations. I am aware, too, of the very conspicuous blazon which is given to our sailor's wrongs in the President's war Message, and in the manifesto of the Committee of Foreign Relations. But this proves no more than that, when war was determined on, it was deemed advisable to make out as strong a case as possible, either to excite the sympathy of the world, or to rouse the indignation of our own citizens. The impressment of our seamen was grouped in the picture with the dearly-bought Henry-plot, the at least dubious excitement of Indian hostilities, and the adjusted controversy about constructive blockades.

No, sir, the question of seamen was not a cause of this war. More than five years had passed over since an arrangement on this question, perfectly satisfactory to our Ministers, had been made with Great Britain, but it pleased not the President, and was rejected. Yet, during the whole period that afterwards elapsed, until the declaration of war, no second effort was made to adjust this cause of controversy. From December, 1807, with very short intervals, we waged against Britain a commercial war to coerce her into an observance of the rights we claimed at her hands. In every step of this system, whether embargo, non-intercourse, or non-importation, we avowed the grounds of this contest, and the condition on which it should terminate—the Orders in Council and their repeal. In April, 1809, the famous arrangement with Erskine was made, hailed by the well meaning as a second treaty of amity between the two countries; yet it contained nothing upon the question of seamen. In the President's communication to Congress, at the commencement of the war-session, November, 1811, enumerating, in no light tone, our controversies with Great Britain, and recommending preparations for war, the impression of seamen was not remembered. The Secretary of State was earnestly engaged in a correspondence with the British Minister, Foster, at the seat of Government, until the declaration of war; nay, until after it had passed the House of Representatives. The object of the correspondence avowedly was, to bring our differences to an amicable close. But, in this correspondence, the question of impressment finds no place, except incidentally, not as a substantive topic of discussion. And, in the official communication from our Government to our Minister in Russia, stating the fact of a war declared against Great Britain, and alleging its justification, with a view to be communicated to the Russian Government, [Mr. Monroe's letter to J. Q. Adams, of July, 1812,] his justification is rested solely on the British Orders in Council. These, then, were emphatically and exclusively the cause of war. And had it not been for very many weighty considerations to be found in the state of the world, in the nature of the war in Europe, out of which proceeded this violation of neutral rights; in the conduct of the other mighty belligerent, her injuries, menaces and intrigues, and in the peculiar condition of this country, actually growing into unexampled prosperity under the very state of things of which we complained; had it not been for these, and considerations like these, that, trumpet-tongued, warned us from the gulf into which we were about to plunge, the Orders in Council would have justified the resort to war. At all events, they formed what might be termed a sufficient technical cause of hostilities, much better than often figures, with conspicuous effect, in the manifestoes of Princes, under the specious names of justice, independence, and violated rights. But, sir, scarcely had the fatal step been taken, and the destinies of our nation risked on the fortune of the sword, when the obnoxious orders were revoked, the causes of war removed, and an honorable opportunity afforded of returning to the happy state of peace, commerce, and successful enterprise. How grateful must not the Executive of a country, whose policy was fundamentally pacific, how grateful must it not have been for this happy rescue from the horrors of war! How rejoiced that all had been effected, without a struggle, which it was the object to obtain by a bloody and precarious contest! Exulting to show, that when it unsheathed the sword, not passion but duty urged the reluctant deed, surely it hastened to return the unstained weapon to the scabbard, and extend the blessed olive branch of peace. Was it so? Sir, I never can think of the conduct of the Executive upon this occasion, without mingled feelings of surprise, regret, and anger. It cannot be accounted for but by an infatuation the most profound; an infatuation which is not yet dissipated, and which should fill every breast with apprehensions of that dreadful result, which in the wisdom of Providence, is preceded by the "darkened counsels" of rulers.

But it is entirely a mistake, says the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The Orders in Council never were revoked; they were, indeed, withdrawn, but under a declaration asserting the right to re-enact them, should the violence of France, acquiesced in by America, renew the necessity for them. Will the Administration, sir, bring forward this excuse? Will they take this ground? No, sir, they cannot; they dare not. The President has told the nation, that the revocation of the orders was substantially satisfactory; in his peculiar phraseology: "The repeal of the Orders in Council was susceptible of explanations meeting the just views of this Government." How could he do otherwise after his proclamation of the 2d November, 1810, declaring the French edicts so revoked as to cease to be injurious to our rights; a proclamation founded solely on the letter of the Duc de Cadore, of the 5th August, promising a revocation? Does the gentleman recollect the celebrated "Bien entendu," or proviso annexed to this letter: "Provided, that in consequence of this declaration, the British Government shall revoke their Orders in Council, and renounce their new principles of blockade, or America shall cause her rights to be respected, conformably to the act which you have communicated?" Does the gentleman remember the tortuous and labored efforts of Mr. Secretary Monroe to explain this proviso into a condition subsequent? To prove that it was designed only to exert the right of France to re-enact these decrees if Great Britain should persist in her orders, and we forbear from resisting them? Such a condition, subsequently annexed to a promised revocation of the French decrees, had no effect to impair its force; but the same annexed in terms to the actual revocation of the British orders, renders it entirely null! No, sir, the Executive cannot take this ground; his direct friends will not take it for him. In the emphatic language of the eloquent Junius, this would indeed "resemble the termagant chastity of a prude, who prosecutes one lover for a rape, while she solicits the lewd embraces of another."

But can it be urged, say the gentlemen, that the revocation of the Orders in Council removed all our causes of complaint, and left us nothing more to demand of the enemy? No, sir, this is not urged. But it is contented that, as the revocation of the Orders in Council removed the cause of war, hostilities should instantly have been suspended, and a fair, manly effort made to settle by negotiation all unadjusted differences which had not caused the war. A question of much importance and delicacy remained to be settled in relation to the search for British seamen on board our merchant vessels, and the occasional impressment of Americans. Under every Administration of our country this question had excited great interest, and been attended with much difficulty. Of late, indeed, it had, in some degree, lost its interest, and partly because of the comparative rare occurrence of the practice. The restrictive anti-commercial system had expelled native and foreign seamen in vast numbers from our country, and almost removed the temptations to an exercise of what the British claimed as a maritime right. For five years before the war the dispute had in fact slept. Subjects more important pressed themselves on our notice, and while these pressed, that was postponed as a matter for future arrangement. But out of these new subjects a controversy arose which issued in war. It had scarcely been declared before the matter in controversy was arranged to our satisfaction by the voluntary act of the enemy. What was our plain, obvious course; the course of duty and of policy? Sheathe the sword until it is ascertained whether the dispute which had been laid aside for future arrangement, and which, in consequence of the adjustment of more pressing concerns, is now properly presented to notice, can or cannot be amicably settled. Even tyrants pronounce war the "ultima ratio regum," the last resort of Princes. Nothing can justify the exercise of force but the inability to obtain right by other means. You had not supposed your just claims on the subject of seamen unattainable by negotiation, or you would not have reserved them for years as a subject for negotiation; and if they be thus attainable, how will ye answer to God and the country for the blood and treasure uselessly, criminally expended? This mode of thinking, sir, seems to me very straight, and quite in accordance with the good old notions of practical morality. Besides, it is the incumbent duty of him who seeks justice, first to render it. Whatever our claims on Great Britain might have been in relation to seamen, she was not without her claims on us. At a time when her floating bulwarks were her sole safeguard against slavery, she could not view, without alarm and resentment, the warriors who should have manned those bulwarks, pursuing a more gainful occupation in American vessels. Our merchant ships were crowded with British seamen; most of them deserters from their ships of war, and all furnished with fraudulent protections to prove them American. To us they were not necessary; they ate the bread and bid down the wages of native seamen, whom it was our first duty to foster and encourage. To their own country they were necessary, essentially necessary. They were wanted for her defence in a moment of unprecedented peril. Ought we not, then, while seeking to protect our own seamen from forced British service, to have removed from her seamen the temptation to desert their country and to supplant ours at home? Why need I ask the question? Your seamen's bill, as it is called, enacted into a law since the war, is an acknowledgment that this ought to have been done. However deceptive some of its provisions may appear, its very principle is to restore to Great Britain her seamen, and save our own from her service. Unless you believe this principle right, it was the meanest of degradations, at such a time, to pass such a law; and if it was right, then you had justice to render, as well as to seek. Had you pursued this plain path of right; had you suspended hostilities, you would have consulted also the true policy of your country. An unconditional proposition for an armistice, upon the revocation of the orders, or an unconditional acceptance of the offer for an armistice, would have passed for magnanimity. The disgraces which have since foully distained our military character were not then anticipated. The world would have believed, your enemy would have believed, that you suspended your career of conquest because the war had owed its origin not to ambition, but to duty; because you sought not territory, but justice; because you preferred an honest peace to the most splendid victory. With the reputation of having commanded, by your attitude of armor, a repeal of the offensive orders, you would have evinced a moderation which must have secured the most beneficial arrangements on the question of seamen.

It is not for me to say in what manner the dispute about seamen is to be settled. On this subject I have no hesitation, however, in giving my general sentiments. It is the duty of this Government to protect its seamen (I mean its native seamen) from the forced service of any and every power on earth, so far as the strength of the country can obtain for them protection. True it is, that in my opinion the number of impressed Americans bears no reasonable proportion to the number alleged. I live in a State which, though it carries on not an extensive foreign commerce, has many native seamen. At the moment of the declaration of war, the inquiry was made whether a single native seaman of North Carolina was then detained by British impressment. I could hear of none. I know that during our restrictive system many of our sailors entered voluntarily into the British service, and, when tired of it, complained that they had been impressed—instances have actually occurred at Plymouth and at London, of men surrendered as impressed Americans, who afterwards boasted that they had cheated their King. In the battle, I think, of the President and the Little Belt, a neighbor of mine, now an industrious farmer, noticed in the number of the slain one of his own name. He exclaimed, there goes one of my protections. On being asked for an explanation he remarked, that in his wild days, when he followed the sea, it was an ordinary mode of procuring a little spending money to get a protection from a notary for a dollar, and sell it to the first foreigner whom it at all fitted for fifteen or twenty. The protected alien assumed, of course, the American name, and, if impressed, claimed to be liberated under it. The examinations which have been had before the committee of the Massachusetts Legislature, and especially that of William Gray, confirm the belief that the number of impressed Americans has been exaggerated infinitely beyond the truth. But their number has been large enough to render the grievance a serious one; and, be they more or less, the right to the protection of their country is sacred, and must be regarded. The Government would forfeit its claims to the respect and affection of its citizens, if it omitted any rational means to secure the rights of American seamen from actual violation. Seek to obtain this security by practical means. If you cannot, by substitute, obtain an abandonment of the right or practice to search our vessels, regulate it so as to prevent its abuse—waiving for the present, not relinquishing, your objections to the right. Do all that can fairly be asked of you to supersede the necessity of the practice. When this is done, and you should nevertheless fail—when war is rendered necessary to obtain a practical and reasonable security for American seamen, against the abuses of impressment, then, sir, that war is just. Whoever may question its expediency, none who admit that wars may ever be justly waged can feel any conscientious scruples in yielding it support. This, sir, is no late opinion of mine. It has been long and publicly avowed—not indeed as a pledge to my constituents, as my friend and colleague (Mr. MURFREY) has remarked—we do not deal in pledges—but because it is my habit to be frank when no duty commands concealment. Nor is it strange that I should feel attached to the rights of American sailors. I am a native of the seaboard. Many of the playmates of my infancy have become the adventurous ploughmen of the deep. Seafaring men are among my strongest personal and political friends. And for their true interests, their fair rights, I claim to feel a concern as sincere, and a zeal as fervent, as can be boasted by any gentleman from the interior, or from beyond the mountains, who has heard of them but knows them not.

Has the prosecution of your scheme of invasion and conquest against the Canadas a tendency to secure these rights and advance these interests? This, sir, is a momentous question, on which it is the duty of every man in authority to reflect dispassionately, and with a fixed purpose to attain the truth. Unless this tendency be manifest, and morally certain, every motive which can be addressed to an honest heart and intelligent mind forbids its prosecution at the present moment. Make a fair comparison of its certain or probable ills with its possible gains, and then pronounce the sentence which justice, humanity, and policy demand; and a suffering nation will bless your decision.

It is not my design to consider the immense expenditure which this scheme has cost, and which a continuance of it will cost to this country. Well worthy is this topic of consideration, especially at a moment when industry is without encouragement, and external revenue is utterly destroyed. But it has been examined with great ability by gentlemen who have preceded me, especially by the gentlemen from Connecticut and Virginia, (Mr. PITKIN and Mr. SHEFFERT,) and contenting myself with an earnest request, that their remarks be not forgotten, and that in your zeal for conquest you do not beggar your people, I hasten to present other views which have not been so fully unfolded.

There is something in the character of a war made upon the people of a country to force them to abandon a Government which they cherish, and to become the subjects or associates of their invaders, which necessarily involves calamities beyond those incident to ordinary wars. Among us some remain who remember the honors of the invasion of the Revolution—"and others of us have hung with reverence on the lips of narrative old age as it related the interesting tale." Such a war is not between those only who seek for renown in military achievements, or the more humble mercenaries "whose business 'tis to die." It breaks in upon all the charities of domestic life, and interrupts all the pursuits of industry. The peasant quits his plough, and the mechanic is hurried from his shop to commence without apprenticeship the exercise of the trade of death. The irregularity of the resistance which is opposed to the invader, its occasional obstinacy and occasional intermission, provoking every bad passion of his soldiery, is the excuse for plunder, lust, and cruelty. These atrocities exasperate the sufferers to revenge; and every weapon which anger can supply, and every device which ingenious hatred can conceive, is used to inflict vengeance on the detested foe. There is yet a more horrible war than this. As there is no anger so deadly as the anger of a friend, there is no war so ferocious as that which is waged between men of the same blood, and formerly connected by the closest ties of affection. The pen of the historian confesses its inability to describe, the fervid fancy of the poet cannot realize, the horrors of a civil war. This invasion of Canada involves the miseries of both these species of war. You carry fire and sword amongst a people who are "united against you (say your Generals) to a man"—amongst a people who, happy in themselves, and satisfied with their condition, view you not as coming to emancipate them from thralldom, but to reduce them to a foreign yoke. A people long and intimately connected with the bordering inhabitants of our country by commercial intercourse, by the ties of hospitality, by bonds of affinity and blood—a people, as to every social and individual purpose, long identified with your own. It must be that such a war will rouse a spirit of sanguinary ferocity, that will overleap every holy barrier of nature and venerable usage of civilization. Where will you find an authenticated instance of this ferocity, that more instantaneously compels the shuddering abhorrence of the heart, than the fact asserted by my eloquent friend from New Hampshire? (Mr. WEBSTER.) "The bayonet of the brother has been actually opposed to the breast of the brother." Merciful Heaven! That those who have been rocked in the same cradle by the same maternal hand—who have imbibed the first genial nourishment of infant existence from the same blessed source, should be forced to contend in impious strife for the destruction of that being derived from their common parent! It should not be so! Every feeling of our nature cries aloud against it!

One subject is intimately connected with this Canadian war, which demands the most thorough and deliberate examination. I tremble to approach it thus incidentally, lest I injure the cause of humanity and truth, by a cursory vindication. And yet I dare not altogether omit it, because I fear an opportunity of full consideration will not be presented, and it is of an urgency and a magnitude that forbid it to be overlooked. I mean, sir, the falsely-called system of retaliation, which threatens to impart to the war a character of barbarity which has not its parallel in the modern annals of Christendom. Twenty-three persons of our invading army who were taken prisoners by the enemy at the battle of Queenstown, in Canada, have been sent to England as British subjects, to be tried for treason. To deter the enemy from executing the law upon these unhappy men, our Executive has ordered into close custody, an equal number—not of American citizens invading our country—(this would, indeed, be retaliation)—but of British prisoners who have committed no crime. It is avowed that these shall be put to instantaneous death, if the men sent to England should be convicted and executed. The British Government has proceeded, in return, to confine a corresponding number of Americans, as hostages for the safety of the British prisoners, under the same determination and avowal. This has again been retaliated on our side, and the retaliation retorted by the enemy, so that an indiscriminate and universal destruction of the prisoners on each side is the menaced consequence of the execution of one of the presumed Englishmen ordered home for trial.

With the fundamental laws of England in relation to this subject, we have a perfect acquaintance. In general, every man is there at liberty to quit the kingdom, to pursue abroad such occupations, and enter into such engagements as he may find beneficial; but on the express condition that he shall not violate his faith to his sovereign, the first great duty of which is, not to invade his territories and war against his subjects. I was surprised to hear a gentleman from Kentucky, whose good sense and independence I much respect, (Mr. MONTGOMERY,) argue that the permission to a British subject to leave his country, was an implied consent that he might throw off all allegiance to it. Such an implication is done away by the very terms of the permission. The law is as old as Magna Charta, and has been uniform down to this day. "Licuit unicuique de cetero exire de regno nostro, et redire salvo et secure, per terram et per aquam, salvo fide nostra."—28d article Abbott's edition of Magna Charta. "It may be lawful for every one hereafter to go out of our kingdom, and return safely and securely, by land and by sea, saving his faith to us." In the reign of Elizabeth, occurred the case of Dr. Story, which gentlemen will find accurately reported.—2d Dyer, 298, b. 804. A native of England, he had long quitted that country; had become a subject of Philip of Spain, and had actually been received as Ambassador, from Philip at the English Court. He was indicted for treason; he pleaded the fact of his having become a Spanish subject; the plea was overruled; he was convicted and executed. The case of Colonel Townly occurred in 1746. He was indicted for treason in aiding in the rebellion of 1745; was convicted and executed; notwithstanding the fact of his having become a French subject, and bearing a French commission. The case of Æneas McDonald, in the same year, was more remarkable. He had left Scotland, his native land, a mere infant, and ever afterwards resided in France. As a subject of the King of France, and an officer in his army, he accompanied the Pretender in 1745; was taken prisoner, indicted for treason, and convicted. He was, indeed, not executed. The hardship of his fate excited commiseration; and, upon the recommendation of his jury to mercy, his sentence was commuted to perpetual banishment. It is vain to multiply proofs. Nothing can be more certain than the English law, in relation to its subjects naturalized abroad, waging war against their country. The law of France is more strict, and equally precise. The edict of Trianon, of 28d August, 1818, with great decision, declares—"No Frenchman can be naturalized abroad without our consent," (that is of the Emperor;) and that "Frenchmen naturalized abroad even without our permission, can at no time carry arms against France, under pain of being indicted in our courts, and condemned to the punishment enacted in the penal code."—Book 8, c. 57. During the French Revolution, in 1795, a corps of emigrants, whom oppression and brutal violence had compelled to quit their country, formed themselves into an army in the pay and employment of Britain, and as such engaged in the ill-fated expedition to Quiberon. They were made prisoners, and executed as traitors. What is our own law? In every State of the Union, except Virginia, it is precisely the law which obtains in Great Britain—no man shall exempt himself from the obligation not to war against his country; and, in Virginia, even, he can only get rid of this obligation by observing the stipulated forms which its law prescribes. Naturalization granted in another country has no effect whatever to destroy his original primary allegiance. A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPES) informed us that, under a British statute, two years voluntary service in their navy, ipso facto, naturalized a foreigner. Be it so, sir. Let us suppose that during our restrictions on commerce, an American citizen, a Virginian for instance, who had not gone through the stipulated formalities of expatriation, had entered on board the British navy, and after serving there two years, and thus becoming a naturalized subject of George III., had infamously joined in the invasion of his native land. Suppose this miscreant taken prisoner, heading a hostile band at the burning of Havre, or at the atrocious outrages of Hampton, and arraigned for treason in levying war against the United States, what defence could be made for him? Is there a gentleman in the House, with any pretensions to legal science, who will so far hazard his reputation as to allege that a defence could be made for him? Is there a judge in our land, from those who adorn the bench of our Supreme Court down to the humblest in capacity and office, who could be even amused by the miserable sophistry that naturalization in Britain repealed our law of treason? No, sir, the traitor would be condemned—inevitably condemned; and if the President were frightened from executing the sentence, by an insolent threat from Britain to put innocent Americans to death in revenge for the just doom of the convict, he would encounter the contempt and execration of his country. How is it, then, that we undertake, by such menaces, to deter the enemy from executing a like law, under like circumstances, against her unnatural children?

Unless I am greatly deceived, the law of England must be suffered to have its course with the individuals, if natives of England, and migrating to us since the Revolution, who are sent thither for trial. Whether they ought to be executed, if convicted, is a very different question. Considering the intimate connection with common origin, language, and manners, and intimate commerce, has heretofore induced between the countries, and the consequent interchange of their inhabitants; remembering, too, that general laws are often cruel in their application to particular cases, the Executive authority in that country is bound by the strongest motives to consult the dictates of humanity, and forbear the too rigorous exercise of right. But if these considerations should not there prevail, and the severe penalty of the law of treason is exacted, as of right it may be, shall we, without right, without the semblance of law, coldly murder those who are in our power who have committed no treason against us, and against whom crime is not pretended? Is this called retaliation? Britain executes British traitors serving in the American army, regularly tried and convicted of treason, and we, in return, execute—whom? American traitors, serving in the British army, and convicted of treason? No, but faithful loyal men, bearing arms in the cause of their native country! tried by no law! offenders against no law! Sir, the pretension is monstrous? I have met with no instance of such a pretension being ever asserted in a civilized country. Did Philip of Spain retaliate in this way for the execution of Dr. Story? Did France retaliate for the execution of Colonel Townly? Did Britain thus retaliate for the execution of the French emigrants taken at Quiberon? I have heard it said that Napper Tandy, an Irishman, naturalized in France, was surrendered upon a threat of retaliation from France. I doubt the fact—the only evidence of it is in a note to an evidently partial and one-sided account of his trial in a collection of Curran's Speeches. In no authentic register have I been able to find it. But, if it were true, the note itself states that the ground on which he was demanded, was not that he had been naturalized by France, and therefore not liable to be executed for treason; but because he had been unjustly seized at Hamburg, in neutral territory, and ought to be returned. Theobald Wolfe Tone, Tandy's associate, and, like him, an officer of France, but not like him, arrested in a violated neutral territory, was neither demanded nor delivered. Condemned to death, he changed the mode of its execution by committing suicide. And shall my country, claiming to excel in humanity, as it excels in freedom, the nations of Europe, shall it be the first to avow a monstrous, unfounded pretension, and vindicate it by innocent blood? Shall it teach a lesson of barbarity to the hardened chieftains of slaughter, of which they were before ignorant? Shall it seek to protect foreigners from the vengeance of their sovereigns, at the cost of immolating its own native citizens? Shall it doom a revolutionary Winchester, or a gallant Winder, to a shameful death, because it cannot save alien traitors from their legal fate?

Think for a moment, sir, on the consequences, and deem it not unworthy of you to regard them. True courage shuts not its eyes upon danger or its results. It views them steadily, and calmly resolves whether they ought to be encountered. Already has this Canadian war a character sufficiently cruel, as Newark, Buffalo, and Niagara can testify. But when the spirit of ferocity shall have been maddened by the vapor steaming from the innocent blood that shall stagnate around every depot of prisoners, then it will become a war, not of savage, but of demoniac character. Your part of it may perhaps be ably sustained—your ways through the Canadas may be traced afar off by the smoke of their burning villages—your path may be marked by the blood of their furious peasantry—you may render your course audible by the frantic shrieks of their women and children. But your own sacred soil will also be the scene of this drama of offends. Your exposed and defenceless seaboard, the seaboard of the South, will invite a terrible vengeance. That seaboard which has been shamefully neglected, and is at this moment without protection, has been already invaded. But an invasion, after the war shall have assumed its unmitigated form of carnage and woe, and wickedness, must be followed with horrors which imagination can but faintly conceive. I will not trust myself to tell you all I feel, all my constituents feel, upon this subject. But I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that when he alludes to the probability that an intestine foe may be roused to assassination and brutality, he touches a chord that vibrates to the very heart. Yes, sir, I live in a State whose misfortune it is to contain the materials out of which may be made such a foe—a foe that will be found every where—in our fields, our kitchens, and our chambers; a foe, ignorant, degraded by habits of servitude, uncurbed by moral restraints—whom no recollections of former kindness will soften, and whom the remembrance of severity will goad to frenzy—from whom nor age, nor infancy, nor beauty, will find reverence or pity—and whose subjugation will be but another word for extermination. Such a foe, sir, may be added to fill up the measure of our calamities. Let me not be misunderstood—let no gentleman misconceive my meaning. Do I state these consequences to intimidate or deter you? I think better of my countrymen. I hope and believe, in the language of Wilkinson to Prevost, the Americans will not be deterred from pursuing what is right by any dread of consequences. No, sir, I state them to rouse your attention and awaken your scrutiny into the correctness of the course you are pursuing. If on mature deliberation you are sure that you are right, proceed, regardless of what may happen.

*"Justum et tenacem propositi virum—
Si fractus illabatur orbis, Impavidum ferient ruinae."*

"The man resolv'd and steady to his trust,
Inflexible to ill, and obstinately just ;

* * * * *
From orbs convuls'd should all the planets fly,
World crush on world, and ocean mix with sky ;
He, unconcern'd, would view the falling whole,
And still maintain the purpose of his soul."

But reflect well, I conjure you, before reflection is too late. Let not passion or prejudice dictate the decision ; if erroneous, its reversal may be decreed by a nation's miseries, and by the world's abhorrence.

Mr. Chairman, turning from the gloomy view of the effects of the Canada war, my attention is arrested by another consequence likely to follow from it, on which I will not long detain you, but which is not less interesting nor less alarming. In proportion as gentlemen become heated in their pursuit of conquest, and are baffled in their efforts to overtake it, the object becomes valuable in their estimation, and success is more identified with their pride. The conquest of Canada, contemplated as an easy sport, without a fixed design either to keep it, to secure, or surrender it to purchase rights, has from its difficulty swelled into an importance which causes it to be valued above all rights. Patriotism was relied on to fill the ranks of the invading army ; but it did not sufficiently answer the call. These ranks, however, must be filled—avarice is next resorted to—the most enormous price is bid for soldiers, that was ever offered in any age or country. Should this fail, what is the next scheme? There is no reserve or concealment. It has been avowed that the next scheme is a conscription. It is known that this scheme was recommended even at this session by the War Department, and that it was postponed only to try first the effect of enormous bounty. The freemen of this country are to be draughted from the ranks of the militia, and forced abroad as military machines, to wage a war of conquest! Sir, I have been accustomed to consider the little share which I have in the Constitution of these United States, as the most valuable patrimony I have to leave to those beings in whom I hope my name and remembrance to be perpetuated. But I solemnly declare, that if such a doctrine be ingrafted into this constitution, I shall regard it as without value, and care not for its preservation. Even in France, where man, inured to despotism, has become so passive and subservient as almost to lose the faculty of feeling oppression, and the capacity to perceive it, even there, sir, the tyranny of conscription rouses him to the assertion of his innate freedom, to struggle against slavery in its most malignant form. No, sir, not the dread of all the severe punishments ordained for refractory conscripts, not the "poine du boulet," the "travaux publics," nor death itself, can stupefy him into seeming submission. He yields only to absolute force, and is marched to the field of glory manacled and handcuffed. And is such a principle to be introduced into our benign, our free institutions? Believe me, the attempt will be fatal—it cannot succeed but by military terror—it will be the signal for drawing the sword at home. Americans are not fitted to be the slaves of a system of French conscription, the most detestable of the inventions of tyranny. Sir, I hear it whispered near me, this is not worse than the impressment of seamen. It is worse, infinitely worse. Impressment forces seamen to serve in the public ships of their country, instead of pursuing their occupation in the merchant service. It changes their employment to one more rigorous, of longer continuance, of greater danger. But it is yet employment of the same kind—it is yet employment for which they are fitted by usage and education. But conscription is indiscriminate in the victims of its tyranny. The age, not the pursuit, of the conscript is the sole criterion of his fitness. Whatever be his habits, whatever his immediate views, whatever his designed occupation in life, a stern mandate tears him from the roof of his father, from the desk, the office, the plough, or the workshop, and he is carried far from home to fight in foreign climes the battles of ambition. But, sir, if conscription were not worse than impressment I should not lose my objection to it—I am not prepared to assent to the introduction of either conscription or impressment into my country. For all the British territories in the Western world, I would not. Fight for sailors' rights—yet rivet on our citizens a French conscription! Fight for rights on the ocean, and annihilate the most precious of all rights at home—the right of a free man never to be forced out of his own country! How alarming is the infatuation of that zeal, which in its ardor for attaining its object, tramples in the dust objects of infinitely higher price!

SATURDAY, February 19.

Claims of Moravians.

Mr. ROBERTS, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of John G. Ounow, acting in behalf of the missionary concerns of the Society of United Brethren, commonly called Moravians, praying compensation for depredations committed on the property of the Indians, who had incorporated themselves into their society, by the army commanded by General Harrison, at the Moravian towns in Upper Canada.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to refer the petition to a select committee.

Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, said that to his knowledge several Indians of the very tribe alluded to in the petition had been killed in arms against us, and therefore were not entitled to particular consideration. Their town had been destroyed, it was true, and in his opinion very properly. This tribe, Mr. D. said, had always been hostile; they had lived on the Muskingum and on the Sandusky, and had since removed to Canada; but had in all situations evinced hostility to us. He therefore moved that this petition lie on the table.

Mr. ROBERTS said he knew nothing of the circumstances of the case which this petition was intended to bring before the House. It was sufficient for him, to insure his attention to the petition, that the petitioner was a citizen of the United States, and acting in behalf of a respectable community; and he hoped, however much the gentleman might know of the facts connected with this case, he would allow it to take the ordinary course and be referred to a committee, in order to examine whether it was in the power of Congress, compatibly with justice, to afford any relief to the petitioners.

Mr. DESHA said the fact he had stated could not be questioned; but, as the gentleman wished to inquire into the circumstances, he had no objection to withdraw the motion to lay the memorial on the table.

Mr. McKIM, of Maryland, rose to renew the motion. He said it was much to be regretted that in the prosecution of the war any religious society should sustain a loss in its property, and particularly the United Brethren, who were generally a most inoffensive and well-disposed people. In the prosecution of the war, their town and property was represented to have been destroyed. But this property was within the settlements of the enemy, and exposed, according to the usages of war, to injury from an invading force. We also, said he, have had some villages destroyed; but none of our citizens, that I have heard of, have thought proper to petition the Parliament of Great Britain for remuneration for the destruction of their property; and if they had, it would be thought a curious procedure. At the conclusion of the war, some mutual indemnity might be provided for sufferers of this character; but until that time, and in any other manner, he did not believe the petitioners could obtain relief.

Mr. ROBERTS said he was still convinced of the propriety of referring this petition. The persons living in the towns destroyed were Indians, within the British jurisdiction, indeed located on lands ceded to them by the British Government, but not under its authority. They were attached to the Society of the United Brethren by its missionaries, and were entirely free and independent of the Canadian Government. In the late expeditions against the hostile Indians, their settlements had been destroyed; and he thought there could be no impropriety in inquiring, whether, consistently with justice, any indemnity could be allowed them.

The motion to lay the petition on the table having been withdrawn, it was referred to a select committee.

National Bank.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to incorporate the stockholders of the National Bank; which was twice read, and committed.

MONDAY, February 21.

The Loan Bill.

The House then resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing the loan for 1814.

Mr. YANCEY, of North Carolina, with a view to allow the discussion to progress with the same latitude as it had commenced, since it appeared to be agreed that it was not yet to terminate, moved to recommit the bill to a Committee of the whole House.

This motion was opposed by Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, on the ground that it could be as well discussed in the House as in committee. Besides, it had already been discussed nearly two weeks, and every subject but the loan had been drawn into debate; and if the bill was retained in the House, it would be in its power to terminate debate by the previous question—a power not belonging to the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was advocated by Mr. EPPES, of

The Loan Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Virginia, who said he did not believe the recommitment would delay the bill for a single hour, because the house would at any time have power to refuse leave to the committee to sit on it again whenever it chose.

The question on recommitment having been taken by yeas and nays, was decided in the affirmative.

TUESDAY, February 22.

Treasury Notes.

The engrossed bill to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes for the year 1814, was read a third time.

Mr. HALL, of Georgia, moved to recommit the bill, with a view to introduce an amendment similar to that he had yesterday offered, changing the smallest amount of the bills to be issued to ten dollars instead of five.

This motion was supported by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland, with different views, arising out of the latitude of expression of some provisions of the bill, and was opposed by Mr. EPPES of Virginia.

The motion was negatived by a considerable majority.

The question on the passage of the bill was then decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Archer, Avery, Barnett, Beall, Bradley, Brown, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Comstock, Conard, Crawford, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Ingham, Irving, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kilbourn, Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, Montgomery, Moore, Newton, Ormsby, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Richardson, Roane, Roberts, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Tannehill, Taylor, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Williams, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wood, Wright and Yancy—88.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckinridge, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Dewey, Ely, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hanson, Howell, Hufty, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Markell, Miller, Moffitt, Mosely, Pearson, Pickering, Post, John Reed, Sheffey, Sherwood, Shepard, Smith of New York, Stanford, Stockton, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, White, Wilcox, and Wilson of Massachusetts—48.

WEDNESDAY, February 23.

On motion of Mr. McKEE, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri, which was reported to the House with amendments, and was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. HEMPSTEAD, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire whether any, and if any, what alterations or amendments are necessary to be made to the act, entitled "an act providing for the government of the Territory of Missouri," with leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

The Loan Bill.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole, on the Loan bill.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, concluded the speech which he commenced yesterday; which is given entire as follows:

Mr. Chairman, every day's experience must have satisfied the gentlemen of the minority, that no opposition to this bill or to any other measure intended to give vital energy to the contest in which the country is engaged, can be successful here. Whence, then, arises this extraordinary display of industry and of ingenuity? Is it that they intend on this question to enter upon their defence for their irregular and unprecedented course pursued since the commencement of the war? In this view, the subject is indeed interesting—worthy of all the labor and all the talents bestowed upon it. To conduct it to a successful issue, will require a portion of industry never yet equalled—a degree of ingenuity never yet surpassed. In the brief examination of some of the topics of discussion, I wish it to be understood that my object is not to prove that the conduct of the Government has been correct; but to show that the opposition is not justifiable upon any of the principles assumed for its defence. The honor of the Government is not yet sunk so low as to require a labored defence of their measures at the bar of the public. The evidence has long since been exhibited to the proper tribunal; sentence of acquittal upon that evidence has been pronounced by the present generation, and more impartial posterity will but confirm the judgment.

The passage of this bill is resisted on the same beaten grounds which have been occupied on all other questions relative to the war. The injustice of the contest in its commencement—the injustice of continuing it after the repeal of the Orders in Council—the impracticability of effecting the objects for which it is carried on. That there was sufficient cause of war against Great Britain, I have not heard denied. In this assembly, at least, I presume there cannot be found an individual whose understanding is so thoroughly perverted, whose heart is so perfectly corrupt, as to believe that Great Britain has done us no essential injury. But while sufficient cause of war is said to have existed, while great injuries are admitted to have been committed, and were daily accumulating, the war is still affirmed to have been relatively unjust. Ask for the evidence of this relative injustice, and the answer you receive is a torrent of declamation against the Corsican usurper, the violator of the honor and integrity of nations. Describe the injuries and enormities of England, and your attention is invited to the insults and aggressions of France. There are in this community, singular politicians who conceive the injuries and insults of France and England, like the equal quantities in the calculation of algebraic fractions, as of no other use than to extinguish each other. For my part I do not understand this political algebra. I rejoice that I do not. On this subject ignorance is virtue and knowledge crime. I will not detain you by any attempt to show the variance in magnitude of the injuries received from the two nations. I will not inquire which of the two commenced the systematic violation of the rights of neutral commerce. It is perfectly indifferent how the account stands on this question. Admitting them to be equal in time and in degree of enormity, the aggressions of one power are no justification of the encroachments of the other. Indeed, every attempt on the part of our Government in their correspondence with the Ministers of the two belligerents to discuss these questions was degrading—only to be excused from the purity of its motives, the love of peace. A more refined and specious argument is used to prove this relative injustice drawn from the nature of the contest in which England was engaged; she is represented as fighting for their existence; and any injuries incidental to the measures adopted by her in the prosecution of this cause ought to have been borne without repining by neutrals whom she did not intend to injure. I have yet to learn the difference between the British and French ambition. I have not yet seen, and the history of latter times does not show, the evidence of the justice of the cause of Great Britain. The simple statement of the dispute between the rival powers is, that France, not satisfied with stretching her giant arms over the Continent of Europe, desired to partake of the dominion of ocean. Great Britain, riding triumphantly on the mountain wave, wished her power and influence to extend to the centre of the Continent. In the desire of lawless power; in the perfect disregard of the morality of the means by which these ends were to be accomplished, a feather will turn the balance between them. The means of effecting their objects were easily found. France, having no power on the ocean, was contending for the liberty of the seas. England, destitute of continental influence, was contending for the liberty of the Continent. In the prosecution of their darling project, armies covered the Continent until their march was stopped by the barrier of Russian steel. England by her naval superiority has reduced all the valuable colonial possessions of the continental powers, and is now in the quiet enjoyment of the bloodless conquests. In the increase of the means of sustaining the contest, England had far exceeded France at the commencement of the first campaign against Russia. The true interest of the United States was, that the two rivals should remain in the same state, or that the overgrown power of each should be lessened. There is nothing in the cause of either that demanded our sympathy or claimed our forbearance. But we are told that the naval supremacy of Great Britain is necessary, not to her preservation alone, but to the preservation of the liberties of the world. It was the only barrier to the universal dominion of the Corsican. Europe would first be desolated by his legions, and then we should have been swallowed up in the vortex of his ambition. I will not deny the necessity of naval superiority to the safety of Great Britain, although such denial is made by some of her own politicians; but modern experience has shown that the march of the destroyer may be stayed on the land without the assistance of her naval force. What services were rendered at Moscow by her naval armament? How did it promote success at the battles of Leipzig and of Dresden? Neither troops nor any of the means of annoyance were prevented from reaching the scene of action from France; nor could this naval power afford facility to the transportation of any of the muniments of war to the allied powers. Sir, it must require something more than the folly of dotage to assert it was necessary; to prove it is impossible. The talisman of French invincibility was broken by other and by nobler means. The generous spirit of patriotism, excited into enthusiasm by the invasion of his native land in the rugged Russian, first crippled the giant. The perfect union of the allies, pressed together by the might of their fears, will, if governed by true policy, confine him to his ancient cell. That British naval supremacy is necessary for the security of the United States is a libel upon the virtue and valor of this people. The people of these States hold the precious inheritance of their forefathers by a nobler tenure and a better title. They hold it as a grant from Heaven purchased by the generous blood of the purest men the world ever saw, never to be relinquished while a drop of that is found in the veins of the existing race. The invaluable blessings secured by the valor of our ancestors would cease to be dear, if they depended upon any power for their preservation but that of the Divinity.

The atrocities of the present war are of themselves sufficient to produce conviction on minds, ordinarily constituted, of the perfect disregard of the British Government to religion and humanity. I will not detain you by any detail of these enormities. I do not desire to excite resentment or inspire detestation by a recital of the barbarities which have been committed in different parts of the Continent by the armies and allies of England. But we may inquire how far religious Governments can be justified in employing the means of defence and offence, which involve in their destructive progress the man, the woman, and the infant; which spares neither age, sex, or condition; which riots with equal joy on the spoils of the armed enemy or wounded prisoner. We are told by the gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) that the employment of the Indians was justifiable—that he would have adopted the same means. The state of war is certainly a destruction of the ordinary rules which govern nations in their conduct to each other. Even this state, however, has rules which generous nations implicitly obey; rules violated by the employment of a force whose destructive effect cannot be controlled. The effect of the employment of this species of annoyance had been proved by past experience. During the Revolutionary war it was denounced in the Parliament of Great Britain as destructive and odious. Modern improvements are visible on this subject. In England at this day it is matter of boast and joy that the red man mingles in battle by the side of his white friend. The imagination is delighted by the picturesque effect of the tomahawk darkening by the side of the glitter of the bayonet—by the rude dress of the savage viewed in conjunction with the splendid costume of the disciplined soldier. The groans of the scalped victim are no longer permitted to strike upon the ear—it is delighted by the dramatic effect of the yell of the savage filling the air, in combination with the shout of the civilized barbarian. I envy no man's feelings who can believe the employment of an Indian force justifiable. The conclusion, however, may be drawn without the fear of refutation, that it is not an evidence of the regard of Christianity in those who adopt it.

We are informed by an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, that our sympathies for Spain ought to have prevented the declaration of war: Spain fighting in a cause holy and sacred as the cause of our own Revolution, was injured by our attempt to resist encroachments upon our rights. There is no man who does not wish success to the Spaniards. But, sir, when we are called upon to make sacrifices and submit to injustice on their account, it becomes necessary to examine the nature of the contest and the probable consequence of the success of the parties engaged in it. What is that cause, which has been compared to our Revolutionary struggle? It is the cause of pride, not of principle. Pride, which having its foundation among the generous feelings of the human heart, may inspire admiration and excite sympathy, but which is rejected by reason. The memorable siege of Saragossa was sustained, the immortal Palafox died, not to extend or preserve the liberties of the people, but for the paltry privilege of choosing the puppet who was to sit upon the throne. At the commencement of the memorable struggle Spain was as completely governed by French councils as if she had been an integral part of the Empire. All her resources were at the command of the Emperor. Napoleon might give greater stability to his power, but immediately he was to gain nothing by the change of Kings, but the gratification of his family pride. Wonderful and important controversy, whether the descendant of a Frenchman or a Corsican should sit upon the throne, whether the political automaton should be of the ancient or the new dynasty, a Bourbon, or a Bonaparte; of a family whose ancestors had usurped power in times long past, or of one who had grasped it with their own hands in the present days! And what was the consequence of the struggle which ensued? The resources of Spain became the property of Britain; no other effect was produced than a change of masters. What difference between the dominion of one or the other power? The people obtain no privileges and the United States derive no benefits. To us it cannot be important, whether the wires are moved by an English or a French juggler; whether the despatches of Spain are issued by Castlereagh or Bassano. The comparison of this with our Revolution, is odious and unjust profanation to the ashes of Washington and his contemporary patriots. The American people fought for their own privileges—the Spaniards for the privileges of their rulers. Our fathers fought for the right of self-government—for freedom, political and religious; they for the choice of the foot which is to trample on their necks. The principles of our contest seem to be as little understood as the limits of constitutional opposition. In the cause of Great Britain, in the situation of the world, in the affairs of the peninsula, there was nothing to demand or require our forbearance to seek redress even for incidental injuries. But were the Orders in Council really intended to injure France and France only? Far from it. The decrees, of which they pretended to be retaliatory, were inoperative and useless. It was the boast of the British Government that they were futile and impotent. No, sir, the object of this system of retaliation upon France, was to foster British at the expense of neutral commerce. The pretence to cover this object was the decrees of France. Flimsy, indeed, but still sufficient for a Government which desires to cover, if it does not conceal, its real intentions from the public view.

The second ground of excuse or justification used is, that it was unjust to continue the war after the repeal of the Orders in Council, alleged to have been the only cause of war. This allegation is denied. These orders were not the only cause of war. Without attempting to show the policy and necessity of settling all the points of dispute, I will examine how far Great Britain exhibited a disposition to do us justice in her act of repeal. An indifferent spectator of such a contest between two nations, when told that the injuring party had given the strongest proof of her good faith and love of peace, would conclude that the injustice complained of had ceased; that ample security was provided against a repetition of the injury, and remuneration for that already inflicted was offered or made. How is the fact? The very act of repeal asserts the justice of the system; insists upon the right of again resorting to it if necessary; affects to confer a favor by its suspension of abandonment. Where was the security against future and similar aggressions? Where was the remuneration for the millions of American property poured into the royal coffers as droits of the Admiralty? Will it be pretended that this remuneration is not to be expected? Will gentlemen who rave about the millions imperially plundered from us by France, quietly surrender to Great Britain the royal portions which have been most iniquitously condemned in her courts of Admiralty? They ask at the hands of the Administration an account of the property seized under the decree of Berlin, Milan, and Rambouillet. The Administration demand restoration from France, and this demand would have been made, although her banners had floated over prostrate Russia, although her imperial eagles had been planted on the walls of St. Petersburg. We look for the same justice from both these nations. Perhaps the Minister, Admiral Warren, was vested with full powers to supply these deficiencies;—he who came to heal our divisions, to afford our Government a glorious opportunity of stopping the effusion of human blood. He came to inform us that the Orders in Council were repealed; to propose an armistice. If accepted, was he to arrange the subjects of dispute between the two nations? Nothing like it. To arrange with the Secretary of State “as to the revocation of the laws which interdict the commerce and ships of war of Great Britain from the waters and harbors of the United States.” This, and this only, was his errand. Ample atonement had already been made by the repeal for all our injuries of every description and character. Nothing further was or could be expected, and this is the glorious opportunity lost by the Administration; this is what is called by the Legislature of Massachusetts, in their celebrated remonstrance, the signal proof of the good faith and disposition to peace of the British nation. But this repeal was not even a compliance with the promise of her Ministry. They promised an absolute revocation of their Orders in Council whenever the decrees were, by an authentic act of the French Government, publicly promulgated, repealed. When this authentic act on the part of the French Government, which had been shamefully withheld or fraudulently ante-dated, was promulgated, they comply with their promise by a repeal in June, which was to take effect in the August succeeding. What was the reason of this procrastination to do justice; of this violation of their engagement? The events which have since occurred in the north of Europe point with unerring certainty to the cause. France and Russia were disputing about the continuance of the continental system. The Deliverer had not yet determined to deliver himself from the iron grasp of the Imperial Corsican; he had not yet resolved “to set his crown upon a cast and stand the hazard of the die;” before August these facts were to be ascertained. Is it a strained or unfair conclusion to draw from these premises that these circumstances were hoped for? If they occurred, the system could be continued; if they did not happen, it was to be suffered to here expire.

I come now, sir, to the last and most extraordinary ground assumed by the minority—the impracticability of attaining the objects of the contest. These objects are the preservation of the property and persons of American citizens from unjust violation on the common highway of nations. And is it seriously asserted that this cannot be effected? If we are, indeed, so weak and worthless as not to be able to protect our citizens in the enjoyment of these fundamental rights, let the fact be proved by experience, and the people will apply the remedy. The Declaration of Independence will be torn to atoms, and its fragments scattered on the winds; the constitution, the model of perfection to human institutions, will be reduced to ashes; perhaps from its embers a better order of things may arise. I have no apprehension on this subject; our demands, to the extent to which the Administration are bound to go, will be granted whenever it is the interest of our enemy to quit the contest; whenever it is shown that the hopes of division in our country are delusive. On that part of the dispute which relates to impressment, we are informed that Great Britain cannot yield to our demands without endangering her existence. Her existence does not depend, I presume, upon the practice of impressing our seamen; and we have, at all times, been ready to take away the excuse for its continuance, by refusing to employ British subjects. Peace can be concluded without surrendering or jeopardizing their interest or ours. It is indifferent what the arrangement may be with regard to foreigners; but with regard to our own citizens, whether native or naturalized, their security must be stipulated, or we quit the field with a wound incurable, for it affixes a stigma on the national honor.

Mr. ROBERTSON said: Mr. Chairman, I am not surprised at the reluctance of gentlemen to take the floor. I feel sensibly the effects of my own temerity. But if, after the eloquent address of my friend from Georgia (Mr. FORSYTH) I should be so fortunate as to obtain the attention of the committee, I promise for no great length of time to trespass on their patience. Indeed, I am not desirous of making a long speech; I am not ambitious of that fame which is to be acquired “by holding out to tire each other down.” And if the opinion of Swift be correct, that we speak with facility in the direct ratio of the paucity of our ideas, then is there little credit to be gained by haranguing—

“From morn to noon, from noon to dewy eve—
A Summer’s day.”

Various and diffuse have been the subjects presented to our view: many of them foreign to the question under consideration, but all, diversified as they have been by ingenuity, and animated by declamation, of great interest and importance. I do not object to this excursive examination—it has high and ancient authority. Homer proposed to sing Achilles' wrath, and he gave us the ten years siege of Troy. I will not, however, avail myself of the full extent of my privilege; I will not pass over in silence the subject which has given rise to this debate. It yields in importance to none. It concerns the honor, the existence of the nation. It is not my intention to follow gentlemen through the mad and melancholy mazes of their argument, to prove that funds ought not to be furnished; or that the plan which has been recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means, if adopted, would be ruinous to the resources and credit of the nation. Is the loan necessary, and can it be procured? It is sufficient, in the first place, to answer, that we are at war; that war cannot be carried on without money; that money is its sinew. But gentlemen say that war is unnecessary. Such has not been always the language of Federalists. Previously to the commencement of hostilities, Congress was inundated with memorials from different parts of the United States, particularly from the East—particularly from Massachusetts and Connecticut—expatiating in indignant terms, and painting in vivid colors, British injuries and insults inflicted on our commerce and offences to our flag; and pledging their support to whatever measures, listening to their furious counsels, the Government might be induced to adopt. Then, according to the "sainted pilgrims," the United States were niggards of blood and treasure. Then we were told by a celebrated Jacobin of the East, who held a seat in this House, and who employed himself at that time, as he does now, in bullying the Government, that we "could not be kicked into a war." But let us admit for a moment that war was not unavoidably commenced; is it true, as is often asserted, that no wish is felt, no effort made to obtain an honorable peace? A slight attention to facts will confute this charge. So soon as information was received of the repeal of the Orders in Council, Mr. Russell was instructed to propose an armistice on terms of perfect justice and reciprocity. This the British Government rejected, and rejected in a manner in the highest degree insulting to America. When the Emperor of Russia, the ally of England, offered his mediation to effect a pacification, it was, although readily accepted by us, unhesitatingly rejected by that Government. Now, at a later period, when the enemy has held out the olive branch, he is met promptly with corresponding views on our part. But all this is nothing: you lost, say gentlemen, the golden opportunity when you refused to close with the proposition of Admiral Warren. Yes, Admiral Warren proposed an armistice, leaving the seamen of our country, whose rights we took up arms to secure, at the mercy of subaltern officers and drunken press-gangs.

But all our efforts to obtain peace are treated as our efforts were to avoid war. They are misrepresented and derided. The Russian mediation was declared to have been unauthorized by the Russian monarch. Mr. Daschkoff and the Executive fabricated it to amuse and deceive the public! The correspondence on that subject, in all respects so honorable to our Government, lately laid before the world, has covered the authors of these calumnies with dismay and confusion. Yes, the acceptance of the Russian mediation met with the most illiberal opposition, and acceding to the late proposition of the enemy to negotiate, is begging for peace, is striking our flag. Gentlemen will be mistaken in their fears or their hopes. To treat on the proposed basis of "the laws of nations and British marine rights," is one and the same. Britain has maritime rights, and so has every other independent sovereignty.

The hackneyed charge of French influence has been in a great measure abandoned. Mr. Foster, within the walls of Parliament, where their "friends in Congress" were spoken of, acquits us of this. The Emperor Alexander, now the theme of Federal eulogy, but doomed soon to become the subject of their bitterest hate, says, that "taking pleasure in doing justice to the wisdom of the Government of the United States, he is convinced that it has done all that it could do to prevent this rupture."

The uniform conduct of the Administration in the days of the proudest splendor of France, and in those of her comparative depression, alike removed from obsequious yielding or contemptuous exultation, the want of co-operation, the absence of alliance between the two nations, all give the lie to this accusation, so often repeated, so constantly refuted by facts and events.

But admit for a moment, in the face of the clearest evidence, that the war is unnecessary; that it is unjust; that it originated in French influence; that no efforts have been made to bring it to an honorable termination—shall we not defend ourselves? Shall we abandon the country? Is not England at war with us? And ought not the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. ~~SHAWNEY~~) who proposed that we should proclaim that it was not our intention to attack the enemy, also to have provided that the enemy should not attack us? His proposition would at least have been consistent in absurdity.

If, Mr. Chairman, the state of the nation requires funds, can the loan contemplated be obtained? It is on all hands admitted that it can. Certain predictions of eventual national bankruptcy are hazarded; but at present there is no difficulty or danger. On the subject of finance we have witnessed much labor and experienced much fatigue. It has tended to make "confusion worse confounded." In my researches I too have met with a principle, I dare say as true as any we have heard, and infinitely more convenient and apposite. The celebrated Herenchwand lays it down as a most valuable discovery, "that a regular and constant increase in the expenditure of the Government, is the only true means of insuring a constant progression in the intelligence and enjoyment of the people." The grand secret, then, for increasing the happiness of the people, is for its rulers to spend as much as possible. I cannot say that I entirely agree in opinion with this profound economist, although he is announced to the world by Arthur Young as one of the greatest political geniuses of the age. All I intend is, to show that the subject of finance is intricate; that the greatest men are puzzled, and that the gloomy predictions and dull calculations of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFERY) ought to be listened to with much doubt and circumspection. For my own part, when I reflect on the never-failing series of wars which have convulsed the world, I have been led to suspect that if greater difficulties existed to the procurement of money than is generally experienced, mankind would have no cause to lament the circumstance. But when I perceive that the worst governments, for the worst purposes, have been enabled to prosecute never-ending and expensive contentions, I feel encouraged to believe that a virtuous government, for honorable purposes, will not furnish the only example of falling a sacrifice to its enemies, for want of means to defend and support its rights.

But gentlemen oppose the loan because they are anxious to preserve the faith and credit of the nation. But the loan is necessary for that purpose. How else will our contracts be fulfilled; how pay the debts already due; how satisfy the claims of the Army, the Navy? Aware of the inconsistency in which they are involved, they contend that the majority will sacrifice the faith of the public, rather than hazard their popularity by finding ways and means to pay the debt they contract. This doctrine was not for the first time broached in the House. A gentleman now before me, (Mr. PICKERING,) in essays under the signature of his name, contended for the truth of the same principle; this was done to prevent individuals from advancing their money to the Government; not satisfied with this, he said, that if the party to which he belonged got into power, the creditors of the nation could with no propriety expect payment of their demands, as the debt had been contracted in consequence of their advancing money to prosecute a war denounced by the Federalists as cruel, unjust, unnecessary. The gentleman is at perfect liberty to speak for himself and his party; he well understands their views, and does them justice. I object to a further extension of his jurisdiction. It is, then, already avowed, that if he and his friends are intrusted with the Government, the debts of the nation will not be paid. This principle strikes at the foundations of society, and it is the open avowal and unqualified support of doctrines so monstrous that keeps, and will, it is devoutly to be hoped, forever keep them in the same feeble and suspected state in which they at present are found. How different was the course of Republican successors of a Federal Administration! Mr. Jefferson in coming into office found an enormous debt of upwards of $80,000,000; much of it had been contracted in the prosecution of measures highly disagreeable to himself and his political friends; most of the evidences of the debt had fallen into the hands of his opponents. No disposition was felt, no hint thrown out calculated to excite alarm; the fame of the country was held too dear to be sacrificed on the altar of revenge. Ample means were provided to satisfy the public creditors; under the auspices of his measures stock rapidly rose, and the complaint was, that there was too much promptitude in discharging and cancelling the public obligations. The suspicions which gentlemen have thought fit to express are not supported by adverting to the past; they will not be verified by the future conduct of the Government.

A great many arguments have been used, and cases quoted, to show that in England the duty of perpetual and inalienable allegiance is asserted. We have been referred to her blood-stained code to show that emigrants had been taken in arms, tried, executed, and mangled while yet alive, as traitors to their king and country. That her history furnishes abundant evidence of injustice, cruelty, and atrocity, required no great effort to show; but, until it is established that we, as well as other nations, are bound to obey her municipal laws, nothing is done in regard to the present question.

Having established that expatriation, or emigration, with an intent to permanently reside elsewhere, is a natural right, and that naturalizing foreigners is practised in England, it is proper to add, that emigration is prohibited by no civilized Government, that naturalization is practised by all, and that perpetual allegiance is a foolish notion, growing out of feudal times, supported by insolence and power, at war with the plainest rights of man, and in violation of the undeniable prerogative of every Government on earth.

Upon this subject, what say American authorities? The State of Virginia, which, in regard to a correct understanding of moral and political truth, yields to no country in Europe, has recognized by law the right of expatriation. The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. GASTON) contends that, as Virginia had authorized expatriation, this was a clear proof that, in the opinion of that State, the right might be given or withheld at pleasure. The gentleman either never read, or entirely misunderstood the statute. It does not give, it recognizes the right. It provides that, "whenever any citizen should, by deed, or open verbal declaration, made in court, declare that he relinquished the character of a citizen, and shall depart out of the commonwealth, such person shall, from the time of his departure, be considered as having exercised his right of expatriation, and shall thence be deemed no citizen." In perfect coincidence with the right of expatriation are the opinions of Judges Tucker and Roane, of that State, and Judge Iredell, formerly of the United States bench. One of our complaints, whilst colonies, was, that Britain discouraged emigration. In conformity to these ideas, the constitution has given to Congress authority "to establish an uniform rule of naturalization." During the Administration of General Washington, a law on this subject was enacted. It called on the alien who wished to become a citizen of the United States to "renounce and abjure all allegiance to any foreign prince, potentate, State, or sovereignty, whatever, and particularly, by name, the prince, potentate, State, or sovereignty of which he was before a citizen or subject."

If the effect of naturalization was before doubtful, it ceased to be so now; whether it annihilated natural allegiance, was no longer left to implication. If a naturalized foreigner in England, notwithstanding he was, to all intents and purposes, to be held and taken as a native-born citizen, notwithstanding he was enabled to hold land which an alien could not do, because it destroyed his natural allegiance, still owed allegiance to the country of his birth; if all this nonsense were true, to put an end forever to such doctrine, we have required that a positive abjuration of all previous allegiance should be made. And whilst a citizen thus constituted, thus fashioned by ourselves, stamped with the holy attributes of equality, in all things, in regard to the other members of our free community, calls upon us for that protection which we have authorized him to expect, have we a right, have we a discretion; shall we be so vile, so infamous, as to hesitate? We should become the scorn of nations; we should loathe ourselves; remorse would poison our days. Is this the asylum of oppressed humanity? Is it thus we fulfil our promises to suffering man? What, lure from his native country, his home, a fellow-being who could have dragged out a miserable, though tolerable existence, to abandon him to punishment for an act which we have encouraged, for trusting to our faith, for confiding in our truth?

Thus, then, the question of retaliation arises. Shall we retaliate on the enemy cruelties which he may inflict on individuals who, though born in Britain, have left that country, incorporated themselves into our societies, and have been taken prisoners fighting our battles? But I cannot subscribe to the opinion, that we owe protection to those only who have been naturalized. I differ with the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who supposed that the Government felt itself bound no further. That is not the view of the President, he covers much wider ground; but it is the true ground. He does not speak of naturalized citizens, but of "persons who have incorporated themselves into our society." It is worse than useless that we should take any distinction. The British principle of perpetual allegiance applies as well to the one as the other. If our enemy adhere to the dicta of Blackstone, instead of the voice of reason and the practice of nations, then will all those individuals who were born in England fall under the denomination of traitors. No matter how formally we have made them citizens; no matter how many years they may have resided among us; no matter what their inducements to defend the country where all their happiness is centered; no matter if driven from their native fields by the hard hand of poverty; complying with laws which they have sworn to support; fulfilling duties which God has enjoined, they have committed the foul crime of treason; the horrible punishment denounced by British law awaits them. What if he has been compelled by us to take up arms? What if he has been enticed to do so by allurements held out to his cupidity or to his patriotism, are we not bound to protect him? Let us inquire, then, into the practice of the world.

It will be found that the claim now set up by England is unsupported by precedent, and is at war with her own example. Prince Eugene was, by birth, a Frenchman; disappointed in his just or ambitious views, he left France and joined the Austrian army, then employed against the Turks. He received an order to return; but, so far from complying, war breaking out between the two countries, he ranged himself on the side of the enemies of France—his career is well known—he defeated and humbled the proudest power that Europe had then seen. His natural sovereign, Louis XIV., did not consider him as a traitor; the surrounding nations did not consider him as a traitor. England hailed him as the greatest captain, the brightest ornament of his age. It is to British historians and British poets that we are indebted for the opinion which we have of him—opinions as honorable to his moral as to his military character. At the siege of Turin, Eugene, a Frenchman, commanded the Austrian army; the French army was commanded by Count Marsin, an Austrian. In the war of the Succession, as it was called, the French armies were commanded by the Duke of Berwick, a Briton, a king's son; the British armies were led on by a Frenchman, of the title of Galway. Instances of the same kind are innumerable. But will express authority, drawn from England, be considered as of weight in a controversy with that Government? I admit, under other circumstances, it would deserve but little respect, for history furnishes examples of every absurdity and every atrocity, which wanton power has perpetrated. But it is fair to set up her former practice against her present pretensions. In the year 1794, certain corps of Frenchmen were enlisted in His Majesty's armies, for the purpose of invading France; Mr. Sheridan asked, in debate, whether, if they were taken prisoners and treated as traitors, the English Government would retaliate. Mr. Burke replied, "yes." This gave rise to much opposition and animadversion on the part of the minority. In answer, Mr. Burke said:

"From the severity of comment to which the poor monosyllable, 'yes,' has been subject, the world must have been led to think that I have taken up my morals at random, merely on sentiment, and that I was wholly unprepared to defend them on principle. As a general principle, founded on policy and law of nations, I am ready to repeat and maintain, that retaliation of any severity which an enemy may practise, is right and proper. The lex talionis is a part of the law of nations, as founded on that of nature. These corps must be considered purely as a part of that army under whose banners they serve. God forbid that the authors of murder should not find it recoil on their own heads. Such is my opinion relative to the justice and policy of retaliation. I would suffer no one act of severity to pass unretaliated. But the right honorable gentleman is fearful that we may inflame the Jacobins by this severity on our part. Inflame a Jacobin! You might as well talk of 'setting fire to hell.'" Mr. Burke goes on to remark, that "the practice is more lenient than the mildest doctrines of the theorists. To the honor of practical humanity, only four instances of wanton and unnecessary murder occurred throughout the whole course of the American war—a forbearance which reflects equal credit on both parties. In 1688, the Irish brigades were taken into the service of France, and retained their own uniform. Yet, England, though often courageously opposed by these troops, has not, in any instance, treated them as rebels, when the fortune of war cast them into their power. In the rebellion of 1746, a whole regiment of them was taken, but no severity was practised.

"France, under Louis XIV., conducted herself in the same way. Many of her regiments, after the cruel and impolitic revocation of the edict of Nantes, were taken into the pay of Prussia, Holland, and Britain; yet, she never sacrificed these troops when they became prisoners. The battle of Fontenoy was gained principally from the exertions of the Irish brigades, and though they fought in open rebellion, these extremities were not thought of. Lord Ligonier, an officer of great note in the English service, was a Frenchman by birth; when taken prisoner, fighting against France, was exchanged in the usual course, for an officer of the same rank. Similar instances may be collected from the conduct of Germany, Sweden, and every other power of Europe."

During the same debate Lord Mulgrave, then high in office, enjoying the confidence of Ministers, and it may be presumed speaking with their approbation, also declared that the system of retaliation was to be adopted.

The English, it seems, then, were at liberty to enlist and embody whole corps of Frenchmen, recently arrived, to be employed expressly for the invasion of their native country, whilst we violate every principle of the laws of nations, by taking into our service an inconsiderable number of Englishmen, members of our own society, to be used as occasion might require, in our war with that Government. The difference between the two cases cannot but occur to the most cursory observer. Yet, "the French corps were to be considered purely a part of the army under whose banners they served;" but British emigrants, serving under the banners of the American army, are to be considered as traitors.

Mr. Chairman, I have trespassed longer on your patience, and that of the committee, than I had intended. I hope, however, the importance of the subjects under consideration will be my apology. I will observe, sir, that I have endeavored, I think, with some success, to establish the following positions: That the loan, in consequence of the war in which we are engaged, is necessary, and can be obtained; that the pretensions of the Federalists to the exclusive patronage of the Navy, are unfounded; that, with respect to Louisiana and Florida, the conduct of the United States has been scrupulously honorable; that the right of expatriation is supported by principle, and established by practice; that naturalization is its necessary effect, and by a sort of reaction sanctions the principle; that inalienable allegiance is absurd, and incompatible with expatriation and naturalization, so clearly established by universal usage and law; and that the question of retaliation, to which the late proceedings of the British Government have given rise, is incontestably settled in our favor, by the authority of her greatest statesmen, by her own practice, and by that of the civilized world.

THURSDAY, February 24.

The Loan Bill.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole, on the Loan bill.

Mr. CHEVY, of South Carolina, (the Speaker,) took the floor, according to the intention he announced yesterday, and spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I shall follow the example which other gentlemen have established—I shall not confine myself to the question which is immediately presented by the bill, but look briefly into the prominent subjects which the discussion has presented. I shall say very little of the loan, or the general finance of the Government. On the subject of our finances I have for the last two years occupied much of the attention of the House, and am very well disposed to leave the subject to the better abilities of the gentlemen to whom the House has particularly confided the management of that part of its business. It is, indeed, true, that the system of finance on which the Government is acting, is different from that which I deemed proper, and which I made some endeavors to accomplish; which I supposed it would have been expedient to have adopted in a state of war, to put beyond peril the public credit, and to supply with abundance the ways and means to prosecute the war with vigor and effect. But I have no disposition on this or any other occasion to speak my private griefs; and I will only add, that I wish the measure all possible success; that I know the resources of the country are great; that I believe the ultimate security of the creditor to be unquestionable, and that the enormous interest given by Government (for such I consider the terms of the last loans to be) ought to attract every cent of the disengaged capital in the country—because in no other way can the holder invest his money which will give him so little trouble, so great security, and so much profit.

The principal causes in which I believe the war originated, were the operation of the British Orders in Council on our commerce, and the impressment of our seamen. These were distinguishable from the other causes of dispute between the two countries by the striking circumstance, that they were always present, active, and progressive. If our causes of complaint had been confined to past injuries and insults; if we had only to suffer the loss of the many millions of money of which Great Britain had robbed our citizens by her depredations on our lawful commerce, we might and probably would have continued to remonstrate and negotiate, and still have avoided war, to which our Government has an aversion so strong as to wear the semblance of pusillanimity. But it was the daily continuance of the injuries, the incessant infliction, and the absence of all hope that these injuries were to end, that drove the nation necessarily and unavoidably to resistance; unable to carry the productions of our own soil on the highway of nations—the great ocean—of which like the light and air, it was intended by nature none should have dominion, to ports not blockaded, without exposing them to inevitable capture, and this often in the mouths of our own harbors, was a situation which affected vitally not merely the interests but the independence of the nation. To have endured it would have sunk us to a rank so degraded among nations, as could not have failed to draw upon us the everlasting contempt of the world. I have, however, no hesitation in admitting, for I shall speak with the utmost candor on the subject, that, had I known of the revocation of the Orders in Council at the moment of the declaration of war, I would not have voted for it; I speak only for myself, though I believe I am not singular in this view of the subject. I am even willing to admit, though on this point I know I differ from some of my friends, that the revocation of which we were afterwards informed, as it was explained by the Ministry to Parliament, would have been to me satisfactory. But whatever the effect of this revocation might have been in preventing war, had a knowledge of it in this country preceded war, yet the subject presents a very different aspect after war has been declared. It is impossible not to see and to feel that, were we to make peace without any security against that abuse of our rights which formed the other great cause of war, it would be an obvious and unequivocal submission to the claim of right which the enemy sets up, and to the injurious and abusive exercise of this claim which we have so long suffered. This idea is strongly presented by the reflections with which I commenced in speaking of the nature of the principal causes of the war: namely, that it is not an injury, no matter how great in extent, which has ceased to be active, and which has therefore lost in a great degree its offensive character; but one which is daily and hourly repeated, intermitted only by the existence of actual war, under circumstances too intolerable to be borne by a nation not dead to all the feelings of honor and of shame.

I pass from the causes to the conduct of the war. The past conduct of the war; this, I think, cannot be defended, and as I have not been an indiscriminate supporter of the measures and policy of the Government, so I will not be an indiscriminate apologist of the conduct of the war. But although it cannot be entirely defended, it may admit of some excuse. When it is recollected that this nation was roused by the declaration of war from the slumber of thirty years of tranquillity and peace; that it was without officers of experience; without military science or military establishments; when we recollect the comfortable mediocrity of fortune which our citizens enjoy, which gives them homes and families from which they reluctantly part; when we recollect the high spirit of liberty which is breathed by every man in our free and happy country, where the poorest man sees in the most exalted only his political equal, which, however great the political boast, is yet a circumstance the most incongruous with the spirit of subordination, and the habits of discipline and obedience, which are necessary to form soldiers; when with such means and of such materials our army was to be formed, we ought to have been prepared for many of the disasters and disappointments we have suffered. But just in proportion as we should have expected disastrous results we confidently relied upon success, and the public mind was consequently prepared to magnify our misfortunes, and to look at the future with despondency. From this cause we have been able to see but one side of the picture. Could we penetrate the councils of the enemy, and enter into his sensibilities, we might discover that our misfortunes have been magnified, and our successes diminished, by the optics which have heretofore presented them to our view. Let us compare our own situation with that of the enemy; let us enter into his sensibilities and disappointments and compare them with our own. There are but two signal instances of discomfiture of which we complain. The first in the surrender of Detroit, and the second in the failure of the expedition against Montreal. These are our principal misfortunes. On the other hand, we can boast the destruction of Proctor's army, and the successful attack and capture of York. Let us take the enemy's view of these events. Neither of the officers of the enemy who commanded on these occasions has been since employed. Proctor has suffered the severest censure, in the general orders of the Commander-in-chief, that language can express, and Sheaffe, it is understood, has been sent to England, perhaps for trial for his misconduct. The enemy, then, supposes our successes on these occasions, however we may regard them, as heavy misfortunes to his arms. The victory of Harrison was such as would have secured to a Roman General, in the best days of the Republic, the honors of a triumph. He put an end to the war in Upper Canada. The attack on York was highly spirited, and the success was brilliant and complete; and this, too, under the disadvantage of having lost the commanding officer, the gallant Pike, at the moment when the harvest of victory was to be reaped. The war on the land has not, then, been so disastrous or so dishonorable as we have sometimes supposed.

But on what principle, in estimating the character and effects of this war, are gentlemen authorized to separate the operations on land from those on the ocean and the lakes? I claim not exclusively for my own political friends the honors of our naval triumphs. I was among the first to accuse them of their neglect of this service, and to urge them to cherish and support the Naval Establishment. But I cannot either allow to the gentlemen in the Opposition the claim which they affect, of being the exclusive friends of the Navy. They have discarded the man (the late President Adams) who was its greatest patron, and rejected from the times which they love to call their own, the period in which it received its greatest and its happiest impetus. But let its patrons and its friends be whom they may, I have a right to claim its merits for the country; and when we connect our naval deeds with the other events of the war, who will venture to say this has been an inglorious war? An inglorious war! Insult not the gallant men who have fought and bled in your battles, and yet live with high claims to your applause. Tread not so rudely on the ashes of the heroic dead. Could the soul of Lawrence speak from the cerements which confine his mouldering body, in what appalling language would he rebuke the man who should assert that the contest in which he so nobly conquered and so nobly died, was an inglorious war! Will you tell that worthy man,* who fills with so much fidelity and usefulness a station in your service on this floor, that this is an inglorious war? He has beheld one son† triumph over his country's foe, and live to hear and to receive the applause and gratitude of his country. He has seen another‡ fall in the arms of victory, heroically aiding in an achievement, which, if it be not unparalleled is certainly not exceeded in the annals of history. Happy father! yet I would call him a miserable and hopeless man were this an inglorious war. But I must call him a most happy father, for God and nature have implanted in our bosoms a principle which elevates us above the love of life and friends, and makes us think their loss a blessing when they are yielded up in the cause of a beloved country, on the altar and in the spirit of patriotism. It is this principle which makes that excellent father reflect not merely with composure, but with pleasure on the child of his love giving up his life in battle; his blood mingling with the wave, and his body entombed in the bosom of Erie. Yes, he would rather feel the consciousness that his gallant boy fought with Perry and died in the glorious battle of the 10th of September, than now embrace him in his arms, again animated with the strong pulse of life—again pouring into the parental bosom his filial duty, and lighting up a father's pride and joy!

I come now to speak of that subject which was my principal inducement to claim your attention in this debate—I allude to the question of retaliation. The conduct of the Government is not only condemned in this particular, but it is also said we ought not to prosecute the war against Canada, lest it should provoke the enemy to give occasion for the exercise of the retaliation which we have threatened. Let us see what foundation there is for this humiliating doctrine. This question is one of the gravest and most solemn character; affecting deeply the honor of the country, the duty of the Government, and the lives of our citizens. I wish, for the last reason, it had been the pleasure of the gentlemen of the minority to have passed it over in silence. I think it would have been safest and wisest. I pretend not, however, to dictate the conduct of other gentlemen, but I must be permitted to enter my protest against the doctrines which have been maintained on the other side of the House on this subject. I think, but I wish to be understood as speaking with a proper deference for the opinions of other gentlemen, this subject has been very erroneously considered. It has been made by the combatants on either side to depend altogether on the question of expatriation, when it has very little and very remote relation to that question. But, as the inquiry is one of very great importance, I hope I may be pardoned for discussing it first in the way in which it has been heretofore generally treated, in order that I may draw the subject from thence, without any violence to the common mode of thinking, into that point of light in which I suppose it ought to be viewed.

To speak, then, of expatriation. The right of expatriation, which is broadly and generally affirmed on the one hand, is on the other rebutted in equal extent, by the claim of perpetual allegiance. These may be assumed to be equivalent questions. The affirmation of the one is the negation of the other. This it may be material to remember, because it will be necessary, in the course of the argument, to show that naturalization, which is generally considered as destructive of perpetual allegiance and synonymous with expatriation, is really not so. Perpetual allegiance is alleged to be founded on natural law, the positive law of nations, or the municipal law of each State. We will examine each; and first, the law of nature. To determine what is the law of nature, the simplest way may be, not to embarrass ourselves with equivocal definitions, but to look at things through our best judgments, with a view to discover their just fitness and connection. We may call in the aid and authority of writers of character and reputation, and with these lights seek our conclusion. In this view we are able to discover but two principles or pretences on which the duty of perpetual allegiance is affirmed, or the right of expatriation denied. These are the necessities of the State, and the gratitude of the subject. These are the only grounds stated by Vattel, to whom alone I shall refer as my authority for positions of natural and national law, because I can refer to no better authority, the more especially as on the points for which I shall use him, I believe he agrees with all other writers.

The obligation resulting from the necessity of the State, can apply to none but extreme cases—such, for example, as the instance of invasion, or the case of war, when great numbers should suddenly abandon the State—a necessity that neither does nor can exist in relation to the few scattered instances of expatriation which the practice and experience of nations have hitherto exhibited to our view, and which form the whole of the instances about which we reason; nor can it form any foundation for perpetual allegiance in the extent in which it is claimed; which is not confined to cases of extraordinary character, such as I have mentioned, but embraces every subject born in the country, and is neither limited by time nor circumstances.

The extent of that obligation, which is founded on the gratitude of the subject, must bear some proportion to the benefit that he has received and the favor that the Government has conferred. Now what benefit has the subject received? When in a state of infancy, he has been protected and permitted to live up to adult years in security and peace. But has this benefit imposed an obligation which has no limits, which is commensurate with every faculty, mental and physical, which the subject possesses, and coextensive with the duration of his life? Those who form a State at given time, repay, by the services of the time, the protection of the Government for the same period. The services of the ancestor are a full equivalent to the sovereign for the protection which is enjoyed by his offspring as well as himself; and the son, when he arrives at adult age and is able himself to serve the State, is nothing in arrear to the Government. Put the case of any actual society or population. Is not the protection of the Government fully repaid by the gross population, including the young and the old, at any given period? The adult, it may be admitted, owes a debt of gratitude to some one for the care and assistance by which he has been reared; to his parent, if you please, but certainly not to the sovereign, who, it is seen, has received a full equivalent for the protection which the subject has enjoyed. There appears, then, to be no foundation for the claim of perpetual allegiance in the necessities of the State, or the gratitude of the subject for the benefits he has received. I will illustrate the argument in relation to the last of these pretences by the case of parent and child. The gratitude due by the citizen to the sovereign cannot be greater in the opinion of those who most revere the obligation, than that of the child to the parent—yet there is no man who would not be shocked at the injustice of the parent who should claim from his child perpetual servitude, as a debt of gratitude for his nurture.

It remains for us to consider how far the municipal laws of nations, respectively, establish this right. And here I readily admit, that the municipal laws of England do establish the doctrine. I think, too, that the municipal laws of other nations generally accord with those of England on this subject. I then, at once, concede to the gentleman from New York (Mr. GEORGE BROWN) all that he so zealously endeavored to prove by the learned and able argument which he submitted to you the other day—that the municipal laws of England, and of nations generally, enjoin upon the subject the duty of perpetual allegiance. And I admit, further, that it is of no practical consequence to say that it is neither supported by the moral duties of the subject, nor warranted by the essential nature of Government. It is enough to say, that it is enforced by the sanctions which secure obedience to all municipal laws; though it be not just, it does not cease to be obligatory wherever municipal laws can operate. But the gentleman from New York, and those who reason with him, having established the doctrine of perpetual allegiance, at once assume, in substance, though not in express terms, a distinct proposition, equally necessary to their conclusion, which they have not proved or even attempted to prove—namely, universal allegiance. I doubt whether my meaning, in the use of this term, may be clearly understood, and therefore I will define it. It is intended to say, that the allegiance claimed is not only co-extensive with the territorial limits, and the extension of the territorial power of the natural sovereign, but also goes with the subject into the territories, and under the territorial power of every other sovereign under whose jurisdiction he may reside. The argument of the gentleman, it is admitted, establishes perpetual allegiance; but it assumes that this perpetual allegiance is also universal. Now, the latter is denied, and clearly does not exist; he has offered no proof to establish it; and, if we recur to the principles which we have already proved, it will appear satisfactory that it cannot exist. It has been proved that the power of a Government is only co-extensive with its territorial limits, and the extension of its territorial power. Beyond these, it can neither enforce duties nor extend protection. Now, the basis of allegiance is protection; and all legal duties must suppose, at least in theory and in the nature of things, an ability to enforce them; but, beyond the territorial limits and the extension of the territorial power of a Government, neither of these exist, nor can, in the nature of things, exist; and of course, beyond these, allegiance must cease. It will be no reply to this argument to say that, on the return of the subject to the dominions of his native sovereign, his allegiance is restored. It is admitted that allegiance is not limited by time, but it yet remains to be established that it is not limited by space; that, when out of these dominions, the citizen is subject to a power which in its nature only can exist within them. Nor will it be more material to prove that, on the return of a subject to his native country, he may be punished for any offences—denominated such by the internal laws of the State—which have been committed without its limits; for that will only prove that the sovereign authority is uncontrollable within the territorial limits of the State; that it may enforce unjust laws, and inflict unjust punishments. But it is sufficient for the present argument to say, as will be proved hereafter, that, when taken in arms, he is protected from the operation of municipal laws by the laws of arms.

It has even been contended, that we have not the right to naturalize the subjects of another power, in such a manner as to impose the obligation of bearing arms against that power, even within our own territory; and that, if our constitution and laws speak a different language, they are nugatory. All nations, speaking generally, have, indeed, claimed the duty of perpetual allegiance; but the same nations, at the same time, have exercised the power of naturalization; the British nation, particularly, without any formality of process, naturalizes the subjects of other powers in the most extensive sense of the word. Our constitution, on this subject, is as explicit as language can make it; and it is hardly fair for gentlemen to take for granted that all the great men who framed and signed that instrument, with WASHINGTON at their head, were so grossly ignorant of the relative rights and duties of nations as this argument necessarily supposes. Let me say to these gentlemen, that I have understood, and believe, this provision of the constitution was introduced into the instrument by a gentleman (Alexander Hamilton) who, I acknowledge, was a very great man, and to whose memory they are not unwilling to pay the highest honors. Will the gentleman say he was thus ignorant of the relative rights and duties of nations?

But I repeat, and I will now endeavor to prove, that the question of retaliation has been very improperly connected with those of perpetual allegiance, naturalization, and expatriation. Perpetual allegiance is indeed so far connected with retaliation as to be the pretence under which, sometimes, that act of an enemy is committed which renders retaliation necessary, and naturalization is so far connected with it, as to increase the obligation of the adopted sovereign to retaliate for the injury done to the naturalized citizen, as the ties that bind them together are more close and numerous, and more solemn, than those which connect a sovereign and the stranger who merely bears arms in his service. The foundation, however, of the right of retaliation is not at all formed by these ties; but by the laws and usages of civilized nations in war. The proper mode of discussing this question was well indicated by the example of the venerable gentleman (Mr. FINDLAY) from Pennsylvania, and has been pursued, with great success, by the gentleman (Mr. ROBERTSON) from Louisiana, the latter part of whose speech, that which was delivered during the last ten minutes he addressed you, was, in my opinion, worth all (I deny not the abstract talent displayed by others) that has been said within as well as without these walls on the subject, because he proved by the best example what is the usage of nations on this point; which at once presented the proper mode and the true object of inquiry. Before the mitigated practice of modern times had softened and civilized the character of war, it would have been considered absurd in the victor to talk of his right to punish the vanquished, as a traitor under the municipal laws of his native country, when he had been taken in arms against it. The rights of war gave him the readier means of his sword and his will. Amidst arms, municipal laws are correctly said to be silent; the original right of the victor was to put his prisoners to death—this is still his extreme right, and still exists in such degree as to merge and in effect to annihilate all other rights over the captive, but it is a right controlled by the mitigated usages of modern times, and these usages have become the established laws and rights of civilized war. Examples of these mitigated usages are numerous. The property of the subjects of an enemy is on land generally held inviolable. Persons not belligerent, though enemies, are not even treated as prisoners of war. On the ocean they are suffered to pass unmolested, and are often, within the territory of an enemy, permitted to reside in peace, protected by the laws of the State. But above all, the life of a prisoner of war is to be held sacred, and he is to be treated with humanity and kindness. Engrafted on these usages, to secure them from violation, arose the practice of retaliation, which, far from being, even where it extends to the deprivation of human life, an act of cruelty, is, when soberly and correctly, though sternly and inexorably applied, sacred to humanity. Were it not for this sanction, we should probably soon bid adieu to the civilized and mitigated character of modern war, which would assume its ancient ferocity. Acts of retaliation are like judicial sacrifices on the altar of justice, in which, though humanity may weep, the offended laws must be satisfied. If it be replied that the instance is dissimilar, because the subject of retaliation is innocent, it is answered that the victims of war are generally innocent. It must be ever a subject of lamentation when we are obliged to take the life of man. It is still more a subject of lamentation when the blood of the innocent is shed, but the condition of humanity sometimes requires and justice sometimes commands us to do both. It is however said, that though retaliation be admitted to be a general right of war, yet when the natural sovereign finds his subject in arms against him, he has a right to punish him as a traitor, and that the sovereign in whose ranks and under whose colors he fought has no right to retaliate. But has not this argument been already refuted? Has it not been proved that all the rights of the victor over the captive are merged in those of war? There is no collision between the municipal laws and the laws of war. The captive is a prisoner of war, and in this character never becomes subject to any other than the laws of war.

But it is attempted to be proved, by legal and historical instances, that Great Britain has punished her subjects who have been taken in arms against her, and thence it is inferred that this is the law of nations generally and of war. Were the premises admitted, the conclusion would not follow. But these examples only prove exceptions to the general rule. They are cases in which power and violence have trampled on law and principle, because no national or other arm of sufficient vigor was interposed to protect and save the victims. The instances which have been mentioned are generally those which grow out of civil wars, and occurred at times when all resistance to the Government had been put down, and there remained no ability in the vanquished to execute retaliation. Such were the cases of Æneas McDonald, Colonel Townley, and others. In that of Doctor Story, which was most relied upon by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. Gaston,) though he had become a Spanish subject and resided in the dominions of Spain for some years, yet he had returned to England and there had committed treason. On such a case there could be no question. [Mr. Gaston said this case was generally misunderstood, and was taken to be such as had been just stated by the gentleman from South Carolina—but in Dyer's Reports, where the case was best reported, it would appear that the treason was committed in Flanders.] I am glad, said Mr. C., that the gentleman has corrected me. I should be very sorry to misrepresent the argument of any gentleman, and especially that of one whose conduct in debate is so fair and honorable as that of the gentleman from North Carolina. I have not examined the case particularly, because the principle of my argument admits these cases. My object was merely to class and characterize them. Let it not however be understood, when I say that most of the instances relied upon occurred in civil wars, that therefore I admit them to have been authorized by the laws of war. On the contrary I will demonstrate, that even in civil wars, the law of nations protects the life of the captive who has resisted his natural sovereign, and secures him the rights of a prisoner of war, according to the usages of modern times. That when these rights have been violated, retaliation is authorized, and that history records the instances in which it has been successfully exercised. I hear it suggested (by Mr. Grosvenor) that in civil wars this may be the law and usage of nations, but that it is otherwise when the subjects of one sovereign join the arms of another sovereign with whom he is at war. This does indeed seem to be a very extraordinary distinction—it does appear to me that if this inviolability of the captive can be established to be the law and usage of war in civil contests, it is a fortiori proved to be the law and usage of national contests. A single authority will put the first of these positions beyond doubt. Vattel says:

"A civil war breaks the bands of society and government, or at least, it suspends their force and effect; produces in the nation two independent parties, considering each other as enemies and acknowledging no common judge; therefore of necessity these two parties must, at least for a time, be considered as forming two separate bodies, two distinct people; though one of them may be in the wrong in breaking the continuity of the State, to raise up against lawful authority, they are not the less divided in fact; besides, who shall pronounce on which side the right or the wrong lies? On earth they have no common superior. Thus they are in the case of two nations, who, having a dispute which they cannot adjust, are compelled to decide it by force of arms.

"Things being thus situated, it is very evident that the common laws of war, those maxims of humanity, moderation, and probity, which we have before enumerated and recommended, are in civil wars to be observed on both sides. The same reasons on which the obligation between State and State is founded, render them even more necessary in the unhappy circumstances when two incensed parties are destroying their common country. Should the sovereign conceive he has a right to hang up his prisoners as rebels, the opposite party will make reprisals. If he does not religiously observe the capitulations, and all the conventions made with his enemies, they will no longer rely on his word. Should he burn and destroy, they will follow his example; the war will become cruel and horrid; its calamities will increase on the nation. The Duke de Montpensier's infamous and barbarous excesses against the reformed in France are too well known. The men were delivered up to the executioner, and the women to the brutality of the soldiers. What was the consequence? The reformed became exasperated; they took vengeance of such inhuman practices; and the war, before sufficiently cruel, as a civil and religious war, became more bloody and destructive. Who could, without horror, read the savage cruelties committed by the Baron des Adrets? By turns a Catholic and a Protestant, he distinguished himself by his barbarity to both sides. At length there was a necessity for departing from such affectations of juridical superiority against persons who could support their cause sword in hand, and of treating them not as criminals, but as enemies. Even troops have often refused to serve in a war wherein the Prince exposed them to cruel reprisals. Officers who had the highest sense of honor, though ready to shed their blood in the field of battle, for his service, have not thought it any part of their duty to run the hazard of an ignominious death. Therefore, whenever a numerous party thinks it has a right to resist the sovereign, and finds itself able to declare that opinion, sword in hand, the war is to be carried on between them in the same manner as between two different nations; and they are to leave open the same means of preventing enormous violences and restoring peace."

Here, then, we see the reason on which the rights and usages of nations are applied to civil wars, is, that those who resist have swords in their hands, and become assimilated to independent nations.

In short, the basis of retaliation is humanity. As no nation or body of men will suffer their enemies to put those to death who fight under their banners, under any pretence whatever, interest and fear restrain an enemy from putting his prisoners to death, when he knows the act will be retaliated. But, retaliation is always a question of expediency. If we were at war with a nation dead to all the sensibilities of our nature—a nation that would suffer, without remorse or feeling, its innocent subjects to become victims to a sanguinary violation, on its own part, of the usages of civilized war, we might be obliged to forbear, as we would know the object of retaliation would not be gained. But, for myself, I deem more highly of the British nation and Government. I do not believe the Government of that nation to be so wicked as to provoke the consequences which must inevitably follow the execution of the barbarous threat they have uttered—that they would treat as criminals the natives of Great Britain, who have been taken prisoners in our ranks. Deserters alone have been permitted to form an exception to the general rule, that the life of a prisoner shall be sacred; and the humanity of modern times has even contrived the means of saving the lives of deserters. Hence, the practice of permitting the garrisons of captured places to march out with a certain number of covered wagons, which are not to be searched. (Vattel, b. 8, ch. 8, sec. 144.) The reason given is, that they have become numerous, and that humanity forbids their destruction—undoubtedly a very sufficient reason, but exactly the reverse of that which is sometimes urged in justification of the threat of the British Government. It is said, that in consequence of the sameness of language, similarity of personal appearance, connections in trade, and ease and frequency of intercourse, those who join us are numerous, and therefore it is necessary to punish them when found in arms.

I must again bring to your notice the authority which was yesterday presented to you by the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. ROBERTSON,) because it bears so directly on the question before you, and affords the views and opinions of the legislators and statesmen of Great Britain herself, confirming entirely the doctrine on which the Government of the United States acts at this time.

[Here Mr. C. read several extracts from a debate in the House of Commons, on a bill to raise a corps of French emigrants, in which Mr. Burke was the principal speaker.]

Mr. C. continued. No human authority can be of more value than that of this great man, (Mr. Burke,) who at once teaches the doctrine, and gives the examples which establish that doctrine, in all the extent in which this Government claims the right to exercise it. It is true, that in this debate Mr. Sheridan attempts to destroy the value and impeach the accuracy of some of the instances which Mr. Burke had mentioned, but, as was to have been expected, he has not succeeded. Mr. Sheridan says, in each of the examples Mr. Burke had mentioned:

"Except with regard to America, he had entirely failed. The first is the conduct of the English with regard to the Irish regiments in the French service in the year 1745. A space of near sixty years had elapsed when they took some of them prisoners, but it was not very probable that many of those who left Ireland in 1688 returned to invade England in 1745." "The next, he says, was the conduct of the French to Lord Ligonier, who was one of the French refugees, banished from France by the revocation of the edict of Nantes—which was in itself one of the most cruel and barbarous actions that ever disgraced history—in the year 1682, and he was taken prisoner in the year 1747—a period of sixty-five years. So that the probability is, that it was the father of his Lordship who was a refugee, or at least that his Lordship must have been a child in arms at the time."

It seems to be a work of supererogation to attempt to support the authority of Edmund Burke; yet, it may be proper to say a few words in reply to these objections of Mr. Sheridan. Though it be true, as he states, that few of the Irish brigades who entered the French service in 1688, remained to invade England in 1745; yet, it is a fact, well attested by history, that these corps were afterwards kept up by the enlistment of the natives of Ireland—a fact which leaves the example at least equally strong. Admit, too, Lord Ligonier to have been a child in arms, but a native of France, is not the example one which is diametrically opposed to the doctrine of those who in this argument deny the right of retaliation? They allow neither age nor circumstances to form an exception to the general rule.

Mr. BAYLIE, of Massachusetts, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of soliciting the attention of the committee for a short time. I do it with great and unaffected reluctance, as I am conscious that my remarks must be of a desultory nature; and that so able, elaborate, and eloquent, has been the manner in which the bill on your table, and the topics connected with it, have already been discussed, as almost to preclude the hope that it will be in my power to add any thing, either to instruct the understanding or to interest the feelings. In truth, when this bill was introduced, it was not my intention to make it the subject of a single remark; but, on reflection, I was convinced that there would be a propriety in my stating the reasons by which I should be governed in my vote, and the ground on which I was prepared to justify it. This was the extent of my wish and intention; and even this wish and intention, I believe I should have foregone, (after one ineffectual attempt to obtain the floor,) had it not been that some remarks were made yesterday, in the course of debate, which, in my opinion, demand attention. The bill under consideration, should the blank be filled in the manner proposed by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, will authorize the loan of twenty-five millions of dollars. To pay the interest of the debt, thus to be created, it will be necessary to continue a system of taxation, odious and oppressive to the people. The principal of the debt will, I presume, descend as a burden to posterity.

The Loan Bill.

It is not my purpose, however, to controvert the facts stated by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, or his reasoning upon those facts—though that reasoning, I think, was more specious than solid. I admit that the resources of this country, under the fostering hand of a wise, prudent, and efficient Administration, would be equal to meet a debt of this, and even of a larger amount. But I am opposed to this bill, because its object is to place money in the hands of the present Administration, to enable them to pursue a system of measures and a course of policy hostile, as I think, to the best interests of this country; to enable them to continue the war in which we are now engaged; a war which, I believe in my conscience, was in its origin unnecessary and inexpedient; which is prosecuted without any adequate cause; which, in its progress, has brought heavy and severe calamities upon our country; and which, if protracted to any distant period, will, I fear, be productive of consequences the most disastrous.

While I claim the privilege of animadverting upon the measures of the Administration, I impeach not the motives of gentlemen who maintain opinions different from my own. It is my duty, however, to act according to the deliberate decisions of my own understanding, and the clear convictions of my own conscience.

The minority, or the Opposition, as they are emphatically denominated, are accused of inconsistency, in admitting that Great Britain has done us wrong, and, at the same time, persisting in calling this war unjust. It is not every wrong that will justify a nation in resorting to arms to obtain redress. War, it has been well said, is the extremity of human evil. The most successful war, in a Government like ours, must bring with it, of necessity, a numerous train of calamities. It increases the public burdens; it impoverishes the people, relaxes the moral habits, promotes a spirit of licentiousness, unnerves the hand of industry, and, by elevating the military above the civil authority, endangers our liberties. It was said, I think, by a gentleman of Virginia, formerly a distinguished member of this House, that this Government was not calculated for offensive war; that it was putting the constitution to a test which it could not endure. There is, in my opinion, much wisdom in the remark. The situation to which we are reduced is sufficient evidence of the evils of war; our frontier is desolated; our commerce ruined; our Treasury exhausted; the people discontented and divided, yet we were precipitated into war, "as if it was a matter of experiment," "an idle frolic," "as if the dire goddess, who presides over it, with her murderous spear in her hand, and her gorgon at her breast, was a coquette to be flirted with."

For what are we prosecuting this war? For a cause, as has been shown by an honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. GASTON,) for which war was not declared—for sailors' rights. The violation of sailors' rights is now the professed cause of this war, and the protection of them its avowed object. The subject of impressment under the Administration of Washington, ever the vigilant guardian of the rights and honor of his country; under that of Mr. Adams and that of Mr. Jefferson, was not considered a sufficient cause of war; nor was it so considered by Mr. Madison himself at the time of the arrangement with Mr. Erskine. The honorable SPEAKER has just acknowledged, that, in his opinion, war would not have been declared at the time it was declared, but for the Orders in Council.

It does appear to me, that the subject of impressment is indebted for the very great importance now attached to it, to the revocation of the Orders in Council. But allow that impressment furnishes a just cause of war against Great Britain, can we hope to obtain from her more upon this point by arms than by amicable negotiation? It is well known that this right which Great Britain claims to exercise, of taking from the merchant vessels of other nations her own native seamen, is considered by her as essential to her maritime strength; in other words, as essential to her national existence; and, so strongly is this claim supported by national sentiment, that no Ministry would dare to surrender it. She may consent to an arrangement upon this subject, which, without derogating from the right, may render the exercise of it less liable to abuse, and less injurious to this country; but this can be obtained only by negotiation.

It ought to be considered, that this is not a novel claim set up by Great Britain. It has been exercised by her for a great length of time, even long before we existed as an independent nation; founded upon principles which she holds sacred—that every nation, in time of war, has a right to the services of its citizens; and that allegiance is perpetual. But an honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. MONTGOMERY) denies to Great Britain the right to impress her own seamen in her own territorial jurisdiction;

it being, as he says, in violation of the principles of Magna Charta.

This I consider a question between the British subject and his Government, with which we have nothing to do. The practice of impressment has been justified by some of her ablest and most popular writers: even by Junius himself, the great champion of Opposition, in his time, and has been recognized as a part of the common law by the judicial decisions of some of her most eminent judges. Though the claim of Great Britain is limited to her own seamen, yet it is true that American seamen are sometimes taken by mistake, and sometimes by the wanton act of the British naval officers. The number of our seamen thus taken, I think, however, has been greatly exaggerated. Many British seamen pass as American under American protections, in obtaining which great frauds are practised. But whatever may be the extent of the injury which we suffer by impressment, I should be as much gratified as any person could an adequate remedy be provided for it. But how are we to obtain satisfaction by prosecuting this war? I shall be answered—by the conquest of Canada. The conquest of Canada, for the purpose of incorporating it into the Union, though it may come “within the scope of the policy” of some gentlemen, is, in my apprehension, a project so wild, and I hope I may be pardoned the expression, so preposterous, that I cannot believe it will receive the deliberate sanction of a majority of this committee, much less of the nation. Sad experience must have convinced us that Canada cannot be conquered without a great expense of blood and treasure; and, when acquired, it cannot be worth to us the price at which we must purchase it. We have territories enough. Instead of strengthening, it would weaken the Union.

As to the conquest of Canada as the means of obtaining a satisfactory peace as an instrument of negotiation, I presume the most sanguine do not indulge the expectation of effecting that conquest under six or nine months; certainly not in time to assist us in the present negotiation; and, should we obtain possession of Canada, we never shall be able to extort from Great Britain, or purchase from her, by the surrender of it, any concession upon the point in controversy, of sufficient importance to justify the sacrifices we must make in the acquisition of it.

I stand not here to eulogize the character of Great Britain, or to exalt her power; but to pursue the true interest of my country, as far as my feeble understanding can enable me to ascertain it. I do not, however, consider it as any proof of the want of patriotism not to subscribe to the philippics pronounced by gentlemen against Britain. In assailing her in the manner they have, it seems to me that passion triumphs over judgment, and that, while advocating the cause of our holy religion, they forget that charity is its vital principle.

But it is said we are acting in opposition to the sentiments of the people; that the war is popular, and the vigorous prosecution of it demanded by the feelings of the nation. As to that part of the country from which I have the honor to come, this war ever has been, and, I trust, ever will be, an unpopular and an odious war, especially as to the proposed conquest of Canada.

Upon this subject there is hardly a division of sentiment. Men who rally under the banners of the Administration upon every other question, put their faces against them on this.

I speak not merely of the merchants, that respectable class of the community. I speak of the real strength of every free country, the substantial yeomanry; the hardy cultivators of their own soil, who will defend that soil with their hearts' blood. The subtlety of lawyers has not cheated them into the opinions they entertain. They have formed them by consulting their own good feelings, their own plain, unsophisticated understandings. I regret that I am under the necessity of making any remarks that may be considered in any degree as local. I disclaim all invidious comparisons between the different parts of the United States; but there have been so many allusions to the State from which I have the honor to come, and to the spirit which is supposed to manifest itself there, that I feel it to be my duty to call the attention of the committee to the subject. There is nothing in the character of my native State that I shall blush to defend. There is nothing in the character of my immediate constituents which should humble me on this floor as their representative, unless it be the consciousness that they have conferred on me an honor beyond my merits.

The honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. CUTHBERT,) whose animated speech I heard with the most friendly interest and attention, said that the inhabitants of New England were jealous of their rights. The people of this country were characterized by Edmund Burke as men jealous of their rights, alike to every invasion or supposed invasion of them;—“who augured misgovernment at a distance, and snuffed the approach of tyranny in every tainted breeze.”

The people of whom I speak, still possess some portion of that spirit. Such being their temper, they may be betrayed into excesses from an excitement of feeling; they may fall into errors of opinion from want of information; but it is not wise in Government to attempt to reclaim them by insulting their prejudices, if prejudices they entertain, or by treating with indifference or contempt their complaints, founded on their honest convictions. The Legislature of Massachusetts have passed no act which they had not a constitutional right to adopt. They know their duty, and will perform it. They know their rights, too, and will, I trust, maintain them. There are, and I am proud to say it, some of the few survivors of the good old Revolution high in the councils of my native State—men who staked their lives on the issue of that contest which terminated in the acknowledgment of our independence—men who, in the path of duty, will be as little dismayed by the glitter of hostile steel as by the glitter of the tinselled invective of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. FORSYTH.)

FRIDAY, February 25.

The Loan Bill.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the Loan bill.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen on the other side oppose this bill, because it will provide the means to effect an unrighteous end. They say that the war was unjust in its commencement. That, if originally just, it is now unnecessary, as the Orders in Council are revoked.

That impressment, of itself, was never considered a cause of war.

That the war might have been honorably avoided, by the arrangement made by Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney, and

That the system of retaliation, resorted to by the President, has given to the war a character of ferocity unknown to civilized nations.

Sir, before I proceed to detect and expose the fallacy of these assertions, permit me to call back your attention to our glorious Revolution—not like the revolutions of Europe, the exchange of one tyrant for another, but a revolution of principles, whereby the sovereignty of Kings was overturned, and the sovereignty of the people established on its ruins.

By the great charter of our independence, it is expressly declared, "that all men are by nature equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." That all legitimate power flows from the people, and is to be exercised, only, to promote their happiness.

This, sir, is the fair fabric of our rights, constructed by the proscribed patriots of the Revolution, and cemented by the blood of our martyred heroes. From this fountain flows our constitution, constructed, expressly, "to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity;" and I conjure you, by the sacred obligations under which you act, to protect those sacred rights so solemnly secured.

I will now proceed to show that the war was just in its commencement; that the Orders in Council are not revoked; that the impressment of seamen is, of itself, a just cause of war; that the arrangement made by Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney could not have been honorably adopted, and that the retaliatory system resorted to by the President was not an act of ferocity but of humanity.

Sir, that the war was just in its commencement will appear by a short review of the causes that produced it. In the year 1792, the venerable Washington declared that the practice of impressment was intolerable, and that it must be discontinued or war would be inevitable; Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, was no doubt of the same opinion; Mr. Adams when President declared the same opinion, and the sentiments of his Cabinet, Mr. Pickering, and Mr. Marshall, now Chief Justice, Mr. Stoddart and Mr. Wolcott, which have been read, prove that they then were of the same opinion.

The law of nations expressly declares, that, for every injury, if redress is demanded or required, and unreasonably delayed, it is just cause of war; and Mr. Pinckney of South Carolina, when Minister, informs us, that on his application for impressed seamen, then in London, they were sent off, without suffering an investigation of their rights. Great Britain has, no doubt, disclaimed the right of impressing American seamen, but has added insult to injury, by exercising it, and impressing thousands of our seamen in direct violation of her own admission. Our Ministers have told us, that while she impresses her native born subjects, who have been naturalized, married, and settled in the United States, voluntarily entering our service, she refuses to release native born American citizens, impressed into her service, because they are married and settled in England. Can such monstrous inconsistencies be submitted to? Was Mr. King, a Minister under two Administrations, by the exercise of his distinguished talents and devotion to this subject, enabled to effect an honorable arrangement? No, sir, and Lord Castlereagh declared to Mr. Russell, "that the friends of Great Britain in Congress were mistaken on that point." We see by the official documents in 1807, that out of 2,059 cases of imprisonment, 102 only were British subjects; that 1,142 were discharged, and 805 kept for further proof, with the strongest presumption that they were aliens, or Americans whose protections had been lost.

These 1,142 unfortunate citizens, I presume, will be admitted to have been impressed, as they were discharged as such; and also the 1,600 declared by Lord Castlereagh in Parliament to have been impressed; even by the "friends of Great Britain in Congress," as his Lordship has dubbed them. And I hope honorable gentlemen, after Lord Castlereagh has declared that they were mistaken in their declarations, "that the Government, through Mr. King, might have honorably arranged the subject of impressment," will not further expose their devotion to that nation, nor deny that the 1,600 impressed in time of peace, and since made prisoners of war, is a just cause of war. I will next examine the spoliation on our commerce, their commencement and progress, with the pretexts under which they have been committed. Great Britain in June, 1803, passed an Order in Council, unlawfully restricting the trade of the United States with a certain portion of the unblockaded ports of her enemy, and condemning our vessels with innocent cargoes on their return voyage from ports where they had deposited contraband articles; after it had been expressly decided by the High Court of Admiralty, that an American had a right to import into America the produce of a Spanish colony, and that landing the cargo and paying the duties would break the continuity of the voyage, and justify their re-exportation to any part of Europe; and after Lord Hawkesbury had communicated to Mr. King that decision, approved by the Advocate General, and by Lord Hawkesbury, establishing the law, that landing the goods and paying the duties in the neutral country would break the continuity of the voyage, and was such an importation as would legalize the trade, although the goods were shipped in the same vessel, on account of the same owners, and sent to the mother country that produced them. And yet notwithstanding this order—this decision of the High Court of Admiralty—this report of the Advocate General, and this official communication by Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. King, our commerce was swept from the ocean, and condemned in direct violation of the order, the decision, and the report of the Advocate General so officially communicated, and it would seem insidiously to inspire us with confidence, to increase that commerce, that they might, like the panther in ambush, unsuspectingly leap upon their prey. This outrageous conduct gave rise to clamors in every commercial circle in the United States, and, at the opening of the session of 1805, the President informed us, "that the British had captured, in the very entrance of our harbors, as well as on the high seas, not only the vessels of our friends coming to trade with us, but our own also; that they have carried them off, under the pretence of legal adjudication; but not daring to approach a court of justice, they have plundered and sunk them by the way, or in obscure places, where no evidence could arise against them, maltreated the crews and abandoned them in boats on the open seas, or on desert shores, without food or covering." "That new principles had been interpolated in the law of nations. According to them, a belligerent takes to itself a commerce with its own enemy that it denies to neutrals, on the ground of its aiding the enemy in war. But reason revolts at such inconsistency; and the neutral having equal right with the belligerent to decide the question, the interest of our constituents, and the duty of maintaining the authority of reason, the only umpire between just nations, impose on us the obligation of providing an effectual and determined opposition to a doctrine so injurious to the rights of peaceable nations." In January, 1806, remonstrances came in from Boston, Salem, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Charleston, praying that the Government would take the subject under consideration, and also the impressment of seamen. On the 17th January, 1806, the President again pressed the subject on the consideration of Congress, with the memorials of the merchants, which he told us would develop these principles and practices, which are producing the most ruinous effects on our lawful commerce and navigation. He remarks, "that on the subject of impressment our remonstrances have never been intermitted; a hope existed at one moment of an arrangement that might have been submitted to, but it soon passed away; and the practice, although relaxed at times in distant seas, has been constantly pursued in our neighborhood." On the 12th February, 1806, Congress took up the consideration of the Message of the President, with the memorials of the merchants, which relate to the spoliation of our commerce on the high seas, and to the new principles assumed by the British Courts of Admiralty, as a pretext for the condemnation of our vessels in their prize courts, and passed the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the captures and condemnation under the orders of the British Government, and adjudications of their Courts of Admiralty, of American vessels and their cargoes, on the pretext of their being employed in a trade with the enemies of Great Britain prohibited in time of peace, is an unprovoked aggression upon the property of the citizens of these United States, and an encroachment upon their national independence.

2. Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to demand and insist upon the restoration of the property of their citizens, captured and condemned, on the pretext of its being employed in a trade with the enemies of Great Britain, prohibited in time of peace, and upon the indemnification of such American citizens for their losses and damages sustained by these captures and condemnations; and to enter into such arrangements with the British Government on this and all other differences subsisting between the two nations, (and particularly with respect to the impressment of American seamen,) as may be consistent with the honor and interests of the United States, and manifest their earnest desire to obtain for themselves and their citizens, by amicable negotiation, that justice to which they are entitled.

The President immediately appointed Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney Envoys Extraordinary, and instructed them to insist on an arrangement for the protection of our seamen, and indemnification for spoliations, agreeably to the said resolutions; and he also instructed them to procure an article for defining legal blockades. The British, not content with their new principles and aggressions under them, on the 16th of May, 1806, issued an Order of Council for blockading the coast from the river Elbe to Brest. On the 11th of May, 1807, they issued another order, blockading the Elbe, Weser, and the coast between the same; and also the Dardanelles and Smyrna. On the 8th of January, 1808, of Carthagena, Cadiz, and St. Lucar, and all the intermediate ports between Carthagena and St. Lucar, comprehending a greater extent of coast than their whole navy could blockade agreeably to their own definition of a blockade. And Great Britain, although her Order in Council was made on the 16th of May, 1806, from Elbe to Brest, charges it to the account of France as a measure of retaliation for her decree, blockading the British isles as a measure of retaliation for British violations of the law of nations by their said order, although that decree was made the 21st of November, 1806; and although on its face it carried the absurdity of making the effect precede the cause, she was not without her votaries in this body, notwithstanding this extraordinary and outrageous conduct. Our Envoys, with all their zeal and abilities, were unable to procure a treaty securing us against impressment, or indemnification for spoliation, or even the definition of a legal blockade; nor have I ever heard an insinuation that they did not do all in their power to obtain it.

[H. OF R.]

After the failure of redress, by treaty, the embargo was adopted, which, no doubt, had the most salutary effect of securing the remnant of our commerce from the gripe of the enemy, whose ports were crowded with the captured vessels of the United States; and when its effects were most sensibly felt by the enemy, writhing under its pressure, at the instance of our Eastern brethren it was repealed, and the non-intercourse law adopted, by which France and England were, after a certain time, interdicted the commerce of the United States, unless they revoked, or so modified their orders and decrees, that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States. After this, Mr. Erskine, on the 18th of April, 1809, informed the Secretary of State, Mr. Smith, "that he was instructed to communicate to the American Government His Majesty's determination of sending to the United States an Envoy Extraordinary, invested with full powers to conclude a treaty on all the points of the retaliations between the two countries. That in the mean time His Majesty would withdraw his Orders in Council, if the President would issue a proclamation for the renewal of the intercourse with Great Britain." Mr. Erskine being informed that his proposition would be accepted, on the 19th of April, 1809, in an official note, says: "I am authorized to declare that His Majesty's Orders in Council, of January and November, 1807, will have been withdrawn, as respects the United States, on the 10th day of June next." The President, on the same day, issued his proclamation, declaring, "that the Orders in Council will have been removed on the 10th day of June next; after which day the trade of the United States with Great Britain, as suspended by the act of Congress above mentioned, and the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto, may be renewed." For this arrangement, the President was eulogized by the Federalists. Britain thereby obtained large supplies of provisions, but rejected the arrangement, as authorized by her Minister; and the President was charged by the Federalist, in conjunction with Great Britain, with seducing their Minister into the arrangement, with a knowledge that he had no power to make it. The non-intercourse law was, of course, again declared in full force against Great Britain. On the 5th of August, 1810, France, through her Minister, declared to our Minister, at Paris, in a note of that date, that, after the 1st of November, 1810, her decrees would be revoked, or so modified that they would cease to violate our neutral commerce, provided we caused our rights to be respected, by enforcing the non-intercourse act against Great Britain. We accordingly passed an act for that purpose, against which, however, the Federalists voted. And France, on the 28th of April, 1811, on the receipt of the act of Congress, enforcing the non-intercourse act against Great Britain definitively, ratified her revocation of her decrees, agreeably to her preliminary act of the 5th of August, 1810, upon the condition pre-expressed in our law. And although, in the Erskine arrangement, not one word was said about spoliations, and the Government was applauded by the majority for the act; yet, in the arrangement with France, it was opposed by these gentlemen, and the Government denounced for not insisting on a contemporaneous agreement to pay for spoliations. Great Britain neither revoked her Orders in Council nor sent an Envoy Extraordinary, but she refused to revoke them under the pretext that Erskine had no power: and she sent an Extraordinary Envoy, (Mr. Jackson,) whose history and dismissal you all know, who proved himself to be the same Jackson who so distinguished himself at Copenhagen. After all these things, and the declarations of Great Britain, that, on the revocation of the French decrees, she would revoke her Orders in Council, Mr. Foster, then Minister near the United States, unequivocally declared that, although France should have revoked her decrees as to the United States, Great Britain would not revoke her Orders in Council. In this posture of our affairs, and, after every effort to settle them by negotiation had failed, the war was declared. And, although gentlemen on this floor may declare it unjust, I have no doubt the American people believe it just, and that the honest historian will record it just. But they say the Orders in Council are revoked, which were the cause of the war, and to continue it would be unjust. Had gentlemen examined the instrument and the despatch enclosing it, they would not have made the assertion. The Prince Regent declares that the Orders in Council of the 7th of January, 1807, and the 26th of April, 1809, be revoked; but, unless we repeal our act prohibiting British armed vessels entering our ports, that the revocation of his Orders are null and void; and "his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, is hereby pleased further to declare, in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty, that nothing in this present Order shall be understood to preclude his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, if circumstances shall so require, from restoring, after reasonable notice, the Orders of the 7th of January, 1807, and the 26th of April, 1809, or any part thereof, to full effect, or from taking such other measures of retaliation against the enemy, as may appear to his Royal Highness to be just and necessary."

They tell us that the system of retaliation resorted to by the President, has given to the war a character of ferocity unknown to civilized nations. The term ferocity they borrow, no doubt, from the Maryland memorial, the production of a hopeful band, who ferociously broke into a temple of liberty, although locked with the key of our holy religion, and rifled it of three golden lamps, that had been selected by the sovereign people of Alleghany, and foisted in their place three others of brass, that had been rejected by them. Can such men, without book, be entitled to credit, who after kissing the book have violated the sacred charter of our liberties, and that in the most vital point, the right of suffrage?

Retaliation is a right of war, governed by the laws of war. Bynkershoek, in his Law of War, declares "that retaliation may be made on him who does the injury—that the safety of the people is the soul of the law of war."

In England it is a prerogative right vested in the Crown, where the sovereignty of the nation is lodged, an unwritten law. In the United States the sovereignty is in the people, and no power vested in the President but by written law, made by their representatives, and for which purpose the law of retaliation was passed, vesting this power in the President.

On the 10th July, 1776, almost coterminously with the Declaration of Independence, Congress passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That if the enemy shall put to death, torture, or maltreat the prisoners retained by them, retaliation, the only means of stopping the progress of inhuman butchery, and, for that purpose, punishments of the same kind and degree, be inflicted on an equal number of the captives from them in our possession, until they shall be taught to respect the violated rights of nations."

Congress on the 3d March, 1799, by a law of that date, authorized the President (if any citizen of the United States, who shall have been impressed into the British service, shall be taken by France, and by the authority of France shall suffer death or other corporeal punishment) and required him to cause the most rigorous retaliation to be executed on any citizen of the French Republic.

I have presented to you, on this subject, the laws of war, the law and practice of Great Britain, the law of nature, and the law of God; the law and practice of 1776, and an act of this Congress under the Federal Administration—though I am aware that it may be said they were Frenchmen.

Sir, by your naturalization act we give to persons every right of a citizen, except to be a President, and pledge the faith of the nation for their protection, as a counterpart of their pledge of allegiance. We are therefore as much bound to protect them as if native citizens; and were we to decline their protection by retaliation, we should be accessaries to their murder. And if Great Britain shall presume, under her claim of perpetual allegiance, to execute one of them, who have been taken in arms defending their adopted country, we will convince her that our power, without any claim of allegiance over her subjects, is as well founded, by exercising it. In this opinion I am doubly fortified, by the President recommending the act of retaliation, and by his vote in the old Congress, to hang Agill for Captain Huddy, when Agill was given up.

This power was exercised by the patriots of the Revolution, and with so much success, that in the debates in Parliament, we are informed there were but four cases during the Revolution—then it will be recollected we were liable to be hung as traitors, and that now it would be murder in Great Britain to hang us.

Sure I am, if Great Britain is rash enough to hang these unfortunate captives, it will be owing to the conduct of the minority upon this occasion.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Gaston) tells us that the war is offensive. Then, I suppose, the impressment of 6,267 seamen, and capturing 917 ships in time of peace, and refusing to give them up, was not offensive. He tells us Bonaparte insisted on our going to war if our rights were not respected. I would ask that gentleman what was the rider on that honorable arrangement Mr. Jefferson has been calumniated for rejecting? It was this—it was an instrument under the hands of the two British Ministers who signed the treaty, "that they were commanded by His Majesty to say that we must not submit to the Berlin decree of November, 1806; and that they cannot enter into the stipulations of the present treaty without an explanation from the United States of their intentions relative to that decree, or a reservation to His Majesty not to consider himself bound by the treaty in that event." It is well known France meant only our enforcement of the non-intercourse act, as the explanation of it and practice under it has proved. The gentleman finds great fault with the principle that free ships shall make free goods. Has our Government insisted on it? No. But if he will examine the history of the wars of 1787 and 1756, he will find Great Britain then insisting on it; then she was not omnipotent on the ocean, and wished the protection of law—but now, when we are told she holds the trident of Neptune, she prefers the ultima ratio regum; and we have ample testimony she means to use it to produce the penultima ratio regum—their interest. But he tells us we had like to have crowned our violations of all that was dear to the people, by adopting the French conscriptions. Would it not have been more in order to postpone his denunciations for our faults till we had committed them, than through the anticipation of a disordered imagination to charge us with them beforehand? I would ask that gentleman whether French conscriptions, which I understand to be a draught by lot of a certain number from all the young men as they arrive at the age of eighteen, to serve for five years only, can be so outrageous as the impressment of all seamen, without a lot, to serve for life? He politely charges us with practising a ductility of mind that begins its work by deceiving itself. If that was the fact, I ask him if it is half so exceptionable as that ductility of mind that begins and prosecutes its work by deceiving the people? He concludes by charging us with legislating under Executive caprice. I wish I could charge them with not capriciously opposing every measure of Government, however intimately connected with its prosperity and happiness.

Mr. CALHOUN rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman, it is now more than two weeks since the commencement of this debate; most of which time has been consumed by the Opposition in attempting to prove the bad faith, poverty, folly, and injustice of our Government and country; for all of their arguments and declamation, however variant and contradictory, are reducible to two objections against the passage of this bill. First, that such is the want of capital, or of public credit, that the loan cannot be had, or it must be at an extravagant interest; and secondly, if it could, the bill ought to be rejected, because in their opinion the war is unjust and inexpedient. The last of these objections, I propose to discuss. To examine both at large would occupy too much time. Without, therefore, discussing the question whether the loan can or cannot be had, I will merely offer a few reflections incidentally connected with it. It is a little remarkable that not one of the minority has discussed the material points on this part of the subject; I mean the question, Is the money proposed to be raised by this bill indispensable for the service of the year? and, if so, is a loan the only, or best mode of obtaining it? The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has presented an estimate of the expenses already ordered, or which must be, by which it appears that the sum proposed to be raised by this bill, with the other sources of the revenue, will be absolutely necessary to meet them. The silence of the Opposition sanctions the correctness of the estimate; and as no other mode has been indicated of obtaining the necessary supplies, this may be presumed to be the only one. It ceases then to be a question, whether the loan can be had at this or that interest. It is necessary; it must be had; and the rate per centum will depend principally on the state of the money market—and not on the arguments here. Again; on comparing the two objections to the passage of this bill, one of them destroys all confidence in the other. Our opponents contend not only that the loan cannot be had, but that it ought not to be granted. To defeat the passage of this bill, or to prevent its successful operation out of this House, are the declared objects of their policy. It is true that all have not made the latter declaration; but none, as far as my memory serves, have disavowed it. When, then, they argue that the loan must fail, they may be considered either as dupes to their wishes, or, what is more probable, as aiming to destroy the confidence of moneyed men in the public faith; for it cannot be presumed that they have any hope to defeat the passage of the bill.

But to proceed to the objection which I proposed to discuss. The war, say our opponents, is unjust and inexpedient, and therefore this bill ought to be rejected. The facts of the supposed injustice and inexpediency of the war, on which this objection rests, have claimed the exclusive attention of the Opposition. The inference deduced from them, that they justify the rejection of this bill, though far from being an intuitive proposition, has received no part of their arguments or elucidation. For my part, I consider it not only false but dangerous; and shall therefore not only consider the alleged injustice and inexpediency of the war, but the inference assumed from those charges. I trust, with the attention of the committee, to prove that both are equally unfounded. I must beg an attentive and deliberate hearing; for a correct mode of thinking on this subject, I do sincerely believe to be necessary to the lasting prosperity of our country. I say an attentive and deliberate hearing, for it is not sufficient that the mind be fixed on the discussion; but it should also be free from those passions and prejudices unfavorable to the reception of truth. The fact that discussion here assumes the form of debate, produces a state of things unfavorable to dispassionate attention. In debate here, as between two individuals, the opposite sides are much more disposed to find objections to an argument, be it ever so clear, than to receive it with a proper degree of assent. In their zeal the interest of the country is too often forgot. Mutual recrimination, and not to discover and persuade to do what is right, is but too commonly the object. I hope what I have to say will not be viewed as a mere exercise of skill in a discussion, in which those who hear me have little or no interest; but as containing principles believed to be essential to the public interest. I trust I hold in proper contempt the spirit of idle debate. Its heat and zeal are momentary. Not so with our principles and measures. On them must depend our future prosperity and happiness.

Is the war unjust and inexpedient? This is the question which I now propose to discuss. The eagerness and zeal with which our opponents endeavor to prove this point, seem to me not at all consistent with sound principles or due love of our country. In their zeal they often presume that we are wrong and our enemy right; and that on us is the burden to prove that their charges are false, before they have attempted to prove them to be true. How contrary this to the maxims of Roman wisdom! That wise and virtuous people, so far from presuming their country to be wrong, considered it as a crime in a citizen to doubt of the justice of the public cause. In a state of war how worthy of our imitation! It was at the root of Roman greatness. Without it a free State will ever lose much of its peculiar and native strength; the spontaneous and concurring zeal of its citizens. The charge of injustice and inexpediency against the war necessarily leads me to investigate its cause. It originated, as agreed on all sides, in certain commercial aggressions on the part of England, and her practice of impressing American seamen from American vessels on the high seas. Though I have named commercial injuries first, it is my intention to give impressment the preference in the order of discussion; not only because the war is continued for it, but because it is of greater intrinsic importance. The life and liberty of a citizen are more important to him and his country than his property; and consequently, the obligation to protect the former more sacred than the latter. To the truth of this position, our political institution bears testimony. A single judicial process determines on a question of property; but it requires a double investigation, first before a grand jury and then a petit, before the humblest and most suspected citizen can be deprived of life or liberty. This is a mode of thinking worthy of a free people, and in fact is essential to the permanent existence of their freedom. Yes, life and liberty, those precious gifts of Heaven, are by our laws and constitutions guaranteed to all. They may be abused and forfeited to the country; but cannot be torn away by the hand of arbitrary power. Let us bear these sentiments in our minds and bring them in our bosoms to the discussion of this subject.

It is fortunate that the facts connected with impressment are few and undoubted. I set aside for the present the pretext and principle on which Great Britain acts in relation to it. None can deny that a great number of American sailors have been impressed from on board American vessels on the high seas, and by force compelled to serve a sovereign to whom they owe no allegiance, and to fight battles in which they have no interest. It is equally certain, that the practice is of long continuance; and that negotiation has often and in vain been resorted to for redress. I say a great number rather than specify any particular, because I do not conceive the exact number to be material; and also, because I do not wish to incorporate any thing the least doubtful in the statement. On this point, however, the two Governments are pretty well agreed. Ours estimates the entire number taken at something more than six thousand; and the British Government acknowledged that, at the breaking out of the war, they had sixteen hundred at least on board their public vessels. After deducting from our list the dead by battle and disease, the deserters and the liberated, it will be found that theirs exceeds our estimate. To the shame of the minority, they alone have attempted to throw any doubt on this point—and to diminish the injury of the enemy below their own acknowledgment.

But, say some of our opponents, we are willing to defend native-born American seamen, but not the naturalized. I know not how those who make this distinction can answer a simple question, founded on fact. American seamen—yes, sixteen hundred, at least, native-born American seamen, by the acknowledgment of the British Government, are impressed and held in bondage. If, then, you are willing to defend such, why not support the war now carried on solely for the defence of these unfortunate citizens? What avail is the declaration, that you are willing to defend them, when you will not move a finger in their cause? But the distinction between native and naturalized is without truth or reason. It constitutes no part of the controversy between the two countries. We contended for the defence of American seamen generally; the enemy has not distinguished between the one or the other class. He insists on continuing a custom which makes both equally liable to his oppression. We will not, we cannot, hear of a distinction, until some security is afforded against the abuse of which we complain. Until then, I can consider it only as an equivocation, which acknowledges the duty of the Government to protect, but evades the discharge of it. We are told that our seamen ask no protection, and that it is strange that those who are most remote and least interested should discover the greatest anxiety for them. As to the first part of this argument, I deny its truth. The sailors have claimed our protection. They have importuned and invoked their country for it. We have had their application for protection laid before this House in the form of a document. It forms a large volume. Considering the cold indifference with which we have heard their prayer, I wonder that they have not, long since, ceased to consider us as their guardians. But we who stand forth to discharge this sacred duty, are charged with being back-woodmen, men who never saw a ship until convened here in our legislative capacity. Admit the fact, and what then? Such generous sympathy for those who stand connected with us only by the ties of citizenship, does honor to our country. I hope it is not strange. It is usual. Our history abounds with many instances of this sympathy of the whole, with any part. When it ceases to be natural, we will cease to be one nation. It constitutes our real union—the rest is form. The wonder is, in fact, on the other side. Since it cannot be denied, that American citizens are held in foreign bondage, how strange that those who boast of being neighbors and relations, should be dead to all sympathy, or should not have the manly spirit to make a generous effort for their relief! There was a time when our opponents, to their honor, were not so cold on this subject. The venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, and another gentleman, high in the ranks of his party, formerly felt and spoke as we now do on it—like Americans. How unhappy the change! how unaccountable! Unless, indeed, by the poisonous effects of the spirit of systematic opposition; a spirit which, I lately observed on another occasion, clings more strongly to the cause of a party than that of the country.

I will now proceed to consider the next cause of the war, the injuries done by Great Britain to our commerce. It is not my intention to speak of them in the detail, or to consider them as particular acts injurious to our trading interest. This view has been often presented, and is well understood. I propose to ascend to their origin, and to point out the spirit and principles of the Government from which they have flown. This view has not yet been taken, though it is of the most interesting nature. The detail of British injustice may rouse our indignation, but it is only by reflecting on the principles and character of her Government that we can justly appreciate the extent of our danger, and the measures best calculated to counteract it. Even the repeal of her Orders in Council, and the consequent suspension of commercial injuries, do not strip this view of the subject of any of its interest. For it ought ever to be remembered that the orders rescinding the celebrated orders of 1807 and 1809, expressly retain their principle. They, then, only slumber; and, as sure as we exist, her temper and policy will rouse them into action on the first suitable occasion, unless prevented by the firm and spirited conduct of this and other nations interested in a free trade. The commercial policy of Great Britain, which has vexed and annihilated the commerce of every other nation, began distinctly to develop itself in the year 1756, from which time to the present, I assert, without the fear of contradiction, she has habitually struggled to enlarge what she terms her maritime and belligerent rights on the ocean, at the expense of neutrals. The assertion is predicated on historical facts, which the general information of most of the members of this committee will enable them to decide for themselves. I have neither the inclination nor the time to recite and examine the whole series in connection. I will content myself with taking a brief notice of some of the most leading and characteristic facts. At their head, in point of time, is the order which takes its name from the year already mentioned, and which distinctly marks the commencement of this policy. The character of this celebrated rule or order is so well known as to need no comment. In the war of our Revolution she still farther enlarged her maritime and belligerent policy, particularly in the shape of blockades, since so enormously extended. This, and other encroachments at that time, produced that association of nations called the Armed Neutrality.

VOL. V.—18

The object of it was to check farther encroachments, and to remedy those that already existed. It was acceded to by almost every nation in Europe. On the breaking out of the French Revolution, she, in pursuit of the same policy, made farther encroachments. One of the most considerable, and which was severely felt by this country, was an enlargement of articles contraband of war, so as to extend them to the numerous and important articles of breadstuffs. This was during Washington's Administration, and was the principal one of that period of our history. Preparations were then made to appeal to arms for the redress of so serious an injury, but was prevented by England's agreeing to make compensation for the injuries which we had sustained. With such spirit did our Government then act, although the injury then sustained dwindles into nothing compared with the present; and with so little accuracy has a gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) spoken, who not only magnified the aggressions of that period over the present, but stated that Washington was unwilling to resort to arms for redress. In the present war with France, her maritime and commercial policy has hastened to its perfection. In the year 1805, it assumed an aspect most threatening to our commerce. It fell on our carrying trade, at that time in a most flourishing condition. Let it be remarked—let it be laid up in our memory—that the old rule of '56, the parent of all these aggressions, was, after many years, revived, and made the apology for our wrongs. Just so may we expect the revoked orders to revive. Blockades and Orders in Council followed the destruction of our carrying trade. They are too recent, and too severely felt, to need a particular recital. Negotiation was tried—negotiation failed; and the injuries continuing, have ended in the present relation between the two countries.

But, say our opponents, these efforts are lost—and our condition hopeless. If so, it only remains for us to assume the habit of our condition. We must submit—humbly submit—crave pardon, and hug our chains. It is not wise to provoke where we cannot resist. But let us be well assured of the hopeless nature of our condition before we sink into submission. On what do our opponents rest this despondent and slavish belief? On the recent events in Europe? I admit they are great; and well calculated to impose on the imagination. Our enemy never presented a more imposing exterior. His fortune is at the flood. But I am admonished, by universal experience, that such prosperity is the most fickle of human conditions. From the flood the tide dates its ebb; from the meridian the sun commences his decline. There is more of sound philosophy than fiction in the fickleness which poets attribute to fortune. Prosperity has its weakness; adversity its strength. In many respects our enemy has lost by those very changes which seem to be so much in his favor. He can now no more claim to be struggling for existence; no more to be fighting the battles of the world, and in defence of the liberties of mankind. The magic cry of French influence is lost. Hence were drawn those motives which stimulated her efforts almost to a morbid action; which united the Continent to her cause, and in some degree damped the ardor of her rival in power. In this very Hall we are not strangers to their magic influence. Here, even here, the cry of French influence, that baseless fiction, that phantom of faction, now banished, often resounded. I rejoice that the spell is broken by which it was attempted to bind the generous spirit of this country. The minority can no longer act under cover; but will be obliged to defend their opposition on its intrinsic merit.

On expatriation and retaliation, I will say nothing. The hour is late and I feel myself somewhat exhausted. I pass it the more cheerfully, as the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROBERTSON) and my colleague have replied freely to the objection on those subjects.

Before I proceed farther, it will be necessary to restate the propositions with which I commenced, so that the entire chain of the argument, both that which has already been advanced, and what remains to be, may be distinctly seen. It will be remembered, that I reduced all the arguments and objections of our opponents to the passage of this bill into two general propositions. First, that the loan cannot be had, or must be had at an exorbitant interest; and in the next, if it could be, still it ought not to be granted, because the war is unjust and inexpedient. I also stated that the latter position comprehended the assertion of the facts of the injustice and inexpediency of the war; and the assumed inference that they would, if true, justify the minority in their opposition to, and rejection of the war. On the alleged injustice and inexpediency of the war, I have presented my opinion; and trust I have satisfied the committee that its justice is demonstrably clear, and its expediency unquestionable; or rather its necessity imperious, if the preservation of the independence of the country constitutes political necessity.

But is it justifiable to withhold the loan, admitting the war to be, in the opinion of our opponents, unjust and inexpedient? This is the question now proposed to be discussed. It contains the practical consequence of all that has been said in opposition. Few propositions involve principles so deeply connected with the lasting prosperity of our Republican institutions; and in which, consequently, it is more necessary to think correctly. Error here cannot be indifferent. A false mode of thinking must endanger the existence of the Republic. I must then again entreat the attentive and deliberate audience of the committee, while I offer my opinion and reasons on so interesting a subject.

In considering the question, how far a war thought to be unjust or improper by any portion of the people, would warrant their opposition to it, after it is constitutionally declared, I will set out of it extreme or flagrant injustice. A war impious or sacrilegious cannot be governed by the general rules which apply to ordinary cases. At least, it is not necessary for me to consider such extreme cases, as none can impute a character of that kind at the present.

I have already stated that the sum proposed to be raised by this bill is indispensably necessary to meet the expenses of the ensuing year; and that if it is withheld, it must communicate a fatal shock to public credit. In that event, not only the invasion of Canada would be prevented, which some gentlemen state to be their object, but the whole operations of the war, even that which is defensive in the strictest sense, would be abandoned. Officers and soldiers will no more serve in our garrison than Canada without pay. It is idle to talk of preventing the reduction of the enemy's provinces only by withholding the loan. Nor can gentlemen be serious. They have opposed every attempt to raise supplies in whatever shape it has appeared. They appear to be bold in facing bankruptcy. But have they reflected on the disastrous effects of their efforts should they be successful? The old and recent creditors of the Government, the Army, the Navy, which they boast of cherishing; in a word, every individual would feel the calamity, for private no less than public credit would partake of the shock. I am wholly at a loss to perceive on what principle of expediency, policy, or morality, such conduct can be justified. Surely it is not an intuitive proposition, that, because the war is simply unjust and inexpedient in the opinion of the minority, therefore they have a right to involve the country in ruin, and place it bound as a suppliant at the feet of a haughty enemy. They then ought to state some intelligible and satisfactory principle on which their conduct may be justified. I have sought with attention, but have not found the semblance of such a one. On the contrary, all the analogies of private life, as well as reason, forbid and condemn the conduct of our opponents. Suppose a father do some act, which, in the opinion of a son, is not strictly just or proper, by which he becomes involved in a contest with a stranger. Would the son be justified in taking part against him? How much less then can any party be in opposition to their country in a war with another nation? for it stands in the place of the common parent of all, and comprehends, to use the language of a member, (Mr. GASTON,) all of the charities of life.

I would be glad to know what limits our opponents have prescribed to the opposition. If the supplies may be withheld because the war is unjust and improper in their opinion, will not the same reason justify every species of resistance both in and out of this House? If the public faith solemnly plighted—if the happiness of the country, are no checks to opposition, I see no reason why the laws or constitution should be. Let some intelligible limitation be prescribed.

The Loan Bill.

[H. OF R.]

I see none—to me it appears lawless. I know it will be said, is all opposition to be proscribed? Is none justifiable? We proscribe nothing. We propose no law; no restraint on the conduct of the minority. We appeal to the virtue and the intelligence of the community only. On the people must finally fall the ruinous effects of erroneous and dangerous principles. If our liberty is lost, theirs is the cost. Our constitution supposes a degree of good sense and virtue in them adequate to self-government. If the fact is not so, our system of Government is founded in error. They only can arrest the effects of dangerous opposition. What they permanently condemn will meet with no support here.

How far the minority in a state of war may justly oppose the measures of Government, is a question of the greatest delicacy. On the one side, an honest man, if he believed the war to be unjust or unwise, would not disavow his opinion; but, on the contrary, an upright citizen would do no act, whatever he might think of the war, to put the country in the power of the enemy. It is the double aspect of the subject which indicates the course that reason approves. Among ourselves at home we may contend; but whatever is requisite to give the reputation and the arms of the Republic a superiority over its enemy, it is the duty of all, the minority no less than the majority, to support. Like the system of our State and General Governments—within them are many; to the world but one. So it ought to be with parties; among ourselves we may divide, but in relation to other nations there ought to be only the American people. In some cases it may possibly be doubtful, even to the most conscientious, how to act. It is one of the misfortunes of differing from the rest of the community on the subject of war.

A very important view of this subject yet remains to be presented to the committee; but I feel that the hour is too late, and I am too much exhausted to enter so fully into it as it deserves. The view alluded to is the effects of this war, which has been pronounced so ruinous by our opponents. On examination, strong reasons will be found, to believe that it is daily producing the most solid and lasting advantages to the community.

It has already liberated us from that dread of British power, which was almost universal before the declaration of war. If we have done little against our enemy, he had done still less against us. What the state of public feeling was on this point, may be in some degree inferred by the debates in this House before the declaration of war. I cannot but express my surprise at an assertion of a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFEY) that all of his fears and predictions had been realized. Has he already forgot the speeches in which he and his friends portrayed the effects of the war in such glowing and terrific colors? Rebellion, civil war, prostrated liberty, and conflagrated towns, all mingled in one horrid group. [Mr. SHEFFEY here explained.] It seems that the gentleman has availed himself of the usual privilege of political prophets. If events turn out any thing like their prediction they are claimed as fulfillments; but if entirely opposite they are explained away. No one who hears me, but will acknowledge that the dread of England was great and general. Her power over our hopes and our fears were too great for our complete independence, and but illy comported with the steady pursuit of our own peculiar interest. From this state the war has liberated us, I hope forever.

We have also acquired in some degree, and are progressively acquiring, what to me appears indispensable in the present state of man and the world; military skill and means, combined with the tone of thinking and feeling necessary to their use. Occasional privations are always to be encountered in the defence of national rights, and the habits necessary to meet them with fortitude are of the greatest importance. I know how much this country is attached to peace and quiet industry. I know how delightful repose and safety are to our nature. But universal experience and the history of those nations with whom we are necessarily connected, forbid me to indulge in the pleasing dream, that any degree of prudence or justice on our part can render such a state perpetual. The ambition of a single nation can destroy the peace of the world. We must then submit to the inscrutable law of our nature, which forbids the hope in this world of uninterrupted peace and enjoyment. We must also, as prudent men, rejoice at the acquisition of those national qualities necessary to meet the vicissitude of war when unavoidable. Connected with this subject, I rejoice to behold the amazing growth of our manufacturing interest. I regret that I cannot present my thoughts fully on this important subject. It will more than indemnify the country for all of its losses. I believe no country, however valuable its staples, can acquire a state of great and permanent wealth without the aid of manufactures. Reason and experience both, I conceive, support the position. Our internal strength and the means of defence are by them greatly increased. War, when forced on us hereafter, will find us with ample means; and will not be productive of that distressing vicissitude which follows it, where the industry of the country is founded on commerce, the agriculture dependent on foreign market. Even our commerce in the end will partake of the benefits. Rich means of exchange with all of the world will be furnished to it; and the country will be in a much better condition to extend to it efficient protection. I have merely suggested the topics of arguments on this important branch of our political economy: and will conclude by hoping that on some future occasion it will receive a suitable discussion.

When Mr. CALHOUN concluded, the committee rose, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 28.

The Loan Bill.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the Loan bill.

Mr. PICKERING, of Massachusetts, said :

I fear, Mr. Chairman, that in discussing the subject before the committee, I shall disappoint the expectations of my friends, without satisfying myself. For, though I have been long in public life, I have been but little used to public speaking. The memory, the arrangement, and the comprehensive view of a subject, which are necessary to a public speaker, in me are deficient. I shall endeavor, however, to lay before the committee facts which I deem important, with such just inferences as shall occur to me; relying on the discernment of gentleman to supply the rest.

A gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) has told you that the object of the minority was, to destroy the faith of the Government by preventing the loan. I am indeed opposed to the loan; but I distinguish between the faith of the Administration, and the faith of my country. The credit of the country is good, and under a proper Administration, acting in a cause in which the great interests and welfare of the country were at stake, the loan would be effected. My aim is, to put an end to this unjust and ruinous war; and therefore I will oppose all supplies for carrying it on. It is the duty of Congress to withhold supplies, pursuant to a power vested in them by the constitution, when necessary to prevent any Administration from persevering in measures injuriously affecting the public welfare.

The same gentleman told us, that it was a maxim among the Romans, "that their country was never to be presumed to be in the wrong." Had not the Roman people been influenced by this maxim; on the contrary, had they questioned the rectitude of the measures of their Government, and reasoned on the causes and pretences for their perpetual wars, the ancient world might not have been deluged with blood; while nations sunk beneath the arms directed by the ambitious leaders of that Republic, as the continental nations of modern Europe have fallen before the arms of France; which, both in her Republican and Imperial state, appears to have taken Rome for her model. Any government may err, either ignorantly or corruptly, and in either case, its measures tending to public mischief ought to be opposed.

The same gentleman, adverting to the alleged causes of the war, the British Orders in Council and Impressments, said he would first consider impressments, "because a man is preferable to a bale of goods." Yet property is the ground of almost all the quarrels among mankind, as well between nations as individuals. It was property, affected by the Orders in Council, which was professed to be the principal cause of this war. Property was, in fact, the primary cause of the contest with our mother country, which terminated in the war of our Revolution. Great Britain imposed small duties on a few articles of our imports from her, and claimed a right to impose others by an act of Parliament; and thus to take from us our property without our consent. I will therefore first inquire into the character of the British Orders in Council.

By our treaty with France, in 1800, concluded with Bonaparte himself, then First Consul, in the 12th article it was agreed as follows :

"It shall be lawful for the citizens of either country to sail with their ships and merchandise (contraband goods always excepted) from any port whatever, to any port of the enemy of the other, and to sail and trade with their ships and merchandise, with perfect security and liberty, from the countries, ports, and places of those who are enemies of both or of either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatever; and to pass not only directly from the places and ports of the enemy aforementioned, to neutral ports and places, but also from one place belonging to an enemy, to another place belonging to an enemy, whether they be, or be not under the same jurisdiction, unless such ports or places shall be actually blockaded, besieged, or invested."

In flagrant violation of this article, Bonaparte, having overturned the Prussian monarchy, and seated himself in its capital, Berlin, there, on the 21st of November, 1806, issued a decree (thence called the Berlin decree) in the preamble of which he sets forth his pretended causes, the falseness or futility of which I shall show as I proceed.

"1. That England does not admit the right of nations, as universally acknowledged by all civilized people."

This general, sweeping and false declaration, appears to be the text to be exemplified in the articles which follow.

"2. That she declares as an enemy every individual belonging to an enemy State, and, in consequence, makes prisoners of war, not only of the crews of armed vessels, but also of merchant vessels, and even the supercargoes of the same."

This charge against England might, with equal justness, be made against the United States, and all other nations; for all, including France herself, have always considered the crews of merchant vessels as well as of armed vessels, to be prisoners of war, and confined them accordingly.

"3. That she extends or applies to merchant vessels, to articles of commerce, and to the property of individuals, the right of conquest, which can only be applied or extended to what belongs to an enemy State."

In this England does no more than the United States did in the war of our Revolution, and do in the present war, and what all maritime nations have ever done; that is, capture enemy's merchant vessels and merchandise found on the high seas; and to capture them, is the object and hope of all our privateering.

"4. That she extends to ports not fortified, to harbors and mouths of rivers, the right of blockade, which, according to reason and the usage of civilized nations, is applicable only to strong or fortified ports."

This article, like the others, stating first a justifiable fact, is false in its conclusion. The right to blockade ports, harbors, and mouths of rivers, though not fortified, is not disputed by our own Government; whose only complaint has been, that such places have not, in all cases, proclaimed to be under blockade, being blockaded in fact, by a sufficient naval force stationed before or near them, so as to render the entrance of our neutral vessels dangerous.

"5. That she declares blockaded, places before which she has not a single vessel of war; although a place ought not to be considered blockaded, but when it is so invested, as that no approach to it can be made without imminent hazard; that she declares even places blockaded which her united forces would be incapable of doing, such as entire coasts, and a whole empire."

By a document communicated by President Jefferson to Congress, in December, 1808, as one of the acts of the British Government imposing an illegal blockade in the West Indies, it appears plainly that the British Admiral exceeded his authority; the orders from his Government being, "that the strictest naval blockade be established over the Leeward French Islands," evidently meaning, by stationing a sufficient naval force before the ports so declared to be blockaded; for the British Government never claimed any other right of blockade.

As to the Emperor's charge, that Great Britain had declared "entire coasts and a whole empire" to be blockaded, it is one of those unfounded assertions which he can utter with great facility, particularly when Great Britain is the subject of reproach. The declaration of the most extensive blockade of a coast by the British Government, that I have any knowledge of, was that from the Elbe to Brest.

On such false and fallacious grounds the French Emperor issued his Berlin decree; of which the following are the articles most pointedly violating our neutral rights, and his treaty with the United States, as well as the rights of Great Britain under the law of nations.

"Art. 1. The British islands are declared to be in a state of blockade."

This, in its terms, subjected to capture, by the French cruisers, all neutral vessels entering or attempting to enter any British ports; and nothing but the absolute inability of the Emperor to execute this part of his decree, prevented its being carried into effect.

"Art 4. All magazines, merchandise, or property whatsoever, belonging to a subject of England, shall be declared lawful prize."

The object of this article was, to authorize his Ministers and officers to seize on all property of British subjects, wherever found, especially in neutral territories, where, by the law of nations, it should have been secure, and sacred as neutral property itself; but no rights have been regarded, where the power of the French Emperor could extend.

"Art. 5. The trade in English merchandise is forbidden. All merchandise belonging to England, or coming from its manufactures and colonies, is declared lawful prize."

By this article, the manufactures of England, and the productions of her colonies, although the property of citizens of the United States, or of other neutrals, became liable to capture and condemnation. If its immediate execution against American vessels, in the European seas, did not take place, it was owing to causes not explained; and not to the Emperor's intention to dispense with it; as he subsequently declared that he had made no exception in favor of the United States. It was in fact executed against our vessels by some French privateers in the West Indies, as was stated by Mr. Madison himself.

But the great object of the Berlin decree was, to blockade the ports of the Continent of Europe against the entrance of British vessels, and of the vessels of every nation laden with the manufactures or productions of Great Britain or of her colonies and dominions; in order to ruin her commerce, and thereby destroy her power, which so eminently depended on the wealth and revenues arising from commerce. And on the Continent, the decree was carried into immediate execution; at Hamburg within four days from its date; although that city formed an independent neutral State, entitled to entire exemption from military coercion and violence. The French Minister there caused all English merchandises, "no matter to whom they belong," to be seized and confiscated. The same course was directed to be pursued in all other places, enemy or neutral, occupied, or which should be occupied by French troops.

On the last day of the next month, December, 1806, the treaty negotiated with the British Government, by Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney, was signed. But, before the signing, the British Commissioners mentioned to our Ministers this outrageous decree of Berlin, which threatened to subvert the rights and independence of neutral powers; and for the information of their Government, delivered to them a note declaring, that "if the enemy (France) should carry those threats into execution, and if neutral nations, contrary to all expectation, should acquiesce in such usurpations, his Majesty might probably be compelled, however reluctantly, to retaliate in his just defence, and to adopt, in regard to the commerce of neutral nations with his enemies, the same measures which those nations shall have permitted to be enforced against their commerce with his subjects."

In the mean time, to check and counteract the violence of France, in actual execution, on the Continent, against British commerce, and against all trade in the manufactures and productions of the British dominions, the British Government issued their Order in Council of the 7th of January, 1807, prohibiting not all commerce with France, as she, by the Berlin decree, had forbidden all commerce with England—but ordering “that no vessel shall be permitted to trade from one port to another, both which ports shall belong to, or be in possession of France or her allies, or shall be so far under their control, as that British vessels may not freely trade thereat.” This Mr. Jefferson called “a new law of the ocean;” although similar to, but less rigorous than an old and established law of France, which prohibited neutral vessels laden, in whole or in part, at one port of an enemy, to go to the ports of any other country than their own, whether allied to France, neutral or enemy. The great object of the British order was, apparently, to prevent neutral vessels carrying on the coasting trade of France, and the intercourse by sea between her and her allies; for the naval power of Great Britain having either captured, or driven from the ocean, the trading vessels of her enemies, they were constrained to resort to neutral vessels to carry on their commerce with one another, and in a greater or less degree, their coasting trade.

This very candid and friendly notice of the course Great Britain might be obliged to pursue, if neutral nations submitted to the Berlin decree, was represented by President Jefferson as cause of offence to the United States, and that no treaty, accompanied with the terms of that note, would be admissible. I know it will be said, that our Government did not submit, but demanded an explanation of the Berlin decree. It is true, that an explanation was asked of the French Minister of Marine, Decres, and that he, contrary to the spirit and letter of the decree, said it was not intended to infringe upon the treaty then subsisting between the United States and France; but added, that he was not competent to decide, and that application must be made to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Talleyrand, then with the Emperor at Berlin. Whether such an application was ever made, or answered if made, has not been publicly known.

The obviously proper course to have been taken by our Government was, to have demanded, not an explanation of a decree, which was too plain to require one, but its revocation; and upon the refusal to revoke, to interdict all commercial intercourse with France and her allies, and to have armed our ships, if necessary, for the protection of our commerce; which, owing to the small number of French cruisers, would then have sustained but little injury. Instead of taking this safe and honorable course, our Government contented themselves with the absurd explanation of the Minister, Decres, until the Emperor himself declared it erroneous and unfounded, and that no exception was intended in favor of the United States.

Such was the state of things when Great Britain, having waited almost a year, seeing the Berlin decree operating most injuriously to her commerce with the European Continent, all its ports (those of Sweden excepted) being shut against her; Russia, pressed by the French arms in 1807, having also adopted the French Emperor's continental system, pursuant to the treaty of Tilsit; in this state of things, the British Government issued their Orders in Council, of November 11th, 1807. These orders have been pronounced to be contrary to the law of nations, and unjustifiable; and this opinion, proceeding from men in power, and other citizens of distinction, became, probably, the current opinion of the United States. But, for my own part, from the moment that I read those orders, I considered them as justifiable on the ground of retaliation, and on the principles of public law. Of the correctness of my own opinion, however, I should have entertained some doubts, had it not been confirmed by the opinions of gentlemen, among my friends, who were as conversant with public law, and thought as profoundly, as any citizens of the United States. Among these was one of the first of men*—perhaps the brightest luminary that ever shone on this Western hemisphere.

The French Emperor, by his Berlin decree, and his orders for carrying it into complete and rigorous execution, had subverted the public law of Europe; and by his arms and influence, had brought all the nations (Sweden excepted) to bear against England alone; all thus conspiring for her destruction. What should she do against a world in arms? What would the sense of such impending danger, and the duty of self-preservation, suggest to any nation? Certainly to retort upon those combined enemies and conspirators, the evils of their own injustice and violence; and, as they had taken new and extraordinary measures to deprive her of commerce, that she should retaliate and interdict all commerce with them. This she did by her Orders in Council, and in my view, on the principles of reason and public law. In every new case, to which existing laws do not extend, reason is to be consulted—“reason, whose authority (says Bynkershoek) is of so much weight in the law of nations”—“reason, which is the soul of the law of nations.” The municipal laws of a single State, when circumstances are changed, undergo corresponding changes; and when new cases arise, new laws are framed to provide for them. And such a new state of things had been introduced into the civilized world, by the ambition, injustice, and tyranny of the French Emperor; justifying and requiring, on the part of the nations not yet subjugated, new and extraordinary measures to provide for their safety and independence. On these grounds, the British Orders in Council have appeared to me perfectly justifiable; and, consequently, that they never furnished any cause or pretence for the present war; a war on our part, as unnatural and cruel as it was unjust. But, instead of resenting and resisting, as we ought to have done, the Berlin decree, our Government commenced a system of restrictive measures; in form levelled equally against France and Great Britain, but really intended to injure Britain only, while they aided the cause of France. This brings me to the consideration of a subject, old and stale, indeed, but of essential importance to be well understood; and which therefore I will re-examine—I mean the embargo of December, 1807, the fruitful and immediate source of all the evils which have since afflicted our country; producing non-intercourse and non-importation, and terminating, as to the United States, in the greatest of all evils—war.

It will be recollected, that, just before this embargo was laid, the United States vessel Revenge arrived from France, with despatches from our Minister, General Armstrong. They arrived at Washington on the 14th of December, 1807. By the Revenge, news was brought that the French Emperor had said there should be no neutrals. This, indeed, was not long after gravely denied; but at length it came out in General Armstrong's own despatches, that the Emperor had said, the United States shall take the positive character of allies or enemies. But the people of the United States were not then prepared for a war against Great Britain. A gradual training for some years was requisite to bring them to that point. Nor were they prepared to adopt, knowingly, Bonaparte's continental system; it could be introduced only under the disguise of an embargo; a name universally understood to mean a very temporary suspension of the sailing of vessels for some special occasional purpose.

Four days only after the arrival of the despatches from France, President Jefferson sent to Congress the following Message:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The communications now made, showing the great and increasing dangers with which our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise, are threatened on the high seas, and elsewhere, from the belligerent powers of Europe; and it being of the greatest importance to keep in safety these essential resources, I deem it my duty to recommend the subject to the consideration of Congress, who will doubtless perceive all the advantage which may be expected from an inhibition of the departure of our vessels from the ports of the United States.

Their wisdom will also see the necessity of making every preparation for whatever events may grow out of the present crisis.

I ask a return of the letters of Messrs. Armstrong and Champagny, which it would be improper to make public. TH. JEFFERSON.

DECEMBER 18, 1807.

The communications consisted of four papers. The first a proclamation by the King of Great Britain, dated the 16th of October, 1807, "for recalling and prohibiting British seamen from serving foreign Princes and States." This proclamation had been published in our newspapers. It was a newspaper copy Mr. Jefferson communicated to Congress. Far from having excited any alarm, it naturally lessened the public apprehensions on the subject of impressments; because, although it commanded British naval officers to seize and take, as usual, British natural born subjects from on board foreign merchant vessels, they were strictly enjoined "to permit no man to go on board such ships and vessels belonging to States at amity with Great Britain, for the purposes of so seizing upon, taking, and bringing away such persons aforesaid, for whose discreet and orderly demeanor the said captains could not answer; and that they should take especial care that no unnecessary violence be done or offered to the vessel, or to the remainder of the crew, from out of which such persons should be taken."

The second paper was a letter (bearing date September 18, 1807) from the French Grand Judge, Ragnier, to the Imperial Procureur (or Attorney) General of the Emperor's Council of Prizes, containing the Emperor's declaration concerning his Berlin decree. To the question, "1. Can armed vessels, under that decree, seize, in neutral vessels, either English property, or merchandise proceeding from the manufactures of the English territories? His Majesty notifies me, that since he had not thought proper to express any exception in his decree, there is no ground to make any in the execution with respect to any thing whatsoever." "2. His Majesty has not decided the question, whether French armed vessels may possess themselves of neutral vessels going to or from England, although they have no English merchandise on board." Why this decision was delayed, does not appear. Probably, it was for the purpose of watching for some favorable conjuncture, when the few French cruisers that could venture to sea might make a more extensive sweep of neutral vessels, thrown off their guard by a temporary forbearance.

Of these two papers no secret was made; and for a plain reason—that both had been published in the newspapers: the British proclamation at full length, and the essential part of the letter of the French Grand Judge.

The third paper was General Armstrong's letter to the French Minister, Champagny, simply asking whether the Emperor, by his Berlin decree, intended to violate his treaty with the United States. And the fourth paper was Champagny's answer, announcing, with the usual assurance of a French Minister, that it was easy to reconcile the measures adopted under the Berlin decree with the observance of treaties. I will read these two letters.

General Armstrong's letter to M. Champagny.

PARIS, September 24, 1807.

SIR: I have this moment learned that a new and extended construction, highly injurious to the commerce of the United States, was about to be given to the Imperial decree of the 21st of November last. It is, therefore, incumbent on me to ask your Excellency an explanation of his Majesty's views in relation to this subject, and particularly whether it be his Majesty's intention, in any degree, to infract the obligations of the treaty subsisting between the United States and the French Empire?

I pray your Excellency, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

The answer of M. Champagny to General Armstrong, dated October 7, 1807.

SIR: You did me the honor, on the 24th of September, to request me to send you some explanations as to the execution of the decree of blockade of the British Islands, as to vessels of the United States.

The provisions of all the regulations and treaties relative to a state of blockade have appeared applicable to the existing circumstance; and it results, from the explanations which have been addressed to me by the Imperial Procureur General of the Council of Prizes, that His Majesty has considered every neutral vessel going from English ports, with cargoes of English merchandise, or of English origin, as lawfully seizable by French armed vessels.

The decree of blockade has been now issued eleven months. The principal powers of Europe, far from protesting against its provisions, have adopted them. They have perceived that its execution must be complete, to render it more effectual; and it has seemed easy to reconcile these measures with the observance of treaties, especially at a time when the infractions, by England, of the rights of all maritime powers, render their interest common, and tend to unite them in the support of the same cause. Accept, &c.

CHAMPAGNY.

Here we see that Armstrong's and Champagny's letters exhibit no new source of danger to our seamen, ships, and merchandise; but, on the contrary, refer directly to the Emperor's decision in Regnier's letter, already published in substance, and not attempted by Mr. Jefferson to be concealed. Why, then, did he say that Armstrong's and Champagny's letters ought not to be made public, and, with over-abundant caution, desire the return of them to himself? The answer is easy. Had the letters been published, the bold imposture would have been detected. Although the majorities in the two Houses of Congress, reposing a blind confidence in Mr. Jefferson, did not discern the imposition, citizens abroad would at the first glance, have discovered and denounced the cheat; and the nation, shocked at the contemplated mischief, would not have acquiesced in the measure. But a mystery was thrown over the transaction, by the solemn withdrawing of those two harmless letters; which, it was natural for the people to suppose, contained the evidences of the mighty dangers against which the entire shutting up of our ports was a necessary precaution. The project succeeded; and the people, for near fifteen months, endured all the evils and losses of a suspended commerce and navigation, which had given employment and subsistence to some hundreds of thousands of citizens on the seaboard, and general prosperity to the country. But what ought to be the surprise of gentlemen, after all this mysterious secrecy about the two letters of Armstrong and Champagny, to be informed that, precisely three months after passing the Embargo law, to wit, on the 22d of March, 1808, Mr. Jefferson, of his own accord, laid these same letters openly before Congress? But how? Mingled with a mass of other documents, making now a printed volume of upwards of five hundred pages! And strangers would not suspect, nor members of Congress know, (unless they had good memories,) that the two letters had any relation to the embargo.

I have called the two letters harmless; and so they were, as to any indications of increased danger to our seamen, ships, and merchandise; but in Champagny's, may be seen the latent cause of the embargo. I have before remarked, that the essence and main operation of the Berlin decree, declaring the British islands in a state of blockade, was the shutting up of the ports of the European continent (thence called the continental system) against all British ships, and against all the manufactures and productions of the British dominions, in neutral ships, for the purpose of reducing and destroying the commerce of Great Britain, and with that her naval power. And the French Minister tells General Armstrong, that the principal powers of Europe, far from protesting against the provisions of the Berlin decree of blockade, had adopted them; and that they had perceived "that its execution must be complete, to render it more effectual." And what was wanting to render it complete? Nothing but to shut up, in like manner, all the ports of the United States, between which and the British dominions commercial intercourse was of vast extent, and alike advantageous to both countries. And this adoption and completion of the French Emperor's continental system was effected under the deceitful name of embargo.

I pray gentlemen to remember, that this embargo was recommended solely and absolutely on the great and increasing dangers to our seamen, ships, and merchandise, pretended to be manifested in the four papers communicated with Mr. Jefferson's Message. Now, I will show, from his own documents, that both he and Mr. Madison (then Secretary of State) knew, and soon after acknowledged, that no such dangers existed.

Mr. Madison, in his letter of March 25, 1808, (only three months subsequent to the Embargo law,) to the British Minister here, Mr. Erskine, referring to the Berlin decree, represents it as a mere declaration of the French Emperor, either without the intention or without the means to carry it into effect against the United States; and therefore not authorizing the retaliatory measure of the British Orders in Council.

But still earlier, on the 8th of February, 1808, only seven weeks after the embargo was imposed, Mr. Madison, writing to General Armstrong, and pronouncing the Berlin decree, as construed and enforced by the Emperor, to be as well a violation of our treaty with France, as of the incontestable principles of public law, declares—"The conduct of the French Government, in giving this extended operation to its decree, and, indeed, in issuing one with such an apparent or doubtful import against the rights of the sea, is the more extraordinary, inasmuch as the inability to enforce it on that element exhibited the measure in the light of an empty menace."

And now, sir, who can think with patience on the extensive mischiefs brought on the people of the United States by this embargo, when the Berlin decree, in which the alleged increased danger lay, was known, and so soon after was acknowledged, to be an empty menace, though solemnly declared by Mr. Jefferson "to show great and increasing dangers to our vessels, seamen, and merchandise?"

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that it may be, as it has been said, that the British Orders in Council were a principal cause of the embargo; but, sir, well-known facts and the public documents demonstrate the assertion to be unfounded. The President, as I have said, rested his recommendation of an embargo solely on the papers he communicated; and in the Senate, (of which I was then a member,) while the embargo bill was before it, not one word was said of British Orders in Council. Further, Mr. Madison in his letter, dated December 23, 1807, (the day after the Embargo law was passed,) to Mr. Pinkney, (our Minister in London,) says: "I avail myself of the opportunity to enclose you a copy of a Message from the President to Congress, and their act in pursuance of it, laying an immediate embargo on our vessels and exports. The policy and the causes of the measure are explained in the Message itself." It is true, that about two months afterwards, when the British Orders in Council had become known, Mr. Madison made some change in his language. It was then convenient to do so. In his letter of February 19, 1808, to Mr. Pinkney, he says: "My last, which was committed to the British packet, enclosed a copy of the act of Embargo, and explained the policy of the measure;" artfully omitting "causes," and adding, "among the considerations which enforced it, was the probability of such decrees as were issued by the British Government on the 11th of November; the language of the British Gazette, with other indications, having left little doubt that such were meditated." But, sir, this was an afterthought, eagerly laid hold on by the advocates of the Administration to appease the growing discontents of the people, suffering under a total interdict of their commerce, without any known cause. To put this miserable pretence at rest, I will recur, in confirmation of the evidence I have already given, to the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, made to the House of Representatives on the 22d of November, 1808, of which Mr. George W. Campbell (now Secretary of the Treasury) was the chairman. In that report the committee, endeavoring to repel the charge of acquiescence in the unlawful aggressions of either France or England, say: "The Milan decree of December, 1807, can still less rest for its defence on the supposed acquiescence of the United States in the British orders of the preceding month, since those orders, which have not certainly been acquiesced in, were not even known in America, at the date of the decree." Now, the decree of Milan was issued in Italy by the French Emperor, on the 17th of December, 1807; and it was on the morning of the next day, in this city, that Mr. Jefferson recommended to Congress the laying of the embargo. It was grounded, as I have shown, solely on the papers communicated with this Message; three of which, and the only ones which presented even the semblance of danger, had recently arrived from France. I may mention another fact corroborating the evidence that the embargo was laid in concert with the French Government, or in conformity with its views. Letters were received in America, from merchants in Holland, stating that General Armstrong had said that a general embargo would take place in the United States immediately on the arrival of the Revenge. And the fact was, (as I have before stated,) that in four days after the despatches by the Revenge had reached Washington, the embargo was recommended. Still further, we know that the French Emperor "applauded the embargo,"* and that he issued his Bayonne decree April 17, 1808, directing all American vessels which should thereafter come into any of the ports of France to be seized; because no vessel of the United States could then navigate the seas without violating the embargo law. And thus while he, so well pleased with the embargo, as it came in aid of, and rendered complete, his continental system, issued a decree to assist in carrying it into perfect execution, our Administration,† directing General Armstrong to "remonstrate against the injustice and illegality of the French decree" (that of Berlin, for the Milan decree had not then reached America) suggested, that the embargo would be continued until the Berlin decree should be repealed! This farce might amuse, but for the serious and extensive mischiefs which flowed from it.

But it has been said that, prior to the embargo, there were rumors and newspaper reports of orders contemplated by the British Government, like those issued in November, 1807. And did ever an intelligent legislator think of taking rumors and newspaper reports for the foundation of a law; especially of a law which shut up the ports and interdicted the commerce of the whole nation—a commerce the second only in the world for its extent? The pretence is as shameful as it is ridiculous.

One more remark: The embargo law was unlimited in the terms of its duration, and doubtless was intended, by its projector, to be commensurate in length of time with the French Emperor's continental system; that is, with the continuance of the European war; by the termination of which, had the people suffered the embargo to remain, we should have had neither seamen, ships, nor merchandise. And this, probably, was the wished for consummation; for, in Mr. Jefferson's Notes on Virginia, after a plausible flourish on commerce, and a navy for its protection, he says: "Perhaps, to remove as much as possible the occasions of making war, it might be better for us to abandon the ocean altogether, that being the element whereon we shall be principally exposed to jostle with other nations; to leave to others to bring what we shall want, and to carry what we can spare. This would make us invulnerable to Europe, by offering none of our property to their prize, and would turn all our citizens to the cultivation of the earth. It might be time enough to seek employment for them at sea when the land no longer offers it."

I have gone back to the embargo, because, though it was not the first attempt to interrupt a friendly and useful intercourse with Great Britain; yet it was the first great measure levelled against her, and against our own commerce and prosperity. It was the first great link in that chain of ruinous measures with which we have been bound for the last six years, and the fruitful source of all the evils with which we have been afflicted; it produced non-intercourse, non-importation, and war. For the embargo having been imposed (as I have demonstrated) in concert with, or in subserviency to France, could not be abandoned without some substitute. And this was the non-intercourse law. The people being unwilling to submit any longer to the continental system, which, having for fourteen months shut up all our ports, was driving them to beggary and ruin. The ports, therefore, were opened, and our vessels permitted to depart, and carry with them our productions and merchandise to all countries, except those of France and Great Britain, and their dependencies. The effect of this absurd measure (originating partly in the pride of the Administration, who had relied so much on the efficacy of their restrictive energies) was seriously injurious to ourselves, by compelling our merchants to send their cargoes to other countries than those where they were chiefly to be consumed.

Mr. Chairman, in the course of the debates on the Loan bill, some gentleman spoke of the Russian mediation, on which I had publicly written, stating that the Russian Minister, Mr. Daschkoff, had made an offer of it without orders from his Government; whereas it now appeared, from the documents lately communicated by the President, that Mr. Daschkoff was instructed to offer the mediation of his master, the Emperor Alexander, to effect a peace between the United States and Great Britain; and the gentleman expressed his expectation that my candor would induce me to acknowledge I had been in an error. Sir, I shall never hesitate, on proper evidence, to confess an error; but in this case I have nothing to retract. I publicly announced, that my whole statement rested on the information I had received—but received from a gentleman on whose correctness I relied. And, sir, I still think the reliance was just. I entertain no doubt that a verbal offer was made without instructions, and rejected. The gentleman's information, as I stated it, came down to the 6th of March, 1813; to which Mr. Daschkoff had received no instructions. And within a few days I have learnt, very accidentally, though from an authentic source, that it was on the same 6th of March, and I understand on the evening of that day, the despatches containing Mr. Daschkoff's instructions, came to his hands; and on the 8th of March he tendered the mediation in a letter to the Secretary of State.

Here, sir, give me leave to notice the advantage attempted to be taken by different gentlemen, of one expression in Mr. Daschkoff's letter, to justify our Government in declaring war. Mr. Daschkoff says—"His Majesty, who takes pleasure in doing justice to the wisdom of the Government of the United States of America, is convinced that it has done all that it could do to prevent this rupture." If, sir, such a sentiment be expressed in Mr. Daschkoff's instructions from his Government, it must be viewed as one of those diplomatic compliments which mean nothing; and which, if taken seriously by any diplomatist of any experience, would render him ridiculous. And unquestionably an equal compliment, whatever it might be, was paid to the British as to the American Government. But certainly the Russian Government could not have expected that either would have been published to the world. And if we suppose the sentiment was expressed to the American Government, exclusively, we must also suppose that the Emperor Alexander was willing to charge the Government of his distinguished ally, Great Britain, with a conduct directly opposite to that of the American Government; that is, as persisting in claims unreasonable and unjust—a supposition not easily to be admitted, because the imputation is grossly affrontive to Great Britain. But, after all, (as drowning men will catch at straws,) of what value is the sentiment, if really expressed in Mr. Daschkoff's instructions? What does the Emperor Alexander know of the merits of the controversy, which, for so many years, has been kept up between our own and the British Government? Who can be weak enough to imagine, that, amidst the cares of his vast empire, he has spent any time in examining the many volumes of letters and other documents which have been written and published on this subject? The number even of American citizens who have read them, with the critical attention requisite to the forming of a correct opinion, is very small; nor is it credible that the Russian Minister of State, Count Romanzow, was sufficiently acquainted with the controversy to have pronounced such a definitive opinion. And, therefore, if he did entertain that opinion, it must have been formed on the information given him on one side of the question by Mr. Adams; a circumstance, if true, that will show how ill-qualified was the Russian Minister of State to act, in the name of the Emperor, the part of a mediator. The case was simply this: The Emperor knew that war had taken place between the United States and Great Britain, and was solicitous to effect a reconciliation, because he wished for the uninterrupted and undiminished aid of his great ally, in the common cause of Europe, against the dangerous power of France; and at the same time that his subjects, who had been long suffering under the French Emperor's continental system, might enjoy all the benefits of a free communication with the United States.

The Loan Bill.

By the papers communicated about the Russian mediation, it appears that the British Minister at St. Petersburg offered to give a passport to an American vessel, to proceed to the United States with the despatches of Mr. Adams, and those of the Russian Government containing the offer of its mediation, provided the vessel should touch in England; a condition with which, Mr. Adams says, "he did not think it suitable to comply." Why it was not suitable is not intimated. Had the vessel been despatched, and touched in England, she might have brought with her the decision of the British Government, not to accept the mediation, and thus have prevented the useless mission to Russia, and the delay, for near a year, of measures for a direct negotiation to put an end to the war, if that was really desired. There are many other topics, Mr. Chairman, which have been introduced into this debate, and which I intended to notice; but, weary of the subject, I shall pass them by, and conclude with a few observations on the Army and Navy of the United States, as employed in the present war.

In the debate on the bill for filling the ranks of the Army, in order to continue the war, one reason assigned was, "to redeem the military character of the country." Sir, I do not think it needs redemption; I mean, that I do not think our country disgraced. The like materials for an army exist as in the time of our Revolutionary war. But, soldiers are not formed in a day. New officers and new men require much and long instruction. Soldiers taken from the tranquil walks of civil life must pass through a course of strict discipline, and be gradually inured to dangers, to acquire the steadiness necessary to meet, on equal terms, the regular troops of an enemy. The uniform exercise of the musket is the easiest part that soldiers have to learn. To march, to wheel, to change their positions as the scenes of action change, and yet preserve their order, are the difficult parts of duty. If without such essential preparation our troops have been led into action, disasters were to have been expected.

Entirely different is our Naval war. There, both officers and men have already learnt to march on the mountain wave, and their minds are familiar with danger—with the perils of storms and tempests—that would appal the hearts of landmen. They are also, as seamen, perfectly skilled in all the movements and manœuvres rendered necessary by changes of the wind or the conduct of the enemy; and nearly all they want besides, at the breaking out of war, is to learn the exercise of cannon—a work of ten or fifteen days. Hence it was, that very early after the commencement of the war of our Revolution, our armed vessels met those of the enemy on equal terms, reckoning man for man and gun for gun. And, for myself, I wanted no new proofs of our ability to meet an equal enemy on the seas. That, in the encounters which have happened in the present war, a superiority has appeared on the side of the American armed vessels, is not surprising, when it is considered, that by the war, nearly all our seamen were thrown out of employment—the declaration of war having put an end to our fisheries, and almost annihilated our mercantile navigation—whence it happened that our naval officers had it in their power to man their vessels with a superior class of sailors. The enemy, on the other hand, manning thousands of merchant vessels, and many hundred vessels of war, had their choice of seamen lessened. For a long time, too, they had been almost without an enemy on the ocean; and their only enemy there, they had been accustomed almost uniformly to beat, and consequently to despise. Hence, they had grown over-confident and careless—circumstances which, even when the forces should be equal, could hardly fail to produce defeat and disgrace.

THURSDAY, March 3.

The Loan.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, viz: the bill authorizing a Loan.

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, said his anxiety for the question, and for an early adjournment of Congress, would have induced him to remain in his seat, but that it was now near four o'clock, and he did not expect that any vote would be taken to-day, except the one on the passage of the bill, and he would not delay that but for a short time; he would, therefore, express his opinion in as few words as he could on some of the topics which had been brought into the debate.

It has, Mr. Speaker, been more than once hinted or insinuated that the Southern States are unfriendly to New England. These hints and insinuations are founded in error. No fact had been stated, nor in his opinion could one be stated, which would justify the remarks he had frequently heard made on this subject. Such remarks produce no effect in the Southern States, because the people there know there is no foundation for them, and it is possible they were not intended for that part of the nation; indeed, it seems impossible, unfounded as they are, that they should produce any in any part of the country. The fact, if true, could be easily ascertained by almost any person living in New England, because every year people emigrate from there to the Southern States, and the emigrants could surely furnish the proof if it existed. The truth is, the emigrants are there received as brethren of one great family. Besides, it must be known to many gentlemen in the House, that each of the three Southern States have been represented in Congress by a native of New England. Look around this hall, and you will see several Representatives from the Southern States who have been educated there; and the practice is continued of sending young men of the South to the North to be educated, though at this time they have excellent colleges and academies in their own States; and can it be believed that men under such circumstances would send their sons to be educated in a country to which they were so unfriendly as to be almost hostile? Again, it must be known that a great number of gentlemen from the South regularly spend their summers in New England; and would they go to spend their time and money among a people whom they disliked? If not impossible, it is improbable.

Mr. M. said he sincerely lamented that his colleague (Mr. GASTON) should have thought it necessary to have stated the unfortunate situation of their native State; he agreed with his colleague in lamenting that there was a slave in the nation; indeed he should be glad that there was not one of the African race in it; but what had the condition of these people to do with the cause of the war? If it be a reason for not opposing the abominable practice of impressment, will it not be a reason for not opposing any wrong that may be inflicted on the country? And he could not conceive a greater wrong than impressment. But, slave or no slave, he was determined to live and die with her. He would stick to her as well in adversity, if it ever overtook her, as he would in prosperity. No misfortune that could happen to her would induce him to leave her, and he religiously believed that no State in the Union was better governed.

Much has been said about free ships making free goods. The United States have long since given up this point, and cannot now contend for it. But it is surely known to every man the least acquainted with the proceedings of the old Congress, that during the Revolutionary war that House was anxious to have the laws of nations so settled and understood, that free ships should make free goods; and it is believed that the first Administration under the present constitution was not averse to the principle. The very first treaty made by the United States contains a clause declaring that free ships shall make free goods, contraband of war excepted.

To the best of my recollection this is the first session of Congress at which the war has been called wicked and unjust; when it was declared, it was only inexpedient; all then seemed to admit that there was just cause for it, and nothing has taken place since which could change its character. The conduct of the enemy at Hampton, and indeed at almost every place where he has had the power, has been such as no civilized man could have expected; but his abominable conduct cannot render the war either wicked or unjust on our part. The most wicked part of the war seems to be the attack on Canada, and a desire as is supposed to attach it to the United States. All the gentlemen who oppose the bill are also opposed to having Canada, though a gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) has said that we shall have it some time or other. Is it possible that, when we were British colonies, all the British statesmen, with the great Lord Chatham at their head, were mistaken as to the value and importance of Canada to the then colonies? They considered it of the first consequence, and spared neither men nor money to take it. Again, is it possible that all the sages of the Revolution, with General WASHINGTON at their head, were mistaken in their wish to obtain it and attach it to the United States? I ought to have said to admit it into the Union, because the articles of the old Confederation has a clause, expressly declaring that Canada may be admitted into the union of the States. In the first treaty with France provision was made for it, and in the Constitution of the United States there is a clause, which I have always understood was intended to admit it into the Union; the clause does not apply to territories, because they come into the Union under an ordinance of the old Congress. If these gentlemen are now right in not wishing to have Canada, then all the British statesmen and American Revolutionary patriots were wrong in wanting it; and if it is now wicked to attack it, it was quite as wicked in the Revolutionary war. It was then attacked by men whose purity of heart was never questioned by their countrymen, and by men who lived in the days which tried their souls; and let it be remembered, that the war of the Revolution was defensive, especially by those who talked so much about defensive war; and let it also be remembered by those who have told us that the Canadians were not represented in Parliament, therefore had no hand in injuring us, that they were not then represented in Parliament, and had no hand in opposing the tax on tea; they form a part of the British Empire, and as a part have been attacked. The object of this war and that of the Revolution is the same, though we are not in the same situation with those who concerted that. The object of both is to prevent oppression and to maintain our rights. Will it be believed in this nation that the gallant Montgomery fell in a wicked, unjust attack on Quebec? He lives in the hearts of his countrymen, not for a wicked and unjust attack, but for the brave and faithful discharge of his duty in a most glorious and honorable war. The mentioning his name brings to my recollection the names of Mercer and Gates; could they have heard the doctrine of perpetual allegiance, which has been advocated on this floor, it would, no doubt, have made similar impressions on their minds to those which were made on the mind of the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FINDLAY.) The first being an Irishman, the second a Scotchman, and the third an Englishman. This doctrine of perpetual allegiance was not I imagine in their day advocated on the floor of Congress. If these men, and many others equally patriotic, were not traitors according to the doctrine we have heard advanced, it must be because rights exist in a civil war, which do not exist in any other; and exactly the reverse is understood to be both the law and the practice of nations. We all wish for peace that may last long; how is such a peace to be obtained? Not by begging, but by manfully maintaining our rights. The acquisition of Canada (pardon me for so saying) and Florida would add much to the probability of a peace being lasting; for while these remain in the possession of any European Government, that Government will most assuredly manage the Indians so as to force an Indian war on us whenever it pleases. The reason is in the nature of the Governments. In Europe there is always secret service money enough to bribe and corrupt whoever will be bribed or corrupted, and with this fund they will manage the Indians. Besides this, in the European Governments there is not the same responsibility in the Executive for the expenditure of public money as in ours; and I hope that ours will never be like theirs in that or in any other respect. It cannot be forgotten that when France owned Canada she so managed the Indians as to have a majority of them on her side whenever she and Great Britain were at war. The cause of her superior management was, that her King was absolute, and could do what he pleased; of course there was no responsibility to the nation for the expenditure of public money; and perhaps not much to him or any one else; certainly much less than there was in Great Britain at that time. And since our independence Great Britain has so managed them, notwithstanding our constant endeavors to civilize them and better their condition, as now to have a majority of them on her side. The cause is the same in her Government. There is less responsibility for public money than in ours; and, besides, she has secret service money, as much as the Minister wishes, and we have none. Our frontier settlements never can be safe, or even comfortable, while any European nation has the management of the Indians; and as long as any of them have Canada or Florida, I have endeavored to show that they will manage them. Let the United States have them, and the Western frontier would not require a cent for protection, and we should save all the expense of naval armaments on the Lakes. How much this might be no man can tell; because no man can tell what force will be sufficient to give us or any other nation the command over them; and we ought to command them for this plain reason: whoever commands them will command the adjoining country.

Some of the gentlemen who oppose the bill, have said they would vote money to defend the soil; that is, they would vote money to defend themselves, but not to defend the poor and almost friendless sailor who carries the produce of the soil to foreign markets, and without whose labor the soil would not be more valuable to us than it is to the savages; and at the same session that they will not vote money to defend him, they vote him thanks and money for his bravery and good conduct in a war which they call wicked and unjust. But they would vote money to defend the soil. I should like to hear from them in what manner they would attempt to defend the Western and Southern frontiers on a plan purely defensive; they could not rely on a few forts and garrisons, because the Indians would steal into the settlements and scalp within sight of the forts. A defensive war to give effectual protection against Indian depredation and murder, would require more men and money than the most active war of invasion. If those who talk so much about defensive war would only take the trouble to inquire of the veteran patriot from Tennessee, who sits before me, (Mr. SEVIER,) who has probably been in more battles against the Indians and British than I am years old, he would, I expect, inform them, that experience had taught him that the frontier people could not be defended by forts and garrisons against savage invasion and massacre.

Much has been said about a national debt. No man dislikes one more than I do. It never was my opinion that a national debt was a national blessing. And I dislike taxes as much as I do a national debt; but I do not dislike them quite as much as I hate impressment; and before I would acknowledge the right of Great Britain to impress American citizens, I would bear as much of both as I could without complaining. I do not pretend to have more feeling on this subject than others have. Every man in the nation can form a correct opinion on the question, by supposing his own son impressed, and treated like others have been. It seems to me that to the parent there could be but little, if any, difference between impressment and death. This war has not been supported by me because a particular man is President, but because I thought we should lose, one by one, all our national rights unless we defend them, and because I thought the sailors had the same right to protection that other people had. I care but little who is President; all I ask of him is to administer the Executive part of the Government well and economically. No President will ever please all, and he that has faithfully done the best he could for the nation, and is fully satisfied thereof, and has a clear conscience towards his God and neighbor, will probably be the best off, here and hereafter.

But that which seems to astonish those most who oppose the bill, is that the backwoodsmen, who never saw a ship before they came to this city, should undertake to defend sailors' rights. By the constitution it is as much their duty to defend them as it is the duty of any other part of the nation; but, leaving their constitutional duty out of the question, nothing is more natural, than that their situation should compel them to feel for the distress of their countrymen in any part of the Union; especially, too, when their distress is produced by the same power which distresses their countrymen. It may be the effect of sympathy, something like this: If you, sir, were travelling, and to call at a house where you were not acquainted with any person who lived in it, and to find the father or mother of the family, or one of the children, dead, you would immediately feel for the distress of the living, and sympathize with them. The case of the backwoodsmen is much stronger than this; because, when they hear of impressment, they immediately think of their relations and neighbors who had been murdered and scalped by the savage foe, the ally of the power who impresses their countrymen. These backwoodsmen want no defence for the part they have acted. The zeal and ability with which they have defended their national rights, both in this House and the field, want no defence. If a single wagoner, tobacco-roller, or hog-driver, from the middle country, should be scalped on his way to market, that whole country would immediately have feelings similar to those of the Western people and the people of Georgia, and, like them, convince the world that freemen roused are invincible. During the Revolutionary war it was not whispered that the then backwoodsmen had never seen a ship or salt water, or that they did not understand the tax on tea, or the Boston port act; and they certainly understand the cause of this war as well as they did the cause of that; and then their assistance was gladly seized, and their valiant deeds of that day have not been surpassed by those of late. That war, we have been told, was for property. They might then take part without a complaint; but as this is now for poor sailors' rights, they ought not to meddle with it! Many of the men who fought during the Revolution, I imagine, never saw nor tasted tea when the war commenced. I well remember that, in the part of the nation where I live, it was used in but few families, and in some of the few only on Sundays, or on some great occasion; and in that part of the country the people were not plagued with Tories.

The management of the war has been brought before us: I feel no hesitation in stating it as my opinion, that the military operations in the neighborhood of Lake Ontario have not been well managed, but on the lake, Commodore Chauncey did as much as could have been expected from any man; and it is due to his antagonist, though an enemy, to say that he was qualified to command against Chauncey. But in a country like ours, where we keep in time of peace but a small standing army, great success against trained troops ought not to be expected at the first breaking out of the war; and whenever peace shall be established, I hope to see the army reduced to the old peace establishment. When we speak of the attempt to invade Canada, we ought to recollect the Indian war carried on under the Administration of General Washington, who certainly knew the merits of every Revolutionary officer better than any man in the nation, and who was a complete judge of military men and affairs; yet the first two commanders which he selected were both defeated; and when the third defeated the Indians, they took shelter under a British fort and garrison, which fort had been recently built within the limits of the United States, and thus saved themselves from the pursuit of the victorious troops.

My colleague said that he would not give his claim on Bonaparte, and he did not appear to value that very high, for his part of the unsettled land of Canada, if it should be taken. I do not know any rule by which the value of either could be ascertained, therefore cannot say which would be most valuable, or whether it would be a good or bad bargain to give one for the other. I will, however, say that I would not give the little claim which my descendants may have to our Western country for all the claims on Bonaparte. Although the Western land may not produce the revenue which many have expected, it is certainly of great advantage to the nation in this respect, if in no other, that it enables every man who wishes it, by moving, to become a landholder on moderate terms, and to better his condition. I appeal to all who have gone to that country for the truth of the statement. In this Congress there is an extraordinary collection of young men of talents. The Western country, like every other part of the nation, has her share of them. Who can look at them and not be proud that he is an American? Young in years, but old in experience; an honor to their parents, an ornament to their country. A friend of mine was here last winter, who had been in the habit of attending to the proceedings of Congress, expressed his surprise at seeing them, and said that he had thought from reading their speeches they were much older than he found them to be. It is, I think, in some measure, owing to our happy form of Government, that we have such men. It is calculated to stimulate and to make great characters, particularly great orators. The various meetings of the people, the State Legislatures, and this House, and I might add the courts of justice, and all places which have a tendency to promote public speaking; indeed, the fathers of the country, it seems to me, if they had nothing else in view, could not have formed a more perfect plan to encourage the rising generation to be great and to be virtuous; in this view I consider the Western country a very great benefit, because it gives more room for young men to try their talents; some that may not succeed from an accidental cause in one place, may in another. Notwithstanding this and all the other advantages of the constitution, we have heard disunion talked of in this House, the foundation of which was laid to perpetuate the Union, by the greatest man of the age. To dissolve the Union and destroy the constitution, would be to throw from us as great a blessing as kind Providence has bestowed on any people in modern times; it would be to acknowledge that we could not be governed by reason, and that party feuds had got the better of our best judgment and destroyed our greatest happiness.

Before I sit down, I will endeavor, in a few words, to compare our situation with that of Russia when invaded by France. Unable at first to resist, or to drive the invader out of her territory, she burnt towns and cities to prevent the invader from finding shelter against the weather, and to let him know her determination not to be conquered. Was her cause more just and righteous than ours? It was not. France, with all her ambition and desire for conquest, had not impressed a single Russian to fight her battles; and shall Russia burn towns and cities to keep the crown on the head of her Emperor, and free America refuse to protect her citizen-sailors from British impressment? She who would not suffer them to be made slaves by Algiers, Tunis, or Tripoli, can never permit them to be impressed, and forced into bondage worse than Egyptian, by Great Britain. We must protect them or acknowledge that they are no party to the Constitution of the United States, which was adopted to establish justice, (and is justice established by impressment?) to secure domestic happiness, (and is domestic happiness secured by impressment?) to provide for the common defence, (and is the common defence provided for by impressment?) to promote the general welfare, (and is the general welfare promoted by impressment?) and to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, (and does impressment secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity?) Let the impressed and the oppressed answer.

The main question was then taken, to wit: "Shall the bill pass?" and passed in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 55, as follows:

MONDAY, March 7.

Another member, to wit, from Kentucky, RICHARD M. JOHNSON, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Land Titles in Louisiana and Missouri.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported by the Committee of the whole House to the bill for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri; and the same amendments being again read, they were amended, on motion of Mr. HEMPSTEAD, by striking out the words "two thousand acres," and inserting, after the word "than," the words "the quantity of acres contained in one league square."

In proposing this amendment, Mr. HEMPSTEAD addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments on the motion just made. It is seldom, sir, that I intrude any remarks on any subject; never, except on what immediately relates to the affairs of the Territory I represent. The bill now under consideration, was reported in pursuance of resolutions submitted by me: and it may therefore be necessary, at this time, to take a general view of the situation of land titles in that Territory. The detail may be uninteresting to the House, but, as it is of the first importance to my constituents, I trust I shall be pardoned for detaining you. I have given the subject a careful examination, and shall now proceed to state the manner in which it presents itself to my mind. First, whether the cession of a country, by one power to another, ought so to operate as to annul or destroy the title of an individual to his lands, whether that title be absolute or imperfect. Second, whether the laws of the United States, in relation to land claims, have operated to annul or confirm the titles in Missouri Territory; and thirdly, whether the present bill will do full and complete justice to the claimants.

Mr. Speaker, on the first point, permit me to observe, that even in a conquered country, individual property is usually held sacred. The conquest would not operate to annul or destroy the title of an individual. The conqueror acquires only the same right as belonged to the former sovereign, with all its limitations and modifications. He lays his hands on the possessions of the State, on what belongs to the public, while private persons are permitted to retain theirs. They suffer but indirectly, even by war; and to them the result is, that they only change masters. This, sir, is the doctrine of eminent writers on national law, and will apply with more reason and greater force to a ceded country.

Let us now examine the treaty by which Louisiana was ceded to the United States. By the first article of that treaty it is declared that France "has an incontestable right to the domain." And, in the second article, among other public property, the "vacant lands," not the lands of individuals, are ceded. The third article guaranties to the inhabitants "the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess." Here it is seen, that the national faith is pledged to the performance of certain conditions. The words are positive, the promise unequivocal. No room is left for interpretation; and, if there were, any interpretation whatever, tending to change the nature of things, (to the prejudice of individuals,) is odious. Penalties are of this description; and it is less contrary to equity not to give to a proprietor what he has lost by his negligence, than to strip the just possessor of what lawfully belonged to him. What, therefore, the Spanish Government would have done in this respect, had no change taken place, the United States ought now to do. What they promised to do, we ought to see done. The change, otherwise, would be for the worse, and the stipulations in the treaty would be unavailing.

I ask then, Mr. Speaker, whether the Spanish Government would have sanctioned the grants made by its officers? If so, they ought now to be sanctioned. Indeed, sir, without the solemn stipulations of a treaty to enforce it, policy alone would dictate such a course. Liberality will secure the affections of those you have made a part of your family; it will root old attachments; while a more rigid plan will occasion distrust and dissatisfaction, and the change will be regretted as injurious. No national benefit can result from this rigor; a few acres of land to the United States are nothing—but taken away from an individual, may cause distress and ruin. Many of them are strangers to your language, and unacquainted with your laws; their affections ought not to be estranged, when extending justice to them will secure their confidence. Congress has been liberal to the inhabitants of a conquered country, (I refer to the grants of land made to the heads of families in Illinois in 1788,) and no good reason can be given why the same liberality should not be manifested to the inhabitants of a country peaceably acquired.

On the first point, then, I think it is not to be controverted, that the cession of a country by one power to another, ought not so to operate as to annul or destroy the title of an individual to his lands, whether that title be absolute or imperfect.

Sir, before I proceed to examine whether the laws of the United States in relation to land claims have operated to destroy or to confirm titles in the Missouri Territory, permit me to recur for a moment to the situation of Upper Louisiana while Spain possessed it. In the year 1780, with a feeble, thin, and scattered population, the country at all times exposed to the inroads and insults of the savages, was threatened with an attack from their more civilized neighbors. To strengthen this remote frontier, emigration was invited. Lands were of no value to the Crown, and liberal donations were offered. They had the greatest abundance to bestow; they sometimes bestowed abundantly. Other inducements were held out. No taxes were imposed. These inducements did increase the population, and many, who had suffered from conflicting titles in the Western States, emigrated. After being impoverished, by contesting their claims with individuals, they have now the sad prospect of a more unequal contest with their Government, for what they consider their own property.

Mr. Speaker, it may be here necessary to advert to a few facts, respecting the cession of that country. Spain ceded it to France on the first day of October, 1800. France, without taking possession of it, and leaving the Spanish Government in the full exercise of the sovereignty, cedes it on the 30th of April, 1803, to the United States. This treaty was ratified on the 21st day of October, 1803, and the United States took possession of New Orleans the 20th of December, in the same year, and of Upper Louisiana, the 10th day of March, 1804. The Spanish officers continued to discharge their official duties until the times last mentioned. Then, sir, the operation of Spanish laws on the grants before made, was arrested by the transfer of the country, and the taking possession of it by the United States. Then the people were congratulated in proclamations on being united to a free people, and in being secure in their property. Then the change was predicted as advantageous; and then what the Spanish Government had promised, the United States were to perform. Such, no doubt, was the intention, such the earnest wish of the Government. Sir, let us see what measures were taken to effect this desirable object. It was important for the welfare and prosperity of the people, for the honor and engagements of the nation, to begin on just and equitable principles; because, if the first act was erroneous, the difficulties would be increased. With nations, as with individuals, the first step being wrong, it is afterwards hard to get right. The first law declares, "that all grants for lands, or any act or proceeding towards the same, after the 1st day of October, 1800, to be, and to have been from the beginning, null and void, and of no effect in law or equity." This law, in my humble opinion, was a violation of every principle, either of law or equity. It declared that which had been legally commenced under another Government, to be null and void. It made void the lawful proceedings of a power in the just exercise of the sovereignty. Instances have often occurred, where what had been lawfully begun, but not completed, has been sanctioned and acknowledged, especially when it depended on the performance of conditions which subsequent events had made it impossible to perform; but never could a lawful act be made unlawful. A right once vested could not, without any fault of the claimant, be either at law or in equity divested. Such a principle changed the nature of things, and was therefore odious.

The second law pursued the same error; it imposed new restrictions, and it required new conditions. Sir, the most meritorious claimants were the most rigidly dealt with. One of the conditions requisite to obtain a grant, was cultivation of lands in the cold winter month of December. The laws might, with as much reason, have required that no confirmation should be made to a Frenchman, unless, on the 1st day of October, 1800, he could have spoken the English language, as to have affixed American conditions to Spanish grants.

In the same law, another new, and, in my humble opinion, illegal principle was introduced, that the date of a grant should not be conclusive. Mr. Speaker, the acts of foreign Governments prove themselves. Even the decisions of foreign courts are conclusive in all parts of the world. It is always presumed the public officers act with integrity, and do their duty, unless the contrary appears. The date of an official act of the President might as well be questioned. Besides, in what manner is it to be established? The Spanish officers have left the country; and if you do not give faith to their official acts, will you believe their unofficial declarations? Will you call a witness to prove the signature of the officer? Sir, it cannot be pretended.

Your laws were rigid; they required impossibilities. But rigid laws were enforced by still more rigid instructions. On the 26th of March, 1806, the persons appointed to investigate these claims are instructed that "a strict adherence on their part to the letter of the law, leaving to Congress such further and more liberal provisions as they may think proper, is the best means of preventing the dissatisfaction which disappointed expectations would otherwise necessarily produce." Again, on the 7th day of May, 1806, the instruction is repeated, "that they must adhere to the letter of the law, and not confirm any claim not strictly embraced by its provisions." Mr. Speaker, it was an almost impossible task to retrace former misshapen steps, so as to remedy the inconveniences which had resulted; and a fifth act, with more liberal provisions in favor of the claimants, was passed. The commissioners were authorized to confirm "not exceeding one league square." With general laws, applied to particular cases, with rigid instructions to govern them, justice could not be done. The same law, and the same facts, ought to have produced the same decision in every part of Louisiana; justice to one could not be injustice to another in the same situation. Yet your laws have been so amended and altered by ten or eleven several statutes, that the difficulties, instead of being diminished, are increased, the confidence of the people is weakened, and the "further and more liberal provisions" before hinted at are most imperiously called for.

The fact cannot be denied, that the people of the Territory from which I come are in a worse situation in this respect than others. The gentleman on my right (Mr. ROBERTSON) has been a land commissioner in Louisiana, and I can safely appeal to him for the correctness of this statement. The simple fact, that there are a greater number of land claims in the late Territory of Orleans than in Missouri—and there only six hundred and eight claims have been rejected in the first, and two thousand one hundred in the last—will, I presume, satisfy the House that full and impartial justice has not been done. A distinct and separate examination of these claims, by Congress, would occupy a whole session, and that would ultimately be done which is now proposed. If other proof is wanting to establish the point, that the laws of the United States have not operated to confirm the titles, it is found in the resolutions of the General Assembly of that Territory, now before me.

It now only remains for me, Mr. Speaker, to consider very briefly whether the present bill will do full and complete justice to the claimants. During the ten years of scrutiny and investigation, few have made improvements. Many families, despairing of obtaining their equitable claims, and tired of the uncertainty attending their titles, have abandoned a country which cannot prosper without the fostering aid of the Government. And if the delay of justice has not, in all cases, been equal in its consequences to an absolute denial of it, still it has caused much distress and injury. The present bill will quiet the apprehensions of most of the claimants; and, although it will neither satisfy nor do justice to all, yet it will restore that confidence which has been much impaired, and will do what the national faith is pledged to do. These, sir, are a few of the reasons which induce me to hope the motion may prevail.

The said amendments were then concurred in by the House, and the bill being further amended, it was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

TUESDAY, March 15.

Claim of Beaumarchais.

MR. LOWNDES, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of J. A. Chevallie, agent for Amelie Eugenie Beaumarchais, made a report, which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

That the circumstances under which shipments of goods and advances of money to the United States were made by Mr. de Beaumarchais, during our Revolution, were such as necessarily produced much difficulty in the settlement of his accounts. There was no contract by which the obligations and rights of the two parties were defined; and it appears, from many letters of Dr. Franklin and of Arthur Lee, that both those gentlemen considered Mr. de Beaumarchais as supplied with funds by the French Government, to encourage the resistance of America, and to give to this political transaction the appearance of a mercantile speculation. Mr. Lee represents Mr. de Beaumarchais when first introduced to him, as declaring that he was authorized by the French Government to offer 200,000 louis for the use of the revolted colonies. In a letter, signed by B. Franklin, Arthur Lee, and Silas Deane, they express the wish that Mr. de Beaumarchais's accounts might be left to them for settlement, "as there was a mixture of public and private concerns, which Congress could not so well develop." Letters from Mr. Girard, a former Minister from France to the United States, written in support of the claim of Mr. de Beaumarchais, states, "that only military stores were advanced to him by the French Government for the United States, which he was to return, to the royal arsenals;" and Mr. de Vergennes says that, "for the payment of the military stores the Government" of this country "should not be pressed." In these letters, indeed, as in those of Mr. Turreau since, all connection on the part of the French Government with Mr. de Beaumarchais's speculations is denied, and the transaction represented as a mere commercial adventure. Yet it could not have been meant that the Government of France did not furnish a part of the cargoes; for this is proved by the statement of Dr. Franklin, of Mr. Girard, and of Mr. de Vergennes himself. It could not have been meant, that the Government of France had not some power over the debt, which the delivery of these stores produced; for Mr. de Vergennes himself promises that for this our Government should not be pressed. It could have been intended only to say that the French Government was to have no profit from the transaction; and this may readily be admitted.

The committee have adverted to this apparent "mixture of public and private concerns," in the subjects of Mr. de Beaumarchais's accounts, for the purpose of explaining that delay in their liquidation, which could not otherwise be reconciled to the habitual fidelity of this Government to all its engagements. The principles on which those accounts were finally settled at the Comptroller's office, in 1805, are fully explained and supported by the report of the Committee of Claims of the 10th of March, 1806, which the committee to which the same business is now referred, beg to be allowed to adopt as a part of this report. The balance which, under that settlement, appeared due to the estate of Mr. de Beaumarchais was paid to the memorialist in 1806. This committee have not minutely examined the charges brought by Mr. de Beaumarchais against the United States, because they have been settled at the Treasury, on principles which the memorialist does not indeed represent himself as approving, but to which he seems disposed to acquiesce. The only question relating to the account, which it appears necessary to bring distinctly to the view of the House, refers to a million of livres, which, at the Treasury, have been considered as paid in 1776, by the French Government, to Mr. de Beaumarchais, for the service of the United States, and for which credit has been accordingly taken. This question is so fully explained, and, in the opinion of the committee so justly decided, in the letter of the former Secretary of the Treasury, (Mr. Gallatin,) included in the report before referred to, that they will add a very few observations to the perspicuous statement which it contains. If the opinion expressed in that letter be correct, the just claim of the heiress of Caron de Beaumarchais has been fully satisfied.

With respect to the claim of the United States to this credit of a million, (which is denied by the memorialist,) the committee submit to the House that it must be supposed either—

1. That this million was paid to Mr. de Beaumarchais, for the use of the United States, to which he was bound to account for its expenditure; or,

2. That this million was not paid to Mr. de Beaumarchais, for the use of the United States; or,

3. That, if it were paid for the use of the United States, it was expended on "objects of secret political service," connected with the interests of the United States, but different from the supplies which are charged in Mr. de Beaumarchais's accounts; that it was satisfactorily accounted for to the French Government; and that it was to that Government only that he was bound to account.

1. On the first supposition there can exist no claim, on the part of the estate of Mr. de Beaumarchais, against the United States, and it is therefore only necessary to examine the others. It may be supposed—

2. That this million was not paid to Mr. de Beaumarchais for the use of the United States. This supposition is contradicted by the evidence of facts, and by the declaration of the French Government in 1794, as is shown in the letter of Mr. Gallatin, before referred to. But, if it be admitted, the obligation of the United States to pay this million now will not be implied. It will be recollected that by the contract of February 26, 1763, three millions of livres advanced by France before the treaty of 1778, as well as six millions afterwards granted, were declared to be a gratuitous assistance. If there were not a million paid to Mr. de Beaumarchais for the use of the United States, the million advanced in 1777 by the farmers general, (which was entered in our foreign account under the title of "subsides,") must be considered as having been a gratuitous aid, and should have been deducted from the amount which France claimed to be due by America. In a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury to Mr. Bournonville, dated February 8, 1794, he refuses to admit to the credit of France the balance due to the farmers general, until it should be shown that the million received from them formed no part of the gratuitous aid specified in the contract of 1783. The French Government, by the receipt of Mr. de Beaumarchais, and by the opinion which it expressed, satisfied the Comptroller that the deduction of the million was to be made from Mr. de Beaumarchais's account, and not from its own. If the French Government were mistaken in this opinion, it follows that we overpaid it in 1794, by an amount equal to that which by its mistake was withheld from Mr. de Beaumarchais. But, the evidence which should ascertain the real creditor could only have been obtained from France. The acknowledged debtors as we at that time were of the French Government, as well as of Mr. de Beaumarchais, we had no interest in making this deduction rather from the one debit than the other; and if France, in deciding a question in which her Government and one of her subjects were alone interested, and of the evidence of which her Government was the only depository, has erroneously decided, it is not against the Government of the United States that complaints can properly be directed. It may be supposed—

3. That, if the million in question were paid to Mr. de Beaumarchais, for the use of the United States, it was expended on objects of a political nature, connected, indeed, with the interests of the American Government, but different from the supplies which are charged in Mr. de Beaumarchais's accounts; that it was satisfactorily accounted for to the French Government; and that to it only was he bound to account. It appears to the committee, that these suppositions cannot be admitted. The French Government advanced money to Mr. de Beaumarchais, to be employed for our service. Mr. de Beaumarchais purchased articles most essential to our service, and sent them to this country; shall we presume that this advance has been invested in these articles, or been used in some other way for our benefit, of which no evidence appears? A receipt is indeed produced, showing that the French Minister was satisfied with the application of a million "to an object of secret political service;" but this by no means contradicts the opinion, that it may have been employed for the purchase of the articles which Mr. de Beaumarchais sent to America, and that therefore it ought to be deducted from his account.

But, besides other difficulties, are we to presume that Dr. Franklin, who negotiated this contract of 1783, would not have been informed that the gratuitous aid which he was called upon formally to acknowledge, was made so mysteriously, that neither he nor his Government was to know the objects to which it was applied, nor the services which it accomplished?

The objection, however, to a reversal of the judgment of the Comptroller of the Treasury, appears to the committee not to result alone from an examination of the case which he has decided. The Government of the United States, in constituting a department by which all claims upon it are to be impartially examined, and in consigning the direction of this department to men of judgment and integrity, has adopted the only method of securing justice to creditors which the institutions of any society can provide. Mr. de Beaumarchais was himself anxious that the question in which he was interested should be decided by arbitration. Mr. Chevallier (the attorney of his heirs) would wish that it should be referred to judicial decision. But neither arbitrators nor judges could be more impartial than the officers of the Government, who have no interest to induce a wrong decision, and whose reputation, in some degree, must depend on their making a right one. If the rules of a court of law be different, they cannot be supposed to be more liberal, or, in general, more satisfactory to a foreign claimant, than those adopted by the Treasury, in the settlement of their accounts. But, if the officers of the Treasury have erred in their decision, shall not Congress correct the error? The committee believe that in this case they have not erred; and the voluminous documents which the reference of this question has obliged them to examine were not necessary to convince them that want of time must, of itself, disqualify the Legislature for the task of rejudging the sentences of its officers of finance.

The committee submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the memorialist have leave to withdraw his memorial.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

WASHINGTON, February 28, 1812.

SIR: I have considered the subject of the letter which you did me the honor to address to me on the 9th of last month, in the case of the representatives of Monsieur de Beaumarchais, and am of opinion that the documents do not, in point of law, maintain the discount of a million of livres to which your letter alludes.

The demand of Monsieur de Beaumarchais appears to be admitted; upon what principle, whether of strict law, or of liberal equity, whether upon a reasonable probability, or upon regular proof, I do not know, and have not been called upon to inquire.

If the demand has been admitted without rigorous proof, it is for Congress to determine how far it may be proper to measure a discount, claimed by the Government, by a standard purely legal. But viewing the question referred to me, as I have been desired to view it, as a mere matter of law, I am compelled to say, that the title to the deduction insisted upon must be shown by the United States, and that the evidence would not be sufficient to establish it in a court of justice.

If the reasons of this opinion should be thought necessary, I shall take great pleasure in stating them to the committee.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, yours, &c. WM. PINKNEY.

Hon. CHAIRMAN of Committee of Claims.

FRIDAY, March 18.

Paul Cuffee.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate for authorizing the President of the United States to permit the departure of Paul Cuffee with a cargo to Sierra Leone; together with a report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures against the same.

This bill underwent a discussion of a very diffuse nature, and of no little length, in the course of which the object of the bill was supported by Messrs. WHEATON, GROSVENOR, PICKERING, TAGGART, BAYLIEN, WEBSTER, FARROW, DUVALL, and SHIPARD, and opposed by Messrs. NEWTON, WRIGHT, McKIM, KERR, INGHAM, FISK, of Vermont, and INGERSOLL.

The bill was supported on the ground of the excellence of the general character of Mr. Cuffee; the philanthropy of his views; the benefits to humanity and religion generally of which a success in these views might be productive; the benefits which would result to the United States, particularly from the establishment of an institution which would invite the emigration of free blacks, a part of our population which we could well spare, &c.

On the other hand, the bill was opposed on various grounds. While the excellence of the general character of Mr. Cuffee was fully credited and generally admitted, it was said that the bill would violate, in favor of a foreign mission, that policy which we had refused to infringe for the sake even of our coasters and fishermen; that Mr. Cuffee might depart in neutral vessels with his companions, but that it would be improper to permit him to carry out a cargo, which was not at all necessary to his views of propagating the Gospel; that his voyage would be contrary to the policy of existing laws, independent of the embargo policy, because Sierra Leone was a British settlement; that as this was a British settlement, in the possession of a nation claiming and asserted to be the bulwark of our religion, there was no occasion for cargoes departing from the United States to enable her to carry her views into effect, &c.

Intermingled in this debate was considerable controversy and something like asperity as to the character of the British nation for religion and humanity, in which Mr. PICKERING, of Massachusetts on the one side, and Mr. KERN, of Virginia, and Mr. FISK, of Vermont, on the other, were the principal debaters, and also on the evil which might result from transporting liberated slaves from this country to a British settlement. The question, however, appeared to the reporter to turn on the expediency of permitting, under the existence of the restrictive system, a cargo to go out which must necessarily sail under British license; which it was argued would not be granted unless it were considered advantageous to the interest of the enemy that such trade should be carried on.

The debate having been extended to the usual hour of adjournment, the committee reported the bill to the House with certain amendments, and on the question on the passage of the bill to a third reading, which was decided by yeas and nays, the vote was for the bill 65, against it 72.

SATURDAY, March 26.

Yazoo Claims.

The bill from the Senate "for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory," was read the third time as amended, and the question was stated:

"Shall the bill pass?" Whereupon,

The bill being put on its passage—

Mr. SHARPE, of Kentucky, in an animated speech of more than half an hour, opposed its passage. He took a rapid but comprehensive view of the subject, and opposed the bill on grounds both of inexpediency and injustice.

Mr. BARNETT, of Georgia, followed on the same side of the question. Having been an eye-witness of the original fraud, and having a personal knowledge of all its enormity, he spoke in a feeling manner of that transaction and of its consequences, &c.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of Massachusetts, spoke a short time in support of the bill, and in reply to gentlemen who opposed it.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, replied to Mr. RICHARDSON, and entered again into an investigation of the bill, which he opposed with his usual force, not from the just abhorrence he felt at the original corruption of the purchase, because that question was laid at rest, but from a conviction of the inexpediency, impolicy, and inadequacy of the bill to the objects contemplated.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, followed in an energetic and able defence of the bill; in the course of which he replied to the gentlemen opposed to him, took a succinct and lucid view of the subject, and enforced and illustrated the various reasons that influenced him in his support of the bill.

Mr. McKIM, of Maryland, stated concisely the reasons which would induce him to vote against the bill; and declared that his opposition arose not so much from his hostility to a compromise as from a want of confidence in the bill, which he deemed insufficient to effect its object, &c.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 76, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Avery, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Butler, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Comstock, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Ely, Findlay, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Gaston, Geddes, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Hanson, Hasbrouck, Howell, Hufty, Irving, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Markell, Miller, Moffit, Montgomery, Mosely, Oakley, Parker, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rich, Richardson, Ridgely, Robertson, Ruggles, Sherwood, Shipard, Skinner, Smith of New Hampshire, Smith of New York, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Taylor, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, Wood, Wright, and Yancey.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Caldwell, Calhoun, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duval, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Humphreys, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irwin, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, King of North Carolina, Leferts, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Moore, Murfree, Nelson, Another member, to wit, JOSEPH H. HAWKINS, from Kentucky, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat, in the place of Henry Clay, resigned.

FRIDAY, April 8.

Controversies between States.

The order of the day on the bill to prescribe the mode of prosecuting and deciding controversies between two or more States, being called up by Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky,

Mr. GHOLSON, of Virginia, moved that the order of the day be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, of Kentucky, opposed the postponement, and read the memorial of the Legislature of Kentucky, requesting that such a law may be passed.

A warm debate took place thereon, which occupied the House till 4 o'clock; in the course of which the motion for postponement was supported by Mr. GHOLSON, Mr. HUMPHREYS, Mr. GRUNDY, Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, Mr. ALSTON, of North Carolina, and Mr. WRIGHT, of Md.—and warmly opposed by Mr. HAWKINS, Mr. MONTGOMERY, Mr. DESHA, and Mr. SHARPE, of Kentucky, and by Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, and Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina.

It appeared, in the course of this debate, that the necessity which had produced the memorial of Kentucky, and, in consequence thereof, the introduction of the bill before the House, arose from the existence of a controversy between the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, in relation to the boundary line, which dispute had commenced between the mother States of Virginia and North Carolina before the birth of the two first-named States, and which it appears the two States cannot accommodate; but, on the contrary, a settlement of which becomes every day less practicable, from the lapse of time, irritation by repeated collision, and the increased value of the land which is in dispute, having been granted to different individuals at the same time by both States.

The discussion was not confined to the abstract expediency of legislating on the subject of the bill, but more or less connected itself with the merit of the conflicting claims of Tennessee and Kentucky to the land, the titles to which are jeopardized and unsettled in consequence of this dispute. An opinion was expressed by the members of Tennessee that the question may be amicably settled, without the intervention of such a law.

On the question there were for indefinite postponement 56, against it 27.

A quorum not being present, of course the question could not be decided on. And the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 12.

Excise on Liquors.

The bill to change the tax on domestic distilled liquors from the capacity of the still to the quantity distilled, having been called up, a motion was made by Mr. ALSTON, of North Carolina, in pursuance of a decision of the Committee of Ways and Means subsequent to the bill's being reported, to postpone the further consideration of this order of the day indefinitely; which motion was supported by the mover, Mr. GRUNDY, and Mr. HUMPHREYS, of Tennessee, Mr. CREIGHTON, of Ohio, and Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, principally on the ground of the lateness of the session, and the propriety of ascertaining more accurately the operation of the present system before it should be changed; and was opposed by Mr. McKIM, of Maryland.

The question on indefinite postponement was decided in the affirmative by the following vote by yeas and nays. For the postponement 61, against it 59.

WEDNESDAY, April 13.

Relations with France.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, rose to offer a motion, which he prefaced by a word or two of explanation. The period of adjournment, he said, was approaching, and an interval of six months would elapse before Congress would again convene. Mr. G. said he thought it very important, if the Executive was in possession of any information respecting our relations with France, not already in possession of the public, that it should be laid before the House. He was desirous of such information for another reason. The House was called upon to legislate in relation to France, on a bill which has been reported in this House, but not yet acted on, to open our ports to the cruisers of France. The House had been informed, too, by the President in his late Message, that the most astonishing changes had taken place on the Continent of Europe. It was important to know how far these changes affected our relations with France, and the policy of that measure he had alluded to. These were his reasons, and his only reasons, for offering the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House any information in his possession touching our relations with France, which in his judgment it is not improper to disclose.

This motion having been assented to by Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, and modified, on the suggestion of Mr. GRUNDY, of Tennessee, by the insertion of the words "not heretofore communicated," was agreed to without a division.

Relations with France.

The following Message was received from the
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES :

To the House of Representatives of the United States :

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of State, complying with their resolution of the 18th instant. JAMES MADISON.

APRIL 16, 1814.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 13th instant, requesting information touching our relations with France, has the honor to submit to the President an extract of a letter from the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, which contains the latest, and the only material, information received by this Department on that subject.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 16, 1814.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Crawford to the Secretary of State.

" PARIS, January 16, 1814.

" On the 29th ultimo, I had an interview with the Minister of Exterior Relations, who informed me that he had made to the Emperor a detailed report of the negotiation, and that he would inform me of his Majesty's decision, the moment it should be made known to him. His conversation during this interview was as conciliatory as it could be, and his expressions, though still general, admitted that indemnity was determined upon. The address of the Senator Count Segur to the inhabitants of the eighteenth military division of the Empire, published in the Moniteur of the 15th instant, stated that His Majesty was going to place himself at the head of his troops. Knowing that I should not be able to advance a single step in the negotiation during his absence, unless he should, before his departure from Paris, decide upon the classes of cases for which indemnity should be made, I determined to address a note to the Duke of Vicenza, with a view to impress more strongly upon his mind the necessity of an immediate decision.

" The day on which I intended to present this note I was informed that the Duke of Vicenza had set out from Paris, at 4 o'clock, A. M., for the headquarters of the two Emperors, which was then said to be in Switzerland. The general impression in Paris that day was that the Emperor would set out immediately for Metz, where his army of reserve has been forming ever since he crossed the Rhine. This circumstance induced me to believe that the note would not produce any good effect. I, therefore, determined not to present it. The Emperor is still in Paris, and I regret extremely that I did not adhere to my first determination, notwithstanding the absence of the Minister of Foreign Relations. From the situation of affairs here, it is impossible to foresee the delays to which this perplexing business will yet be subject. In the first and only interview which I had with the Duke of Bassano, he said expressly that the obstacles which his absence had thrown in the way of the negotiation should not occur again. Two months have not elapsed before the same obstacles are presented."

MONDAY, April 18.

Adjournment.

The usual order was then adopted to appoint a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, to inform him both Houses, having completed the business before them, were about to adjourn. Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. WHARTON were appointed on the part of the Senate, and Messrs. EPPES, OAKLEY, and ROBERTSON, on the part of this House.

Mr. EPPES, from the committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, reported that they had performed the duty assigned to them, and received for answer, that he had no further communications to make to the House.

And the House, after receiving back all the bills which had been laid before the President, adjourned until the last Monday in October next.

[SENATE.]

THIRTEENTH CONGRESS.—THIRD SESSION.

BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, SEPTEMBER 19, 1814.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.

A PROCLAMATION

By the President of the United States of America.

WHEREAS great and weighty matters, claiming the consideration of the Congress of the United States, form an extraordinary occasion for convening them, I do, by these presents, appoint Monday, the nineteenth day of September next, for their meeting at the city of Washington: hereby requiring the respective Senators and Representatives then and there to assemble in Congress, in order to receive such communications as may then be made to them, and to consult and determine on such measures as in their wisdom may be deemed meet for the welfare of the United States.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed, and signed the same with my hand.

Done at the city of Washington, the eighth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, and of the independence of the United States the thirty-ninth.

JAMES MADISON.

By the President:

JAMES MONROE,
Secretary of State.

MONDAY, September 19, 1814.

Conformably to the above Proclamation of the President of the United States of the 8th of August last, the third session of the Thirteenth Congress commenced this day at the city of Washington, and the Senate assembled.

PRESENT.

JOSEPH B. VARNUM, from Massachusetts.
JEREMIAH B. HOWELL, from Rhode Island.
JONATHAN ROBINSON, from Vermont.
ABNER LACOCK and JONATHAN ROBERTS, from Pennsylvania.
OUTERBRIDGE HORSEY, from Delaware.
RICHARD BRENT and WILLIAM B. GILES, from Virginia.
JAMES TURNER, from North Carolina.
JOHN GAILLARD, from South Carolina.
CHARLES TAIT, from Georgia.
JESSE BLEDSOE, from Kentucky.
JOSEPH ANDERSON and JESSE WHARTON, from Tennessee.

JEREMIAH MORROW and THOMAS WORTHINGTON, from Ohio.

JAMES BROWN and ELEGIUS FROMENTIN, from Louisiana.

JOHN GAILLARD, President pro tempore, resumed the Chair.

THOMAS W. THOMPSON, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire, in place of Nicholas Gilman, deceased, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

On motion, by Mr. BLEDSOE,

Resolved, As the former Secretary of the Senate has departed this life, that the Chief Clerk do act as Secretary thereof until one shall be appointed.

Whereupon, the oath prescribed by law was administered to SAMUEL TURNER, Jr.

On motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, the Secretary was directed to acquaint the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and ready to proceed to business.

On motion, by Mr. ROBINSON, Messrs. ROBINSON and VARNUM were appointed a committee on the part of the Senate, together with such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives on their part, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

The PRESIDENT communicated the following letter from the President of the United States; which was read:

WASHINGTON, September 17, 1814.

SIR: The destruction of the Capitol by the enemy, having made it necessary that other accommodations should be provided for the meeting of Congress, Chambers for the Senate and for the House of Representatives, with other requisite apartments, have been fitted up, under the direction of the Superintendent of the city, in the public building heretofore allotted for the Post and other public offices.

JAMES MADISON.

The PRESIDENT
Of the Senate of the United States.

TUESDAY, September 20.

WILLIAM W. BIBB, from the State of Georgia, took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. WORTHINGTON submitted the following motion :

Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress during the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

Mr. ROBINSON reported, from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, and that the President informed the committee that he would make a communication to the two Houses this day, at 12 o'clock.

President's Message.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES :

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives :

Notwithstanding the early day which had been fixed for your session of the present year, I was induced to call you together still sooner, as well that any inadequacy in the existing provisions for the wants of the Treasury might be supplied, as that no delay might happen in providing for the result of the negotiations on foot with Great Britain, whether it should require arrangements adapted to a return of peace, or further and more effective provisions for prosecuting the war.

That result is not yet known. If, on one hand, the repeal of the Orders in Council, and the general pacification in Europe, which withdrew the occasion on which impressments from American vessels were practised, suggest expectations that peace and amity may be re-established, we were compelled, on the other hand, by the refusal of the British Government to accept the offered mediation of the Emperor of Russia; by the delays in giving effect to its own proposal of a direct negotiation; and, above all, by the principles and manner in which the war is now avowedly carried on, to infer that a spirit of hostility is indulged more violent than ever against the rights and prosperity of this country.

This increased violence is best explained by the two important circumstances, that the great contest in Europe for an equilibrium guaranteeing all its States against the ambition of any, has been closed without any check on the overbearing power of Great Britain on the ocean; and it has left in her hands disposable armaments with which, forgetting the difficulties of a remote war with a free people, and yielding to the intoxication of success, with the example of a great victim to it before her eyes, she cherishes hopes of still further aggrandizing a power already formidable in its abuses to the tranquillity of the civilized and commercial world.

But, whatever may have inspired the enemy with these more violent purposes, the public councils of a nation, more able to maintain than it was to acquire its independence, and with a devotion to it rendered more ardent by the experience of its blessings, can never deliberate but on the means most effectual for defeating the extravagant views or unwarrantable passions with which alone the war can now be pursued against us.

In the events of the present campaign, the enemy, with all his augmented means, and wanton use of them, has little ground for exultation, unless he can feel it in the success of his recent enterprises against this metropolis and the neighboring town of Alexandria, from both of which his retreats were as precipitate as his attempts were bold and fortunate. In his other incursions on our Atlantic frontier, his progress, often checked and chastised by the martial spirit of the neighboring citizens, has had more effect in distressing individuals, and in dishonoring his arms, than in promoting any object of legitimate warfare. And, in the two instances mentioned, however deeply to be regretted on our part, he will find in his transient success, which interrupted for a moment only the ordinary public business at the Seat of Government, no compensation for the loss of character with the world, by his violations of private property, and by his destruction of public edifices, protected, as monuments of the arts, by the laws of civilized warfare.

On our side, we can appeal to a series of achievements which have given new lustre to the American arms. Besides the brilliant incidents in the minor operations of the campaign, the splendid victories gained on the Canadian side of the Niagara, by the American forces under Major General Brown, and Brigadiers Scott and Gaines, have gained for these heroes, and their emulating companions, the most unfading laurels; and, having triumphantly tested the progressive discipline of the American soldiery, have taught the enemy that the longer he protracts his hostile efforts, the more certain and decisive will be his final discomfiture.

On our southern border, victory has continued also to follow the American standard. The bold and skilful operations of Major General Jackson, conducting troops drawn from the militia of the States least distant, particularly of Tennessee, have subdued the principal tribes of hostile savages, and, by establishing a peace with them, preceded by recent and exemplary chastisement, has best guarded against the mischief of their co-operation with the British enterprises which may be planned against that quarter of our country. Important tribes of Indians on our Northwestern frontier have also acceded to stipulations which bind them to the interests of the United States, and to consider our enemy as theirs also.

In the recent attempt of the enemy on the city of Baltimore, defended by militia and volunteers, aided by a small body of regulars and seamen, he was received with a spirit which produced a rapid retreat to his ships; whilst a concurrent attack by a large fleet was successfully resisted by the steady and well-directed fire of the fort and batteries opposed to it.

In another recent attack by a powerful force on our troops at Plattsburg, of which regulars made a part only, the enemy, after a perseverance for many hours, was finally compelled to seek safety in a hasty retreat, with our gallant bands pressing upon him.

On the Lakes, so much contested throughout the war, the great exertions for the command made on our part have been well repaid. On Lake Ontario, our squadron is now, and has been for some time, in a condition to confine that of the enemy to his own port, and to favor the operations of our land forces on that frontier.

A part of the squadron on Lake Erie has been extended into Lake Huron, and has produced the advantage of displaying our command on that lake also. One object of the expedition was the reduction of Mackinaw, which failed, with the loss of a few brave men, among whom was an officer justly distinguished for his gallant exploits. The expedition, ably conducted by both the land and the naval commanders, was otherwise highly valuable in its effects.

On Lake Champlain, where our superiority had for some time been undisputed, the British squadron lately came into action with the American, commanded by Captain Macdonough. It issued in the capture of the whole of the enemy's ships. The best praise for this officer, and his intrepid comrades, is in the likeness of his triumph to the illustrious victory which immortalized another officer, and established, at a critical moment, our command of another lake.

On the ocean, the pride of our naval arms has been amply supported. A second frigate has indeed fallen into the hands of the enemy, but the loss is hidden in the blaze of heroism with which she was defended. Captain Porter, who commanded her, and whose previous career had been distinguished by daring enterprise and by fertility of genius, maintained a sanguinary contest against two ships, one of them superior to his own, and under other severe disadvantages, till humanity tore down the colors which valor had nailed to the mast. This officer and his brave comrades have added much to the rising glory of the American flag, and have merited all the effusions of gratitude which their country is ever ready to bestow on the champions of its rights and of its safety.

Two smaller vessels of war have also become prizes to the enemy; but, by a superiority of force which sufficiently vindicates the reputation of their commanders; whilst two others, one commanded by Captain Warrington, the other by Captain Blakely, have captured British ships of the same class, with a gallantry and good conduct which entitle them and their companions to a just share in the praise of their country.

In spite of the naval force of the enemy accumulated on our coasts, our private cruisers also have not ceased to annoy his commerce, and to bring their rich prizes into our ports; contributing thus, with other proofs, to demonstrate the incompetency and illegality of a blockade, the proclamation of which is made the pretext for vexing and discouraging the commerce of neutral powers with the United States.

To meet the extended and diversified warfare adopted by the enemy, great bodies of militia have been taken into service for the public defence, and great expenses incurred. That the defence every where may be both more convenient and more economical, Congress will see the necessity of immediate measures for filling the ranks of the regular Army, and of enlarging the provision for special corps, mounted and unmounted, to be engaged for longer periods of service than are due from the militia. I earnestly renew, at the same time, a recommendation of such changes in the system of the militia, as, by classing and disciplining for the most prompt and active service the portions most capable of it, will give to that great resource for the public safety all the requisite energy and efficiency.

The moneys received into the Treasury during the nine months ending on the 30th day of June last, amounted to thirty-two millions of dollars, of which near eleven millions were the proceeds of the public revenue, and the remainder derived from loans. The disbursements for public expenditures during the same period exceeded thirty-four millions of dollars, and left in the Treasury, on the first day of July, near five millions of dollars. The demands during the remainder of the present year, already authorized by Congress, and the expenses incident to an extension of the operations of the war, will render it necessary that large sums should be provided to meet them.

From this view of the national affairs, Congress will be urged to take up, without delay, as well the subject of pecuniary supplies as that of military force, and on a scale commensurate with the extent and the character which the war has assumed. It is not to be disguised that the situation of our country calls for its greatest efforts. Our enemy is powerful in men and in money, on the land and on the water. Availing himself of fortuitous advantages, he is aiming, with his undivided force, a deadly blow at our growing prosperity, perhaps at our national existence. He has avowed his purpose of trampling on the usages of civilized warfare, and given earnest of it in the plunder and wanton destruction of private property. In his pride of maritime dominion, and in his thirst of commercial monopoly, he strikes with peculiar animosity at the progress of our navigation and of our manufactures. His barbarous policy has not even spared those monuments of the arts and models of taste with which our country had enriched and embellished its infant metropolis. From such an adversary, hostility, in its greatest force and in its worst forms, may be looked for. The American people will face it with the undaunted spirit which in their Revolutionary struggle defeated his unrighteous projects. His threats and his barbarities, instead of dismay, will kindle in every bosom an indignation not to be extinguished but in the disaster and expulsion of such cruel invaders. In providing the means necessary, the National Legislature will not distrust the heroic and enlightened patriotism of its constituents. They will cheerfully and proudly bear every burden of every kind which the safety and honor of the nation demand. We have seen them every where paying their taxes, direct and indirect, with the greatest promptness and alacrity. We see them rushing with enthusiasm to the scenes where danger and duty call. In offering their blood, they give the surest pledge that no other tribute will be withheld.

Having forborne to declare war until to other aggressions had been added the capture of nearly a thousand American vessels, and the impressment of thousands of American seafaring citizens, and until a final declaration had been made by the Government of Great Britain, that her hostile orders against our commerce would not be revoked, but on conditions as impossible as unjust; whilst it was known that these orders would not otherwise cease, but with a war which had lasted nearly twenty years, and which, according to appearances at that time, might last as many more; having manifested, on every occasion, and in every proper mode, a sincere desire to arrest the effusion of blood, and meet our enemy on the ground of justice and reconciliation, our beloved country, in still opposing to his persevering hostility all its energies, with an undiminished disposition towards peace and friendship on honorable terms, must carry with it the good wishes of the impartial world, and the best hopes of support from an omnipotent and kind Providence. JAMES MADISON.

Victory on Lake Champlain.

Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported, in part, the following resolutions, which were read, and passed to the second reading:

Resolutions expressive of the sense of Congress of the gallant conduct of Captain Thomas Macdonough, the officers, seamen, marines, and infantry serving as marines, on board the United States squadron on Lake Champlain.

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress be, and the same are hereby presented to Captain Thomas Macdonough, and, through him, to the officers, petty officers, seamen, marines, and infantry serving as marines, attached to the squadron under his command, for the decisive and splendid victory gained on Lake Champlain, on the 11th of September, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, over a British squadron of superior force.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause gold medals to be struck, emblematical of the action between the two squadrons, and to present them to Captain Macdonough and Captain Robert Henly, and also to Lieutenant Stephen Cassin, in such manner as may be most honorable to them; and that the President be further requested to present a silver medal, with suitable emblems and devices, to each of the commissioned officers of the Navy and Army serving on board; and a sword to each of the Midshipmen and Sailingmasters, who so nobly distinguished themselves in that memorable conflict.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to present a silver medal, with like emblems and devices, to the nearest male relative of Lieutenant Peter Gamble, and of Lieutenant John Stansbury, and to communicate to them the deep regret which Congress feel for the loss of those gallant men, whose names ought to live in the recollection and affection of a grateful country.

Resolved, That — months' pay be allowed, exclusively of the common allowance, to all the petty officers, seamen, marines, and infantry serving as marines, who so gloriously supported the honor of the American flag on that memorable day.

Mr. TAIT also communicated a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, together with copies of documents in relation to the victory obtained by the United States squadron, under the command of Captain Thomas Macdonough, over that of the enemy, on Lake Champlain; which was read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

FRIDAY, October 7.

The resolutions expressive of the sense of Congress of the gallant conduct of Captain Thomas Macdonough, the officers, seamen, and marines, and infantry serving as marines, on board the United States squadron on Lake Champlain, were read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been proposed, the President reported them to the House accordingly; and the resolutions were ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

Death of Samuel A. Otis.

On motion, by Mr. GORE,

Resolved, unanimously, That the Senate, from a sincere desire of testifying their respect for the long and faithful services of their late Secretary, SAMUEL A. OTIS, Esq., who performed the duties of that office with punctuality and exactness, from the commencement of this Government until the close of the last session of Congress, will go into mourning for one month, in the usual method of wearing crape round the left arm.

Mr. Jefferson's Library.

MR. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the joint committee on the Library of Congress, reported a joint resolution empowering the committee to contract for the purchase of the library of Mr. Jefferson, late President of the United States, for the use of Congress; and the resolution was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, the resolution was read the second time by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and on motion, by Mr. KING, the further consideration thereof was postponed.

The report is as follows:

"That they have received, through Mr. Samuel H. Smith, an offer from Mr. Jefferson, late President of the United States, of the whole of his library for Congress, on such terms as they consider highly advantageous to the nation, and worthy the distinguished gentleman who tenders it. But the means placed at the disposal of the committee being very limited, and totally inadequate to the purchase of such a library as that now offered, the committee must have recourse to Congress either to extend their powers, or adopt such other as they may think most proper.

"Should it be the sense of Congress to confide this matter to the committee, they respectfully submit the following resolution:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the joint library committee of the two Houses of Congress be, and they are hereby authorized and empowered to contract, on their part, for the purchase of the library of Mr. Jefferson, late President of the United States, for the use of both Houses of Congress."

MONDAY, October 10.

GEORGE WALKER, appointed Senator by the Executive of the State of Kentucky, in place of George M. Bibb, resigned, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. Jefferson's Library.

MR. GOLDSBOROUGH, chairman of the joint Library Committee of Congress, communicated a letter from Samuel H. Smith, Esq., enclosing one from Mr. Jefferson, tendering the disposition of his library to Congress; which were read.

Mr. Jefferson's letter is as follows:

MONTICELLO, September 21, 1814.

DEAR SIR: I learn from the newspapers that the Vandalism of our enemy has triumphed at Washington, over science as well as the arts, by the destruction of the public library, with the noble edifice in which it was deposited. Of this transaction, as of that of Copenhagen, the world will entertain but one sentiment. They will see a nation suddenly withdraw from a great war, full armed and full handed, taking advantage of another whom they had recently forced into it, unarmed and unprepared, to indulge themselves in acts of barbarism which does not belong to a civilized age. When Van Tromp destroyed their shipping at Chatham, and De Ruyter rode triumphantly up the Thames, he might, in like manner, by the acknowledgment of their own historians, have forced all their ships up to London Bridge, and there have burnt them, the Tower, and city, had these examples been then set. London, when thus menaced, was near a thousand years old; Washington but in its teens.

I presume it will be among the early objects of Congress to recommence their collection. This will be difficult while the war continues, and intercourse with Europe is attended with so much risk. You know my collection, its condition and extent. I have been fifty years making it, and have spared no pains, opportunity or expense, to make it what it now is. While residing in Paris I devoted every afternoon I was disengaged, for a summer or two, in examining all the principal bookstores, turning over every book with my own hands, and putting by every thing which related to America, and, indeed, whatever was rare and valuable in every science; besides this, I had standing orders, during the whole time I was in Europe, in its principal book marts, particularly Amsterdam, Frankfort, Madrid, and London, for such works relating to America as could not be found in Paris. So that in that department, particularly, such a collection was made as probably can never again be effected; because it is hardly probable that the same opportunities, the same time, industry, perseverance, and expense, with some knowledge of the bibliography of the subject, would again happen to be in concurrence. During the same period, and after my return to America, I was led to procure also whatever related to the duties of those in the highest concerns of the nation; so that the collection, which I suppose is of between nine and ten thousand volumes, while it includes what is chiefly valuable in science and literature generally, extends more particularly to whatever belongs to the American statesman; in the diplomatic and parliamentary branches, it is particularly full. It is long since I have been sensible it ought not to continue private property, and had provided that, at my death, Congress should have the refusal of it, at their own price; but the loss they have now incurred makes the present the proper moment for their accommodation, without regard to the small remnant of time and the barren use of my enjoying it. I ask of your friendship, therefore, to make for me the tender of it to the Library Committee of Congress, not knowing myself of whom the committee consists. I enclose you a catalogue, which will enable them to judge of its contents. Nearly the whole are well bound—abundance of them elegantly, and of the choicest editions. They may be valued by the persons named by themselves, and the payment made convenient to the public; it may be, for instance, in such annual instalments as the law of Congress has left at their disposal, or in stock of any of their late loans, or any loan they may institute at this session, so as to spare the present calls of our country, and await its days of peace and prosperity. They may enter, nevertheless, into immediate use of it, as eighteen or twenty wagons would place it in Washington in a single trip of a fortnight. I should be willing, indeed, to retain a few of the books to amuse the time I have yet to pass, which might be valued with the rest, but not included in the sum of valuation until they should be restored at my death, which I would cheerfully provide for, so that the whole library, as it stands in the catalogue at this moment, should be theirs, without any garbling. Those I should like to retain would be chiefly classical and mathematical, some few in other branches, and particularly one of the five Encyclopedias in the catalogue; but this, if not acceptable, would not be urged. I must add, that I have not revised the library since I came home to live, so that it is probable some of the books may be missing, except in the chapters of law and divinity, which have been revised, and stand exactly as in the catalogue, which will of course be needed, whether the tender be accepted or not. I do not know that it contains any branch of science which Congress would wish to exclude from their collection. There is in fact no subject to which a member of Congress may not have occasion to refer. But such a wish would not correspond with my views of preventing its dismemberment. My design is either to place it in their hands entire, or preserve it so here. I am engaged in making an alphabetical index of the authors' names, to be annexed to the catalogue, in order to facilitate the finding their works in the catalogue, which I will forward to you as soon as completed. Any agreement you shall be so good as to take the trouble of entering into with the committee, I hereby confirm.

Accept the assurance of my great esteem and respect,
THOMAS JEFFERSON.

The Senate then resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the "resolution empowering the joint library committee to contract for the purchase of Mr. Jefferson's library;" and, no amendment having been proposed, the President reported it to the House accordingly; and on the question, "Shall this resolution be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion by Mr. FROMENTIN, it was read a third time by unanimous consent, and passed.

TUESDAY, October 11.

Charles Cutts, Esq., elected Secretary.

Agreeable to the resolution of the 6th instant, the Senate proceeded to the election of a Secretary, and the whole number of ballots collected was thirty-one, of which CHARLES CUTTS, had sixteen, and was accordingly elected in the place of Samuel Allyne Otis, deceased.

WEDNESDAY, October 12.

The oaths prescribed were, by the President, administered to CHARLES CUTTS, Esq., Secretary of the Senate.

MONDAY, October 17.

The resolutions expressive of the sense of Congress of the gallantry and good conduct with which the reputation of the arms of the United States has been sustained by Major General Brown, Major General Scott, and Brigadiers Ripley, Miller, Porter, Gaines, and Macomb, were read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to consider and report thereon.

Honors to Captain Johnston Blakely.

Mr. TAIT, from the Naval Committee, reported, in part, a resolution expressive of the sense of Congress relative to the capture of the British sloop Reindeer by the American sloop Wasp; and the resolution was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. TAIT communicated a letter from the Secretary for the Department of Navy, with copies of the documents relative to the capture and destruction of the enemy's sloop of war Reindeer, by the American sloop of war Wasp, commanded by Captain Johnston Blakely; and the letter and documents therein referred to were read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

THURSDAY, October 20.

SAMUEL SMITH, from the State of Maryland, took his seat in the Senate.

MONDAY, October 24.

JOHN LAMBERT, from the State of New Jersey, took his seat in the Senate.

Taxation of Bank Notes—Memorial of Stephen Girard.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the memorial of Stephen Girard, of the city of Philadelphia, stating that he has established a bank upon his own fortune and credit, and for his own exclusive emolument, and that, by the construction given to the act of Congress laying duties on notes of banks, bankers, &c., he is excluded from the privileges enjoyed by other banking companies, and praying relief, for reasons stated at large in the memorial; which was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. ROBERTS, SMITH, and DAGGETT, were appointed the committee.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, the memorial of Stephen Girard, of the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, merchant and banker, respectfully sheweth:

That your memorialist has established a bank in the city of Philadelphia, upon the foundation of his own individual fortune and credit, and for his own exclusive emolument, and that he is willing most cheerfully to contribute, in common with his fellow-citizens throughout the United States, a full proportion of the taxes which have been imposed for the support of the National Government according to the profits of his occupation and the value of his estate; but a construction has been given to the acts of Congress laying duties on notes of banks, &c., from which great difficulties have occurred and great inequalities daily produced to the disadvantage of his bank, that were not, it is confidently believed, within the contemplation of the Legislature.

That the first section of the act of Congress of the 2d August, 1813, having imposed a stamp duty on notes issued by any banker or bankers, as well as by any banks or companies, either incorporated or not incorporated, it is provided by the second section of the act, "that in respect to any stamp on any of the notes of the banks or companies aforesaid, now established, or which may hereafter be established within the United States, it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to agree to an annual composition, in lieu of such stamp duty, with any of the said banks or companies, of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per centum on the amount of the annual dividend made by such banks to their stockholders respectively; that your memorialist, in due season, offered to enter into the said composition, at the rate of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per centum on the amount of the annual profit of this bank, deeming the annual profit of an individual banker equivalent in language and in law, to the annual dividend of a bank established by a corporation or company. That it has been officially declared, however, that the second section of the act of Congress does not authorize a composition with an individual banker, because it speaks only of banks and companies, (not of banker and bankers,) and because it speaks only of dividends (not of profits) made to the stockholders; and that hence an individual banker, acting upon a capital of one million of dollars, and issuing bank notes to the amount of one million of dollars, is subjected to the prompt payment of a duty amounting to \$10,000, while an incorporated bank, or even a private company of two or three bankers, acting upon the same amount of capital and issuing the same amount of bank notes, will only be liable, periodically, to the payment of a duty amounting to \$1,500, upon the customary annual dividend of ten per cent.

That the first section of the act of Congress of the 2d August, 1813, imposes a stamp duty upon any promissory note, or notes, payable either to bearer or order, issued by any banks or companies, or by any banker or bankers; that the eighth section of the act provided that no banks or companies, which shall not have compounded for the stamp duty, shall issue any bank bill or promissory note, unless upon paper duly stamped and whereon the respective duties shall have been paid; and the twelfth section of the act declares, that all the paper wanted for the purpose of the stamp duty, excepting paper for bank notes, shall be furnished, at the expense of the United States, by the Secretary of the Treasury. That, after the rejection of this offer to enter into a composition for the stamp duty, your memorialist has complied with the directions of the law, and has transmitted to the Commissioner of the Revenue sheets of bank notes in order to be stamped.

That, independent of the great hazard and delay to which your memorialist is exposed by these operations, it is obvious, from the texture and quality of bank paper, that the stamp, as at present impressed on bank notes, must disappear in the course of an extensive circulation, producing some uncertainty in the revenue, and probably great injustice to individuals.

And your memorialist, having submitted these considerations to the wisdom of Congress, respectfully prays, that the act of Congress may be so amended, as to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into a composition for the stamp duty, in the case of private bankers as well as in the case of corporations and companies, or so as to render the duty equal in its operations upon every denomination of bankers.

STEPHEN GIRARD.

PHILADELPHIA, October 24, 1814.

WEDNESDAY, November 2.

SAMUEL W. DANA, from the State of Connecticut took his seat in the Senate.

THURSDAY, November 3.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Stephen Girard, reported a bill supplementary to an act laying duties on notes of banks, bankers, and certain companies; on notes, bonds, and obligations, discounted by banks, bankers, and certain companies; and on bills of exchange of certain descriptions; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

WEDNESDAY, November 23.

Death of the Vice President.

About the hour of meeting, a report having reached the Senate Chamber of the death of the VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, the members from Massachusetts, Messrs. VARNUM and GORE, proceeded to his lodgings to ascertain the fact; and, on their return, having announced the fact to the Senate, the following proceeding took place, on motion of Mr. BLEDSOE.

The Senate, being informed of the death of their distinguished fellow-citizen, ELBRIDGE GERRY, Vice President of the United States,

Do Resolve, That a committee be appointed, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to consider and report measures most proper to manifest the public respect for the memory of the deceased, and expressive of the deep regret of the Congress of the United States for the loss of a citizen so highly respected and revered.

Ordered, That Messrs. GORE, VARNUM, SMITH, ANDERSON, and GAILLARD, be the committee.

On motion of Mr. BLEDSOE,

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives of the decease of the Vice President of the United States, and communicate the foregoing resolution.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House concur in the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee, to consider and report measures proper to manifest the public respect for the memory of the VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, deceased; and have appointed a committee on their part.

The Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, November 24.

On motion, by Mr. GORE,

Resolved, unanimously, That from an unfeigned respect to the late ELBRIDGE GERRY, Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate, the Chair of the President of the Senate be shrouded with black during the present session; and, as a further testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members of the Senate will go into mourning, and wear black crape round the left arm for thirty days.

FRIDAY, November 25.

Election of Presiding Officer.

On motion, by Mr. BRENT, that the Senate now proceed to the election of President pro tempore.

Mr. BRENT's motion was then agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to a choice, accordingly.

On the first ballot, the whole number of votes being thirty, there were: For Mr. GAILLARD, 14; Mr. KING, 10; Mr. CHACE, 8; Mr. ANDERSON, 1; Mr. SMITH, 1; and Mr. TAIT, 1.

On the second ballot, there were: For Mr. GAILLARD, 16; Mr. KING, 10; Mr. CHACE, 5; and Mr. ANDERSON, 1.

Mr. GAILLARD was therefore declared duly elected; and, on taking the Chair, addressed the Senate nearly as follows:

"Honorable Gentlemen: While I lament the sudden and melancholy event which has led to the distinguished honor conferred on me, I am so truly sensible of my own incompetency to discharge the duties of the station to which I am called, in a manner suitable to their importance, and correspondent to the dignity of this honorable body, that I approach the exercise of them with unfeigned diffidence and apprehension. All that I dare hope is, that my efforts will be considered as the result of well-meant intentions: all that I dare promise is, that my best exertions shall be directed to a faithful and impartial execution of the trust confided to me. Relying, then, on the candor and liberality which have ever characterized this respectable assembly, I will proceed to the performance of the duties assigned me."

On motion, by Mr. BIBB,

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States, and acquaint him that the Senate have, in consequence of the decease of the VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, elected the Honorable JOHN GAILLARD President of the Senate pro tempore.

Ordered, That the Secretary make a similar communication to the House of Representatives.

MONDAY, November 28.

Tax on Bank Notes.

The engrossed bill supplementary to an act laying duties on notes of banks, bankers, and certain companies; on notes, bonds, and obligations, discounted by banks, bankers, and certain companies; and on bills of exchange of certain descriptions, having been reported correct, was read a third time.

On the question, "Shall this bill pass?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Bledsoe, Brown, Chace, Condit, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, Lacock, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Walker, and Wharton.

NAYS.—Messrs. Daggett, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, Lambert, Mason, and Thompson.

THURSDAY, December 8:

Bank of the United States.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America.

And the President reported the bill to the House amended.

On the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Bledsoe, Brent, Chace, Condit, Gaillard, Lacock, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Walker, and Wharton.

TUESDAY, December 18.

A bill authorizing the appointment of certain naval officers therein named, was read a third time and passed.

[The bill authorizes the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one Vice Admiral, and two Rear Admirals; and fixes their compensation.]

SATURDAY, December 17.

The bill authorizing payment to the widow of Elbridge Gerry, deceased, late Vice President of the United States, of such salary as would have been payable to him during the residue of the term for which he was elected, had he so long lived, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been agreed to, on the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 14, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Brown, Chace, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, Gore, Hunter, King, Mason, Robinson, Smith, Tait, Taylor, and Thompson.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bledsoe, Condit, German, Lacock, Lambert, Morrow, Roberts, Turner, Varnum, Walker, and Wharton.

TUESDAY, December 20.

The credentials of JONATHAN ROBERTS, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth of March next, were read and laid on file.

WEDNESDAY, December 28.

Revenue Bill.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, on horses kept exclusively for the saddle or carriage, and on gold and silver watches," together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee.

THURSDAY, December 29.

Revenue Bill.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, on horses kept exclusively for the saddle or carriage, and on gold and silver watches."

And the bill having been further amended, on the question, "Shall the amendments be engrossed and read a third time as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative.

FRIDAY, December 30.

JOSEPH KERR, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of Ohio, in place of Thomas Worthington, resigned, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

Death of Senator Brent.

Mr. SMITH announced the death of the Honorable RICHARD BRENT, a Senator from the State of Virginia, who deceased this morning.

Whereupon, on motion, by Mr. SMITH,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of the Honorable RICHARD BRENT; and that the Senate will attend the same; and that notice of the event be given to the House of Representatives.

Ordered, That Messrs. SMITH, VARNUM, TURNER, GORE, and DAGGETT, be the committee.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH,

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Honorable RICHARD BRENT, deceased, late a member thereof, will go into mourning for him one month, by the usual mode of wearing a crape round the left arm.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH,

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be requested to notify the Executive of the State of Virginia, of the death of the Honorable RICHARD BRENT, late a Senator of the United States from that State.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH,

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the Honorable RICHARD BRENT, the Senate now adjourn.

THURSDAY, January 5, 1815.

Direct Taxes.

The bill entitled "An act to provide additional revenue for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same," was read a third time.

WEDNESDAY, January 11.

JAMES BARBOUR, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Virginia, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the decease of Richard Brent, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

FRIDAY, January 18.

Mr. SMITH, from the committee to whom were referred the amendments of the House to the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America, reported the same with a number of amendments.

[The amendments to the amendments of the House propose to increase the fixed capital of the Bank from thirty to thirty-five millions of dollars; to make the capital consist of shares of four hundred instead of one hundred dollars each; that the five millions proposed to be added to the capital, shall be added also to the amount subscribable in public debt; to disagree to the proposition of the House for striking out the section which authorizes suspension of payments in specie; to agree to the section which compels the bank to commence its operations before the first day of January, and to disagree to that which proposes to authorize a committee of Congress at any time to examine the books, &c., and prescribes the course of proceeding in the courts against the bank, in case of violation of its charter.]

The consideration of this report was postponed to, and made the order of the day for tomorrow.

FRIDAY, January 20.

Question of Senator Bledsoe's right to retain his Seat.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Honorable Mr. BLEDSOE, as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 20, 1815.

SIR: Doubts having arisen whether I have a right still to fill my seat in the Senate of the United States, with a view to have the question settled, and a precedent established, and to save my own feelings on a point of duty, I beg leave, through you, to submit the following case for the decision of that honorable body:

Previous to the 24th December last, I forwarded, by mail, my resignation to the Governor of the State of Kentucky, to take place on that day, to be by him communicated to the Legislature of that State, then, and, so far as I am informed, still in session. I was, by a letter from the Governor of that State, advised that he had received my resignation, and would hold it up in the hope of hearing from me, and of a change in my determination on that subject, until about the last of that month, when he would communicate it to the Legislature. Newspaper information states that he did so, and that my successor has been appointed; which latter fact is also stated in a letter to a gentleman of the House of Representatives, as I have been informed. This is all the information I have received. Whether, under these circumstances, I am to be considered as still a member, will be for the honorable Senate to decide. Wishing it to be understood I have no other solicitude as to the result than to be informed of my duty, which is concerned, in continuing in my place, if I have a right to do so.

I am, with high respect, your most obedient servant,

J. BLEDSOE.

The Honorable JOHN GAILLARD,
President of the Senate.

And the letter was read. Whereupon, Mr. ROBERTS submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the facts stated in the letter of the Honorable JESSE BLEDSOE, addressed to the President of the Senate, do not vacate his seat in the Senate.

A motion was made by Mr. KING, to amend the resolution by striking out therefrom the word "not;" and it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 25, nays 8, as follows:

NAYS.—Messrs. Bibb, Condit, Dana, Lacock, Roberts, Smith, Turner, and Varnum.

On the question, "Shall the resolution pass as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Barbour, Brown, Chace, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, Kerr, King, Lacock, Lambert, Mason, Morrow, Robinson, Tait, Taylor, Thompson, Turner, Wells, and Wharton.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bibb, Condit, Dana, Roberts, Smith, and Varnum.

So it was Resolved, That the facts stated in the letter of the Honorable JESSE BLEDSOE, addressed to the President of the Senate, do vacate his seat in the Senate.

MONDAY, January 23.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the credentials of OUTERBRIDGE HORSEY, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Delaware, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March next; and they were read and laid on file.

THURSDAY, January 26.

Intercourse with the Enemy.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to prohibit intercourse with the enemy, and for other purposes; and the amendments made in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

And the bill having been further amended, the amendments were engrossed and the bill read a third time as amended.

FRIDAY, January 27.

Bank of the United States—Veto Message.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

Having bestowed on the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America," that full consideration which is due to the great importance of the subject, and dictated by the respect which I feel for the two Houses of Congress, I am constrained, by a deep and solemn conviction that the bill ought not to become a law, to return it to the Senate, in which it originated, with my objections to the same.

Waiving the question of the constitutional authority of the Legislature to establish an incorporated Bank, as being precluded, in my judgment, by repeated recognitions, under varied circumstances, of the validity of such an institution, in acts of the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial branches of the Government, accompanied by indications, in different modes, of a concurrence of the general will of the nation; the proposed bank does not appear to be calculated to answer the purpose of reviving the public credit, of providing a national medium of circulation, and of aiding the Treasury by facilitating the indispensable anticipations of the revenue, and by affording to the public more durable loans

1. The capital of the bank is to be compounded of specie, of public stock, and of Treasury notes convertible into stock, with a certain proportion of each of which every subscriber is to furnish himself.

The amount of the stock to be subscribed will not, it is believed, be sufficient to produce, in favor of the public credit, any considerable or lasting elevation of the market price, whilst this may be occasionally depressed by the bank itself, if it should carry into the market the allowed proportion of its capital consisting of public stock, in order to procure specie, which it may find its account in procuring, with some sacrifice on that part of its capital.

Nor will any adequate advantage arise to the public credit from the subscription of Treasury notes. The actual issue of these notes nearly equals at present, and will soon exceed, the amount to be subscribed to the bank. The direct effect of this operation is simply to convert fifteen millions of Treasury notes into fifteen millions of six per cent. stock, with the collateral effect of promoting an additional demand for Treasury notes, beyond what might otherwise be negotiable.

Public credit might indeed be expected to derive advantage from the establishment of a National Bank, without regard to the formation of its capital, if the full aid and co-operation of the institution were secured to the Government during the war, and during the period of its fiscal embarrassments. But, the bank proposed will be free from all legal obligation to co-operate with the public measures; and whatever might be the patriotic disposition of its directors to contribute to the removal of those embarrassments, and to invigorate the prosecution of the war, fidelity to the pecuniary and general interest of the institution, according to their estimate of it, might oblige them to decline a connection of their operations with those of the National Treasury, during the continuance of the war and the difficulties incident to it. Temporary sacrifices of interest, though overbalanced by the future and permanent profits of the charter, not being requirable of right in behalf of the public, might not be gratuitously made; and the bank would reap the full benefit of the grant, whilst the public would lose the equivalent expected from it. For it must be kept in view, that the sole inducement to such a grant, on the part of the public, would be the prospect of substantial aids to its pecuniary means at the present crisis, and during the sequel of the war. It is evident that the stock of the bank will, on the return of peace, if not sooner, rise in the market to a value which, if the bank were established in a period of peace, would authorize and obtain for the public a bonus to a very large amount. In lieu of such a bonus the Government is fairly entitled to, and ought not to relinquish or risk, the needful services of the bank, under the pressing circumstances of war.

2. The bank, as proposed to be constituted, cannot be relied on during the war, to provide a circulating medium, nor to furnish loans, or anticipations of the public revenue.

Without a medium, the taxes cannot be collected; and, in the absence of specie, the medium understood to be the best substitute is that of notes issued by a National bank. The proposed bank will commence and conduct its operations under an obligation to pay its notes in specie, or be subject to the loss of its charter. Without such an obligation, the notes of the bank, though not exchangeable for specie, yet resting on good pledges, and performing the uses of specie, in the payment of taxes, and in other public transactions, would, as experience has ascertained, qualify the bank to supply at once a circulating medium, and pecuniary aids to the Government. Under the fetters imposed by the bill, it is manifest that, during the actual state of things, and probably during the war, the period particularly requiring such a medium and such a resource for loans and advances to the Government, notes for which the bank would be compellable to give specie in exchange could not be kept in circulation. The most the bank could effect, and the most it could be expected to aim at, would be to keep the institution alive by limited and local transactions, which, with the interest on the public stock in the bank, might yield a dividend sufficient for the purpose, until a change from war to peace should enable it, by a flow of specie into its vaults, and a removal of the external demand for it, to derive its contemplated emoluments from a safe and full extension of its operations.

On the whole, when it is considered that the proposed establishment will enjoy a monopoly of the profits of a National bank for a period of twenty years; that the monopolized profits will be continually growing, with the progress of the national population and wealth; that the nation will, during the same period, be dependent on the notes of the bank for that species of circulating medium, whenever the precious metals may be wanted, and at all times for so much thereof as may be an eligible substitute for a specie medium; and that the extensive employment of the notes in the collection of the augmented taxes will, moreover, enable the bank greatly to extend its profitable issues of them, without the expense of specie capital to support their circulation; it is as reasonable as it is requisite, that the Government, in return for these extraordinary concessions to the bank, should have a greater security for attaining the public objects of the institution than is presented in the bill, and particularly for every practicable accommodation, both in the temporary advances necessary to anticipate the taxes, and in those more durable loans which are equally necessary to diminish the resort to taxes.

In discharging this painful duty of stating objections to a measure which has undergone the deliberations and received the sanction of the two Houses of the National Legislature, I console myself with the reflection that, if they have not the weight which I attach to them, they can be constitutionally overruled; and with a confidence that, in a contrary event, the wisdom of Congress will hasten to substitute a more commensurate and certain provision for the public exigencies.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, January 30, 1815.

The Message was read, and on motion, by Mr. BIBB,

Ordered, That it be printed for the use of the Senate, and that to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, the Senate will proceed to consider the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America," which has been returned by the President of the United States, with objections.

TUESDAY, January 31.

Bank of the United States—Veto Message.

Agreeably to order, the Senate proceeded to reconsider the bill passed by the two Houses, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America," which was presented for approbation on Monday, the 28d instant, and returned by the President on the 30th instant, with objections.

The PRESIDENT's objections were also again read; and on motion, by Mr. BARBOUR, the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Thursday next.

THURSDAY, February 2.

WILLIAM T. BARRY, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, in the place of George M. Bibb, resigned, and ISHAM TALBOT, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the same State, in the place of Jesse Bledsoe, resigned, respectively, produced their credentials, were qualified, and they took their seats in the Senate.

Bank of the United States—Veto Message.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill, passed by the two Houses, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America," which was presented to the President of the United States for approbation, on the 28d of January, and returned by him on the 30th of the same month, with objections.

And the question being taken, "Shall this bill pass?" was determined in the negative—yeas 15, nays 19, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative, are,

Messrs. Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Tait, and Thompson.

Those who voted in the negative, are,

Messrs. Anderson, Barbour, Barry, Bibb, Chase, Condit, Gaillard, Kerr, Laock, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Talbot, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Wells, and Wharton.

So it was,

Resolved, That this bill do not pass, two-thirds of the Senate not agreeing thereto.

FRIDAY, February 8.

Public Buildings.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making appropriations for repairing or rebuilding the public buildings within the city of Washington.

Mr. FROMENTIN had moved yesterday to recommit the bill to a select committee. On this motion Mr. F. addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: I am called upon to give the reasons which prompted me to make the motion now under consideration. I will endeavor to give to the Senate such an account of my motives as will enable them to judge of the propriety of the reference.

It may, perhaps, not be useless on this occasion to take a retrospective view of the length of time which has elapsed, after the erection of those buildings was determined on, before they could be used for the purposes for which they were intended, and of the sums of money which have been spent upon their construction. We shall be the better able to anticipate the probable time when these buildings may again be occupied by Congress, and to form a correct estimate of the sums of money which we may have to appropriate for those purposes.

Sir, it is more than twenty-three years, if I am correctly informed, since the public edifices, proposed now to be rebuilt, were begun to be erected. None of them, at the time of their destruction by the enemy, were completely finished; and I believe, the south wing of the Capitol was not ready for the reception of the House of Representatives more than four or five years before it was destroyed. If it be found necessary to rebuild, instead of repairing, the other hopeless alternative offered by the bill on your table, you may reasonably expect, taking into consideration the present situation of the country, especially if the war should continue, and thereby the difficulty of procuring materials, and of getting workmen, should be increased, that the two wings of the Capitol may be finished, and ready for the reception of both Houses of Congress, in about ten or twelve years.

The public buildings, including the President's House, did not cost less than fifteen hundred thousand dollars. We are told that five hundred thousand dollars will replace those edifices in statu quo. Sir, notwithstanding my respect for the artists who have given an opinion on this subject, I have still some doubts of the practicability of making use of the walls as they are now standing. The architects themselves are not positive on that point. They gave their opinion before the very severe frost, which we had this winter, had its effect upon those susceptible and unprotected walls. Their opinion, if a new examination was now had, might be materially different; and the committee themselves, by reporting a bill for repairing or rebuilding the public buildings, instead of confining themselves to reporting a bill for repairing, have manifested a doubt, which it cannot be improper for me to entertain. If, then, you should ultimately be compelled to rebuild (and I firmly believe you will) the expense for rebuilding cannot be much less than the original cost of construction. The materials which you may save will about pay the expense of taking down the walls before you can rebuild.

Great, indeed, I should almost say incalculable, must be the advantages presented by this favorite situation, which, under the pressure of our present emergencies, could induce this Congress to sacrifice such immense sums of money. Three principal reasons have been adduced in support of this bill by its friends. The pride of the nation has been appealed to, and pressed into the service of this bill. Sir, when gentlemen entrench themselves behind the inexpugnable bulwark of pride, it would be in vain to use any arguments directed to their sober judgment. As well might you attempt, sword in hand, to pierce the heart of your enemy, protected from your attack by a fortress, flanked with a hundred cannon. The fortress is to be taken first; and I know of no argument strong enough to batter down the fortress erected by pride. There is but one way to come at it, sir; and it is by erecting alongside of it another pride fortress, and then fairly to begin the assault on both sides.

I, too, have my pride—not a pride to be fed upon the unpaid blood of the soldier who wins our battles; not a pride to be gratified by the vain and useless display of a borrowed, ragged magnificence. No, sir; my pride is less voracious, it is less ostentatious. Provide for filling the ranks of your army; provide for clothing, feeding and paying your soldiers and sailors. Instead of borrowing money for building costly edifices, borrow money for protecting against an invading foe the edifices yet standing. Drive the enemy from the country; then, indeed, my pride will be satisfied; then I will, with pleasure, vote money, as much money as you please, for rebuilding our public edifices; and then the more magnificent the plan, the more elegant its execution, the more my pride will be gratified.

It is further said, in support of this bill, that the plan recommended by the bill was the plan of Gen. Washington, and under the sanction of that imposing name an attempt is made to mislead our understanding. True, sir, this was the plan of Washington—but, under what circumstances? Washington was then President of the United States. The country then was rich; the country was prosperous. An extensive, unrestricted, and almost unlimited commerce brought then to the remotest corner of this vast continent all the treasures of a tributary world. The anxious eye of Washington measured the distances, and his capacious mind was not discouraged by them. The rapid, the almost prodigious progress of every improvement under his auspicious Administration, justified, in the opinion of that great and modest man, the anticipated expectations of corresponding improvements under the Administration of his successors. But, sir, what has been the result? Instead of realizing the high expectations of General Washington, from causes which it is foreign to my subject here to investigate, this country once rich, is now poor; this country once prosperous, is now fallen. I hope, sir, it will rise again; but till then, speak not to me of what Washington did. Speak what Washington would now advise; I say advise. The recollection of General Washington's unshakable firmness in the year 1795, forbids the idea of the possibility of his ever having had to act under such an accumulation of distressing circumstances.

When I cast my eyes on this wilderness, dignified with the name of a city; a city to be sure, very unlike the old-fashioned European city, alluded to by the Irishman, who, when placed in the middle of it, complained that he could not see the city, there were so many houses! Sir, we run no risk of hearing of any such complaints about this city. Every Irishman who arrives here may have a full view of the whole ground at once. None of those encumbrances called houses to limit the boundless prospects. Or, if there be a few, he may, among those few, open a complaisant gap through which his inquisitive eye may pierce to a distance, limited only by the foot of the surrounding hills. But, sir, the subject is too serious to admit of its being thus long treated with levity. Let me then return to it, and seriously inquire about the present state and future prospects of this city. What do we see here? Twelve or fifteen clusters of houses at a considerable distance from each other, bringing to our recollection the appearance of a camp of nomad Arabs, which, however, if connected together, would make a very respectable town, not much inferior, perhaps, to the capital of Virginia; and here and there an insulated house; the whole of it, when seen from the ruins of our public edifices, looking more like the place where proud Washington once stood, than where humble Washington now lies. If, sir, such is the situation of this city, after fifteen years since the Government removed here, during the six first years of which period there prevailed not only in this country, but all over Europe, a degree of enthusiasm bordering upon madness respecting the future destinies of this metropolis, and during which period of six years, too, this country enjoyed still the benefits of the Administration of Washington, whose good deeds for several years after his death were still in force—Washington, in his tomb, still securing the prosperity of this his beloved country—if, sir, such be now the situation of this city, what, in the present state of things, are our prospects for the future? Awful, indeed. How many ages must elapse before this chaos is likely to assume any thing like a describable shape? How many, before these disjointed, distracted, warring elements may be brought together, so as to form a whole, which may entitle it to be what it now purports to be, but what it is not. Is it not time, then, that we should give up the unsuccessful experiment? Is it not time that we should adopt less lofty ideas, that we should assume sentiments, that we should express opinions more conformable to our present situation? Troja fuit, fuit Ilium. It becomes us to be modest. Our laws to be wholesome, need not be enacted in a palace. A large, convenient, unadorned house, which will receive its lustre from Congress, instead of Congress borrowing it from the house, in the neighborhood of the public offices, in a part of the city which is best calculated by its actual improvements to afford accommodation to the members, and to facilitate their communications with each other, will answer our purpose much better than the plan recommended by the bill on your table; and if the place to erect those edifices be judiciously selected, it is to me quite immaterial in what quarter of this city. For want of the necessary information as to the quantity of ground still owned by the Government in the different parts of this city, I could not now form any opinion as to the spot where it would be proper to concentrate all our public edifices, whether temporarily or permanently. But I may be allowed to express a wish that it may be found convenient to place them as near as possible to Georgetown, not very distant from the improvements known under the appellation of the Six and Seven Buildings; and I have little doubt but that, when in compliance with the uniform laws of nature, you shall have blown up a soul into this city by creating a heart from which the blood may uninterruptedly circulate to the remotest extremities, the improvements will, by degrees, extend in every direction, until the now most distant parts from that spot, no longer shrivelled, sickly, lingering, rootless slips, destined to vegetate a few mornings, in an uncongenial soil, being in their turn reconnected with a sturdy, robust trunk, from which they will derive an invigorating sap, will soon spread a wide hospitable foliage, and become a flourishing portion of a city, the future prosperity of which cannot now, if it come at all, be secured in any other way.

I am not unaware, sir, that such a plan will call into action against it all the private interests which will conceive themselves to be aggrieved by it. But, let private interests beware. In my opinion, unless some such plan is resorted to, without some such compromise is made, the Government will not, cannot remain here many years. The inconveniences are too serious, and they are not to be surmounted. I speak not of them with reference to the individual inconvenience of the members. I speak of them in reference to their public duties. It is unnecessary to repeat what I before stated, when I had the honor to address you on the subject of this bill. Only reflect on the only mode in which we can transact business in this place. Selected from various places of this immense empire, we meet here, not altogether free from the prejudices which prevail more or less in every part of the country we come from. This social intercourse which ought to prevail, which I am sure should prevail, did we know each other otherwise than through the incorrect medium of party representation, is entirely prohibited by the insuperable obstacles which the present situation of this city puts in our way. To these local prejudices are to be added party spirit, prejudices which pursue us unremittingly, and will not let go their hold of us in this very sanctuary. This party spirit, instead of being softened into something like conciliation, by a constant intercourse, is hardened into unutterable asperity by the mode of life we are compelled, from imperious circumstances, to pursue in this place. The very houses where we board have become a test by which to ascertain the political opinions which we are supposed to profess. We never meet but in battle array. Is it wonderful, that under these discouraging circumstances, so many months should be wasted in transacting business which, under less unfavorable auspices, might have been gone through in as many weeks? Sir, it is my firm conviction, that if we proceed on to passing this bill in its present shape, the question of removal of the seat of the Government from this place, which was advocated at the beginning of this session in the other branch of the Legislature, will soon want no advocate at all; it will soon become a matter of necessity, of sheer necessity. There may be still many unsuccessful attempts, but, sir, the best interests of the nation cannot forever be sacrificed. After some struggling, an attempt will succeed at last; and it will then be too late for the opposers of the plan which I have suggested to give themselves up to unavailing repentance.

Mr. President, I want to prevent such a state of things. I am unwilling to bring forward again, at any time, the question of a permanent seat of Government. I want this sacred spot—sacred still in my eyes, although temporarily polluted by the foot of the enemy, as long as it bears the name of Washington; I want this spot to remain forever the permanent seat of the Government of the United States. But, sir, I know of but two ways to accomplish that object; either by a temporary removal by the very act providing for which we should provide likewise for our return; not provide simply; I do not mean by a clause in the bill to that effect, but by previous appropriations, by contracts, which it should not be in the power of any succeeding Congress to repeal, or by an immediate concentration of the public buildings on a modest, economical, and commodious plan. Of these two modes, I prefer the last, as likely to meet with fewer obstacles, as being much less expensive, but principally as being much more consonant to the principles of the justice which we owe to the people of this district. Sir, when this bill was reported, I inquired from the honorable chairman of the committee who reported it, for the papers relating to the original fixation of the several places for the building of the public edifices. I inquired for the contracts with the original proprietors of the soil, or with the purchasers. I was answered, that there was no such instrument. I shall take no advantage from this concession; in my view of the subject, there was a contract—a solemn contract; and if by any possible way it could be avoided, I would not now agree to altering, in its most inconsiderable dispositions, any part of the original plan. I am sensible, that by so doing, we seem to punish the people of this District for having placed too much confidence in our words. In our words, did I say? In our acts, sir! Look at the new ruins of the monuments on yonder hill. Were these masonry walls, which have set at defiance the whole power of an enemy bent on destruction, intended to last only the short space of a dozen years? In these surviving walls I read, in characters not to be effaced, the contract of the nation with the people of the District. I find in these walls an agreement, signed, sealed, and delivered. Certainly, sir, you must be convinced, from what I have just now said, that I do not dissemble to myself, and that I am not willing to conceal from others, the equity of the claims of the people of this District. But what is to be done? Imperious necessity commands a sacrifice of some sort. A compromise must take place. You have but a choice of evils. The very bill on your table promises a tardy relief to the people on Capitol Hill, at the end of ten or twelve years. Under these impressions, and under the belief too, that the people of the District at large are ultimately to be benefited by a concentration, for the reasons previously advanced, however a few may appear likely to be sufferers by any ultimate determination as to the spot where the concentration is to take place; and under an unshakable persuasion, that by a strict adherence to the old plan, in our present circumstances, as recommended by the bill on your table, the people of this district, by grasping at too much, will ultimately lose all—from motives of economy; from motives of duty to the people of the United States; from motives of indispensable convenience to ourselves to enable us faithfully to discharge our public duties; from motives of justice to the people of this District—I have been induced to make the motion to refer that bill to a committee, for the purpose of reporting another bill to concentrate the public buildings. Sir, I am disposed to sacrifice every thing but my duty to the people of the United States at large, to keep the seat of Government here; and if you agree to concentrate the public buildings, in the hope of speedy improvements, by which many of the inconveniences which now affect the public interest will be removed, I am perfectly reconciled to remaining in this city. But, sir, if we are to remain here as we now are, with no other cheering prospects than those presented in the bill on your table, I do not hesitate to declare, that any place in the United States appears to me preferable to Washington, and the sooner we go, no matter where, no matter how heavy the amount of compensation justly due to the inhabitants of this District, the better.

When Mr. F. had concluded—

The question to recommit the bill to a select committee, was determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Barry, Brown, Dana, Fromentin, German, Gore, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Thompson, and Wells.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anderson, Barbour, Chace, Condit, Daggett, Gaillard, Giles, Goldsborough, Horsey, Kerr, Lacoek, Morrow, Roberts, Smith, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, and Wharton.

And the bill having been amended by striking out the second section thereof, the President reported it to the House accordingly, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed as amended.

MONDAY, February 6.

National Bank—Second Bill.

Mr. BARBOUR, agreeably to notice given, asked leave to introduce a bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America.

This was objected to, by Mr. MASON, as out of order, as a bill of a similar nature, passed by both Houses of Congress, and returned by the President of the United States, with his objections to the same, had, on reconsideration, been negatived by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT decided it to be in order, considering it to be sanctioned by the practice of Congress in relation to bills thus returned by the President of the United States.

Whereupon, the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

[The principal features of this bill are as follows: the capital to consist of fifty millions of dollars, payable, twenty millions in Treasury notes, fundable at the pleasure of the Government in stock to bear an interest of six per cent.; fifteen millions in any public stock bearing six per cent. interest; five millions in specie; and ten millions to be subscribed by the Government in stock bearing an interest of four per cent. per annum; the Government to have the capacity to borrow thirty millions of the bank at six per cent. interest; the directors not to be obliged to pay specie until the last payment on the stock shall be completed; and, upon the petition of the directors, the Government may introduce any regulation which shall be thought proper in regard to the specie payments of the bank; the subscriptions to be open on the first Monday in April, at which time the first payment of one-fifth of the whole amount of subscription shall be payable, and the remaining four-fifths in four quarter-yearly instalments; the bank to go into operation as soon as twenty millions are thus paid in. The directors for the first year are named in the bill.]

FRIDAY, February 10.

Bank of the United States—Second Bill.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America.

And the bill having been amended, the President resumed the Chair, and Mr. ANDERSON reported the bill to the House accordingly; and the amendments made in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

On the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Barbour, Barry, Bibb, Chace, Condit, Howell, Kerr, Lacoek, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Talbot, Tait, Turner, Varnum, and Wharton.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Thompson, and Wells.

MONDAY, February 13.

Defence of New Orleans.

Mr. GILES, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the following resolutions, which were read and passed to the second reading:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress be, and they are hereby, given to Major General Jackson, and through him to the officers and soldiers of the regular army, of the militia, and the volunteers, under his immediate command, for their uniform gallantry and good conduct, conspicuously displayed against the enemy from the time of his landing before New Orleans, until his final expulsion therefrom; and particularly for their distinguished gallantry, skill, and good conduct, on the 8th of January last, in repulsing, with great slaughter, a numerous British army of chosen veteran troops, when attempting, by a bold and daring attack, to storm and carry the works hastily thrown up for the defence of New Orleans, and by obtaining a most signal and complete victory over the enemy, with a disparity of loss, on his part, unexampled in military annals.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be struck a gold medal, with devices emblematical of this splendid achievement, and presented to Major General Jackson, as a testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of the judicious and distinguished part he acted on this glorious and memorable occasion.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the foregoing resolutions to be communicated to Major General Jackson, in such terms as he may deem best calculated to give effect to the objects thereof.

Mr. GILES, from the same committee, also reported the following resolutions, which were read and passed to the second reading:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Congress entertains a high sense of the patriotism, fidelity, zeal, and courage, with which the people of Louisiana promptly and unanimously stepped forth, under circumstances of imminent danger from a powerful invading army, in defence of all the individual, social, and political rights held dear by man. Congress declare and proclaim, that the brave Louisianians deserve well of the whole people of the United States.

Resolved, That Congress entertain a high sense of the generosity, benevolence, and humanity displayed by the people of New Orleans, in voluntarily affording the best accommodations in their power, and giving the kindest attentions to the wounded, not only of our own army, but also to the wounded prisoners of a fallen though vindictive foe.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the foregoing resolutions to be communicated to his Excellency the Governor of Louisiana, accompanied with the request that he cause the greatest possible publicity to be given to them for the information of the whole people of Louisiana.

Honors to Commodore Patterson and Major Carmick.

Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the following resolutions, which were read and passed to a second reading:

Resolved, That Congress entertain a high sense of the valor and good conduct of Commodore D. T. Patterson, of the officers, petty officers, and seamen, attached to his command, for their prompt and efficient co-operation with General Jackson in the late gallant and successful defence of the city of New Orleans, when assailed by a powerful British force.

Resolved, That Congress entertain a high sense of the valor and good conduct of Major Daniel Carmick, of the officers, non-commissioned officers, and marines under his command, in the defence of the said city, on the late memorable occasion.

TUESDAY, February 14.

The resolutions expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Jackson, and the troops under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the defence of New Orleans, were read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and amended; and the President reported them to the House accordingly.

On the question, "Shall these resolutions be engrossed and read a third time as amended?" It was determined in the affirmative.

The resolutions expressive of the high sense entertained by Congress of the patriotism and good conduct of the people of Louisiana and New Orleans, during the late military operations before that city, were read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and, having been amended, the President reported them to the House accordingly.

On the question, "Shall these resolutions be engrossed and read a third time as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative.

The resolutions expressive of the high sense entertained by Congress of the gallantry and good conduct of Commodore D. T. Patterson, Major D. Carmick, and of the officers, seamen, and marines under their command, in the defence of New Orleans, were read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and, no amendment having been proposed, on the question, "Shall these resolutions be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative.

WEDNESDAY, February 15.

Defence of New Orleans.

The resolutions expressive of the high sense entertained by Congress of the patriotism and good conduct of the people of Louisiana and of New Orleans, during the late military operations before that city, having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, were read a third time as amended, and having been further amended by unanimous consent, passed unanimously, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Congress entertain a high sense of the patriotism, fidelity, zeal, and courage, with which the people of the State of Louisiana promptly and unanimously stepped forth, under circumstances of imminent danger, from a powerful and invading army, in defence of all the individual, social, and political rights, held dear by man. Congress declare and proclaim, that the brave Louisianians deserve well of the whole people of the United States.

Resolved, That Congress entertain a high sense of the generosity, benevolence, and humanity, displayed by the people of New Orleans, in voluntarily affording the best accommodations in their power, and giving the kindest attentions to the wounded, not only of our own army, but also to the wounded prisoners of a vanquished foe.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the foregoing resolutions to be communicated to his Excellency the Governor of Louisiana, accompanied with a request that he cause the greatest possible publicity to be given to them for the information of the whole people of Louisiana.

The resolutions expressive of the high sense entertained by Congress of the gallantry and good conduct of Commodore D. T. Patterson and Major D. Carmick, and of the officers, seamen, and marines under their command, in the defence of New Orleans, having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, were read a third time, and passed unanimously.

The resolutions expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Jackson, and the troops under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the defence of New Orleans, having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, were read a third time as amended, and passed unanimously, as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress be, and they are hereby, given to Major General Jackson, and, through him, to the officers and soldiers of the regular army, of the militia, and of the volunteers under his immediate command, and to the officers and soldiers charged with the defence of Fort St. Philip, for their uniform gallantry and good conduct, conspicuously displayed against the enemy, from the time of his landing before New Orleans until his final expulsion from the State of Louisiana, and particularly for their valor, skill, and good conduct, on the 8th of January last, in repulsing, with great slaughter, a numerous British army of chosen veteran troops, when attempting, by a bold and daring attack, to storm and carry the works hastily thrown up for the defence of New Orleans, and thereby obtaining a most signal and complete victory over the enemy, with a disparity of loss on his part unexampled in military annals.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be struck a gold medal, with devices emblematical of this splendid achievement, and presented to Major General Jackson, as a testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress, of his judicious and distinguished conduct on that memorable occasion.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the foregoing resolutions to be communicated to Major General Jackson, in such terms as he may deem best calculated to give effect to the objects thereof.

When the above resolutions were under consideration, Mr. Brown, of Louisiana, addressed the Chair, as follows:

Mr. President: Having the honor to represent the State which has been the theatre of the events which it is the object of these resolutions to commemorate, it might be considered an evidence of great insensibility on my part, did I not rise for the purpose of expressing my most hearty approbation of them.

The reflecting mind, in reviewing the eventful measures by which the people of Louisiana have been conducted from a position of extreme peril to a state of perfect security, is irresistibly led to acknowledge the protecting hand of an all-wise and beneficent Providence, whose dispensations it is our duty, in grateful humility, to reverse.

The richest reward which a nation can bestow on its distinguished benefactors, is to be found in the unanimous expression of a nation's gratitude. On no occasion has the united voice of national feeling been more distinctly heard, than on that which is the subject of our present deliberations. The measures adopted by General Jackson for the protection of Louisiana, and their happy results, have been succinctly detailed in his own simple, perspicuous, and modest narrative. It is not now necessary to recapitulate the facts. It is enough that we fix our admiring eyes on their fortunate results. If to disconcert the gigantic plans of the enemy—to disappoint his extravagant expectations—to humble his pride—to destroy a part of his hitherto invincible army—to expel them from our soil, and save a State to the Union, and to accomplish all with a comparative loss unexampled in military annals, can entitle a brave general and a gallant army to the thanks of a generous people, then are General Jackson and his followers entitled to the wreath prepared for them by these resolutions. I shall not follow the deliverer of Louisiana through the blaze of battle and the shouts of victory; I am not so weak as to believe that my feeble voice can add lustre to deeds like his—"to deeds without a name." The tears of admiration and gratitude which moisten every eye whilst surveying scenes like these, admonish me, that it is best to indulge in the silent sentiment of unutterable joy.

The army of General Jackson was principally composed of militia corps, a species of force hitherto not considered as the most efficient, which had been hastily collected from the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, and the Mississippi Territory. It is equally honorable to these soldiers, and to their commander, that no jealousies or dissensions disturbed the harmony of their camp, and that all united in facing the foe with a courage, an energy, and enthusiasm, rarely witnessed in an army of veteran troops. All were animated by the same soul, and the only contest which existed among them was, who should be foremost in the hour of danger.

The citizens of Kentucky, since the commencement of our present struggle, have obtained a character so elevated for patriotism and devotion to the best interests of their country, that it can receive no additional lustre from any expressions I can employ. The State of Tennessee has exalted claims to the approbation of the nation. To that State we are indebted for the safety of our country when threatened by our savage neighbors, and the part which her citizens have acted on the late ever memorable occasion, will afford to their latest posterity a rich repast in the page of impartial history. One-third of the militia of the State, having no exposed frontier to protect, and threatened by no immediate danger, cheerfully left their friends and their families and flew to the assistance of Louisiana. Generous people! on behalf of those you have succeeded in the hour of peril, I thank you—from my heart I thank you!

Reflect, Mr. President, on the rapid march of General Coffee and his volunteers to Mobile, to Pensacola, to New Orleans, a distance of more than one thousand miles. Consider the difficulties of the route, and you will admire the perseverance of the commander, and the patience and discipline of his troops, as much as you will applaud the undaunted bravery they displayed on the memorable 8th of January. See the brave and indefatigable Carroll descending the Mississippi with an army of three thousand men, and accomplishing his voyage in a space of time considered too short to enable the greedy speculator, in search of a market, to conduct a single ark to the same point of destination. It is to such men, and to such exertions as these, that Louisiana is indebted for her safety, and so long as gratitude shall be considered a virtue, shall these brave men be held in grateful remembrance.

On so much of these resolutions, and other resolutions now under consideration, as relate to the militia and people of Louisiana, it would not, perhaps, become me to enlarge. Attached, as I feel myself, to the generous people of that State, by the recollection of a thousand proofs they have given me of their kindness and confidence, I could not profess to be their impartial eulogist. That their conduct on the late trying emergency has been such, as not only to fulfil the predictions of their friends, and efface the unfavorable prejudices of those who until now were strangers to their true character, but also to receive the approbation of the nation, is to me a source of inexpressible pleasure.

Mr. President, I fondly hope that the dawn of peace is about to break upon our beloved country. Cheered by its benignant rays we look into futurity, and calculate the influence which the recent events at New Orleans may have upon the destinies of this nation. To foreign powers, the lesson taught by them will be full of instruction. From the fate of a powerful army invading a portion of our country, hitherto considered the most assailable, they will learn that freemen, impressed with a sense of the value of their rights, and armed in defence of their own soil, are invincible. At home, the effects of these brilliant achievements will be salutary and beneficent. Should the inhabitants of any portion of this Union, from incorrect sources of information, have received impressions unfriendly to the character of the people of Louisiana, let them reflect on the events of the 8th of January, and those impressions will be completely obliterated. The ties of interest and of affection, which have long attached the Western States to Louisiana, have now become indissoluble. The purple stream of their best blood has united and mingled in the same channel, and has at once cemented their union and that of their country.

Mr. FROMENTIN, of Louisiana, addressed the Chair, as follows:

Mr. President: The resolutions now under consideration seem to call for a few remarks from those who have the honor to represent on this floor the country upon whose inhabitants the mark of signal favor contemplated by the resolutions is now proposed to be conferred. It would ill become me on this occasion to affect a vain modesty, equally injurious to the virtues which have deserved, and to the generous discernment which is going to bestow approbation.

Mr. President, we have often been called upon, since the beginning of this war, to give thanks to the intrepidity of our military leaders, and the undaunted bravery of their troops. We have just now, by a unanimous vote, awarded the same tribute to Jackson and to his followers. To Jackson—this name henceforth wants none of the meretricious epithets of courtesy—to Jackson, whose laurels on the ever-memorable 8th of January will adorn the fairest page of American military history:—to Jackson, whose unheard-of achievements, having no precedents in the past, seem to bid defiance to the future. Through this beloved General we gave the same unanimous thanks to his followers. I will not, sir, give them the surname of invincibles; be it enough for their glory, that they have proved to the world that if, until they landed in Louisiana, the soldiers of Lord Wellington had been unconquered, they were not unconquerable.

Sir, with heartfelt gratitude I joined in the vote just given in honor of those valiant men. Let us now pass from the review of the brilliant and exterminating virtues exhibited on the field of battle, to the contemplation of the modest and saving virtues exhibited in the city of New Orleans.

So far had the campaign in Florida been prolonged beyond the time contemplated at its beginning, that winter was threatening, before the Tennessee militia, under General Coffee, hastily collected for a summer expedition, were disbanded, to be recalled again under the banners of their country before they had reached their homes, in order to defend a distant State against the invasion of an enemy more numerous and more formidable than the enemy they had subdued. So ardent and so anxious was the zeal of our Tennessee and Kentucky brethren, headed by Carroll, Thomas, and Adair, that, regardless of the inclemencies of the approaching season, they listened to no voice but the voice of their invaded country; they were sensible of no want, but the want of meeting the enemy.

Already had the Mississippi received the brave, who were destined to add such a celebrity to its fame; already had its rapid current brought them within a short distance of the spot polluted with the foot of an invading foe; when a more terrible enemy than the one they were ready to encounter had nearly overcome them.

Frost, threatened in his long enjoyed empire over the Northern Lakes of America, made an effort in December last to establish his empire over the mouth as it has usurped it over the head of the Mississippi.* Not far from the tropics the ruthless invader shook his icy bristles; for a few days the mouths of our creeks were sealed up by the tyrant; but assistance was at hand from above. This winter, Mr. President, was fertile with prodigies. A genial sun had arisen in the West, whose powerful and revivifying rays soon expelled the monster, and compelled him to fly back to his uncontrolled patrimonial haunts in the caverns of the Lakes, and in the recesses of the wildernesses of Canada—a forerunner, Mr. President, of the fate which in a few days was to befall his co-invader and British ally. Have

* It is a fact, not less true than extraordinary, that, on the 28d December last, when the St. Lawrence and the Northern Lakes were quite free from ice, the Bayou St. John, behind the city of New Orleans, was frozen over.

Treaty of Peace.

[SENATE.]

I, Mr. President, in attempting to give you an idea of a natural phenomenon in Louisiana, given you a true picture of the real scenes which, in the mean time, were acting on that interesting theatre?

Yet, during the temporary reign of the tyrant, our soldiers, for the reasons above stated, unprepared to withstand his attacks, were suffering severely. Are those brave men who have sacrificed every thing to run to the relief of their distant friends, to be doomed to fall a victim to their own generosity? Forbid it humanity, forbid it patriotism, forbid it gratitude!

I wish, Mr. President, I had it in my power to delineate with proper colors the interesting spectacle which New Orleans exhibited in those distressing days. Not a man unengaged in repelling the enemy, not a woman not affording the most zealous assistance and co-operation in preparing clothing and every other necessary comfort for their protectors! Accompany me, Mr. President, within those walls, a few days ago the asylum of hundreds of young females, taught by the precepts and by the examples of their pious and respectable mistresses all the virtues and all the accomplishments, which are soon to be the ornaments of society. How changed is the scene! Those grates, never before opened but to Religion, are now thrown open for the reception of suffering, of bleeding humanity! Under the pious direction of their respectable religious chief, the nunnery of New Orleans is converted into a hospital for our sick and wounded! The holy flame spreads with rapidity! Every soldier in a distant land has found a brother! Every sick individual has found a family!

Mr. President, I rejoice that the resolution reported by the honorable Chairman of the Military Committee embraces the cases I have briefly alluded to. Sir, valor is the natural growth of every clime of this extensive empire. Even in the very few actions during this war in which victory did not perch on our banners, as evinced by a late celebrated case connected with the capture of this city, scrutinizing justice has pronounced that examples of conspicuous individual bravery have not been wanting. I shall always be proud of the opportunity afforded to pay to courage the just tribute due to it by a grateful people. But when it is right thus to encourage valor, can it be wrong to encourage humanity? Valor, Humanity—Inseparable sisters! The first has delivered our country from an invading foe—the second has healed the wounds of a bleeding friend, and of a bleeding enemy—since no longer with arms in their hands, to be treated as a friend. Both united will continue to secure to our arms the favor of an avenging and merciful God, and will wrest from a vanquished enemy, and obtain from an admiring world, the applause due to a conqueror terrible in battle—in victory merciful.

Treaty of Peace.

The following Message was received from the
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House ofRepresentatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress copies of the Treaty of Peace and Amity between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, which was signed by the commissioners of both parties at Ghent, on the 24th of December, 1814, and the ratifications of which have been duly exchanged.

While performing this act, I congratulate you, and our constituents, upon an event which is highly honorable to the nation, and terminates with peculiar felicity, a campaign signalized by the most brilliant successes.

The late war, although reluctantly declared by Congress, had become a necessary resort to assert the rights and independence of the nation. It has been waged with a success which is the natural result of the wisdom of the Legislative councils, of the patriotism of the people, of the public spirit of the militia, and of the valor of the military and naval forces of the country. Peace, at all times a blessing, is peculiarly welcome, therefore, at a period when the causes for the war have ceased to operate; when the government has demonstrated the efficiency of its powers of defence; and when the nation can review its conduct without regret and without reproach.

I recommend to your care and beneficence the gallant men whose achievements, in every department of the military service, on the land and on the water, have so essentially contributed to the honor of the American name, and to the restoration of peace. The feelings of conscious patriotism and worth will animate such men under every change of fortune and pursuit; but their country performs a duty to itself, when it bestows those testimonials of approbation and applause which are at once the reward and the incentive to great actions.

The reduction of the public expenditures to the demands of a peace establishment will doubtless engage the immediate attention of Congress. There are, however, important considerations which forbid a sudden and general revocation of the measures that have been produced by the war. Experience has taught us that neither the pacific dispositions of the American people, nor the pacific character of their political institutions, can altogether exempt them from that strife which appears, beyond the ordinary lot of nations, to be incident to the actual period of the world; and the same faithful monitor demonstrates that a certain degree of preparation for war is not only indispensable to avert disasters in the onset, but affords also the best security for the continuance of peace. The wisdom of Congress will, therefore, I am confident, provide for the maintenance of an adequate regular force; for the gradual advancement of the Naval Establishment; for improving all the means of harbor defence; for adding discipline to the distinguished bravery of the militia; and for cultivating the military art, in its essential branches, under the liberal patronage of government.

The resources of our country were, at all times, competent to the attainment of every national object; but they will now be enriched and invigorated by the activity which peace will introduce into all the scenes of domestic enterprise and labor. The provision that has been made for the public creditors, during the present session of Congress, must have a decisive effect in the establishment of the public credit, both at home and abroad. The reviving interests of commerce will claim the legislative attention at the earliest opportunity; and such regulations will, I trust, be seasonably devised as shall secure to the United States their just proportion of the navigation of the world. The most liberal policy towards other nations, if met by corresponding dispositions, will, in this respect, be found the most beneficial policy towards ourselves. But there is no subject that can enter with greater force and merit into the deliberations of Congress, than a consideration of the means to preserve and promote the manufactures which have sprung into existence, and attained an unparalleled maturity throughout the United States during the period of the European wars. This source of national independence and wealth, I anxiously recommend, therefore, to the prompt and constant guardianship of Congress.

The termination of the legislative sessions will soon separate you, fellow-citizens, from each other, and restore you to your constituents. I pray you to bear with you the expressions of my sanguine hope, that the peace which has been just declared will not only be the foundation of the most friendly intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, but that it will also be productive of happiness and harmony in every section of our beloved country. The influence of your precepts and example must be every where powerful: and while we accord in grateful acknowledgments for the protection which Providence has bestowed upon us, let us never cease to inculcate obedience to the laws and fidelity to the Union, as constituting the palladium of the national independence and prosperity.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, February 18, 1815.

The Message was read, and five hundred copies thereof, together with five hundred copies of the treaty therein referred to, were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, February 22.

Presidential Message—Navigation of American Vessels exclusively by American Citizens, Native, or already Naturalized.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Peace having happily taken place between the United States and Great Britain, it is desirable to guard against accidents, which, during periods of war in Europe, might tend to interrupt it; and it is believed, in particular, that the navigation of American vessels exclusively by American seamen, either natives or such as are already naturalized, would not only conduce to the attainment of that object, but also to increase the number of our seamen, and consequently, to render our commerce and navigation independent of the service of foreigners, who might be recalled by their Governments, under circumstances the most inconvenient to the United States. I recommend the subject, therefore, to the consideration of Congress, and, in deciding upon it, I am persuaded that they will sufficiently estimate the policy of manifesting to the world a desire, on all occasions, to cultivate harmony with other nations, by any reasonable accommodations which do not impair the enjoyment of any essential rights of a free and independent people. The example on the part of the American Government will merit, and may be expected to receive, a reciprocal attention from all the friendly powers of Europe.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25, 1815.

The Message was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

WEDNESDAY, March 1.

Reward to Tobias Simpson, a Colored Man, Messenger to the Senate.

Mr. LACOCK submitted the following resolution, which was read, and passed to the second reading:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Tobias Simpson, two hundred dollars, in consideration of his uniform good conduct, and particularly for his exertions to save the public property in the Capital both before and after the destruction thereof by the enemy.

The resolution last mentioned was read the second time, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been proposed thereto, on the question, "Shall this resolution be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative; and the resolution was then read a third time by unanimous consent, and passed.

Sale of Captured Negroes.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report from the acting Secretary of State, complying with their resolution of the 24th of October last. JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, February 28, 1815.

The Message and report therein referred to were read, and ordered to be printed.

The report is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 28, 1815.

The undersigned, acting as Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate of the 24th of October last, requesting the President of the United States to lay before the Senate, (provided he shall not consider the same improper to be communicated,) the proof of any traffic carried on in the West Indies, by the sale of negroes taken from the United States, by the British forces since the present war, has the honor to state, that such proof was transmitted to the Executive by the Hon. St. George Tucker, in the form of an affidavit of Captain Williams, from which it appeared that he had been a prisoner in the Bahama islands, and that while there, he had been present at the sale of negroes taken from the vicinity of Norfolk and Hampton. This affidavit, voluntarily given, and strengthened and corroborated by a variety of circumstances, was considered at the time as full proof of the fact, and was transmitted to our Ministers at Ghent. When the resolution of the Senate was transmitted to this Department, application was made to Judge Tucker, and subsequently to Major Griffin, for the original affidavit, or for an authenticated copy; as neither have yet been received, and as it is deemed improper longer to delay this report, the undersigned begs leave to refer to the accompanying papers, marked 1, 2, 3, and 4, from which the material facts stated in the affidavit may be collected, and the circumstances which have prevented its transmission to this Department explained. This subject will be further investigated with a view to place it, in all its circumstances, in the most satisfactory light.

All which is respectfully submitted,

JAS. MONROE.

RICHMOND, November 24, 1814.

SIR: I do myself the honor to enclose you a letter from my friend, Mr. Cabell, and one from Mr. John Tabb Smith, the magistrate before whom the affidavit was made, a copy of which I transmitted to the President. Mr. Campbell has written to Major Griffin to endeavor to procure the original, and if he should fortunately obtain it, I will lose no time in forwarding it to you.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

ST. G. TUCKER.

No. 2.

Copy of a letter from Joseph C. Cabell, Esq., to the Hon. St. George Tucker, dated.

RICHMOND, Nov. 22, 1814.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received your favor of the 14th instant, embracing an extract from the letter recently written to you by Mr. Graham, of the Department of State, on the subject of the resolution of the Senate of the United States, of the 24th ultimo.

I distinctly recollect all the material circumstances in regard to the copy of the affidavit, which you forwarded to the President. About the period that Major Thomas Griffin, of York, went on board the British squadron in Lynnhaven Bay, for the purpose of endeavoring to recover his negroes, who had gone off to the enemy, I happened to be in Williamsburg. The destination of the slaves that had been taken or received by the British, was then a subject of curiosity and concern throughout the lower country. I understood that a seafaring man, of the name of Williams, who had been a prisoner with the enemy, and had recently arrived at Hampton, had gone in company with Major Thomas Griffin, of York, before John Tabb Smith, a respectable magistrate of the county of Elizabeth City, and had made oath that, while a prisoner on one of the Bahama islands, he had been present at the sale of the negroes that had been carried off from the vicinity of Hampton and Norfolk; that the negroes were sold at a high price, and that a negro carpenter from Norfolk was purchased for a thousand dollars. Several gentlemen of the first respectability, who had conversed with Major Griffin, informed me that he spoke of Williams as a man whose appearance entitled him to credit, and that he had, accordingly, published the affidavit in the town of York. Through the medium of Mr. Coke, of Williamsburg, I procured a copy of this paper, which I handed to you, and was forwarded by you to the President. This affidavit was a subject of general conversation about that time. The circumstances under which Williams arrived at Hampton; the manner in which he described the negroes sold in the Bahamas, and particularly the carpenter from Norfolk, and the appearance of entire sincerity in his narrative, left no doubt, I was assured, on the mind of either Mr. Smith or Major Griffin, that the alleged sale had actually taken place. I did not see Major Griffin, nor did I inquire what he intended to do with the original affidavit of Williams; my conjecture was, that he would send it on to the committee of Congress, charged with the business of collecting proofs of the barbarous conduct of the war by the enemy. As it seems he has not done so, I presume it remains in his possession. I will write immediately to him, with the view of ascertaining whether this be the fact; and, if it be, to request the favor of him to enclose me the affidavit. The result of my inquiries of that gentleman shall be made known to you without delay.

In the interim, I remain most respectfully and sincerely, yours, &c.,

JOSEPH C. CABELL.

No. 3.

Copy of a letter from John Tabb Smith, Esq., to Judge Tucker, dated HAMPTON, Nov. 21, 1814.

SIR: Your favor I have now before me. Some time in the year 1813, there came before me a Captain Williams (I think his name was) in company with Major Thomas Griffin, of York, with the affidavit you speak of in your letter, which he swore to before me, and I gave my certificate thereto; I then gave the affidavit to Major Griffin, and expected to see it published in one of the Richmond papers, but never heard of it since; but from your letter, I expect the original can be got from Major Griffin. But, if it is mislaid, I well recollect the substance of the affidavit, and will render you any service in my power.

I am, with respect,

JOHN TABB SMITH.

If it can be got from Major Griffin, it had better be in the Captain's own words, with my certificate.

YORK, (VA.) February 16, 1815.

SIR: Your favor of the 6th instant has been received. I have examined my papers and cannot find the original affidavit of Captain Williams, therein alluded to. The copy I gave Mr. Cabell was literally correct; the original has been mislaid, or I fear lost in the bustle of moving papers from hence so frequently as has been done, to place them without the reach of the enemy during the war. I will again examine and endeavor to recover the affidavit, and will forward the same to the Department of State as soon as it shall be recovered.

Very respectfully, I am, sir, your obedient servant,
THOMAS GRIFFIN.

Sketch of Plunder, by Admiral Cockburn and his officers, on St. Simon's Island, during his late visit there.

[From the Savannah Republican.]

Major Butler—Two hundred negroes; ten bales of cotton; a quantity of seed cotton; his iron, new and old; leather, tanned and half tanned; stock of wine, liquors, soap, candles, and poultry; plate, and stock-buckle, stolen by an officer named Horton.

John Couper—Eighty negroes, forty-eight of them prime fellows, some of them tradesmen; ten bales of cotton.

Dr. Grant—One negro woman; four bales cotton; all his furniture destroyed; gins spoiled in trying to gin cotton.

A. C. Wylly—Forty-six of the primest of his negroes; no cotton.

J. H. Geckoe—Eleven negroes; a pair of razors, and part of a barrel of flour, stolen by Lieutenant De Thierry.

W. McIntosh—Five negroes; twelve bales ginned, and some unginned cotton.

James Hamilton—One hundred and eighty-two negroes; only one old man left on his place, and he mad; twenty-five bales cotton—about eighteen ginned by themselves; all his plantation stores, medicines, tools, paint pots, old iron, and gin boxes; some hand-saw files, pocketed by the Commander-in-chief, Ramsay; carpet, library, and a pair of pistols, stolen by Cole, who commanded the land forces; a beautiful fowling piece stolen by Horton, the same officer who stole Major Butler's spoons and stock-buckle.

E. Matthews—Twenty-six negroes; seven bales cotton.

Mrs. Brailsford—House broken open, and robbed by a boat's crew under command of a Lieutenant Grant—some of Mrs. Brailsford's and Mrs. Troup's clothes were bought for ten dollars from the thieves by Lieutenant Locke, commanding His Britannic Majesty's brig Manly.

Mr. Abbott—Although they made headquarters of his house and lived on him only now and then, bringing in some plundered mutton, poultry, flour, and liquor, lost the contents of his store, and had the quicksilver scraped from the back of all the broken looking glasses in the house.

In Secret Session.

The bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act for the protection of the commerce of the United States against the Algerine cruisers," was read the third time.

On the question, "Shall this bill pass?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 2, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Barry, Bibb, Brown, Chace, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, Giles, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, Kerr, King, Lacock, Morrow, Robinson, Smith, Talbot, Tait, Taylor, Thompson, Turner, Varnum, Wells, and Wharton.

NAYS.—Messrs. Goldsborough and Lambert.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to notify the House of Representatives, confidentially, that the Senate have passed the said bill.

Ordered, That Messrs. FROMENTIN and GOLDSBOROUGH be the committee.

FRIDAY, March 8.

Retaliating System.

Mr. BIBB, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, of the 26th of September last, respecting the unauthorized mode of warfare adopted by the enemy, on the plea of retaliation, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

The report of the committee is as follows:

That, although the war has happily terminated, they deem it important to rescue the American Government from unworthy imputations, with which it has been assailed during its progress. They have, therefore, endeavored to ascertain, whether the destruction of York, in Upper Canada, and the other cases assumed by our late enemy, as authorizing a departure from the settled rules of civilized warfare, were of a character to justify or extenuate their conduct.

The result of the inquiries of the committee, manifesting to the world that the plea which has been advanced for the destruction of the American Capitol, and the plunder of private property, is without foundation, will be found in the communications of the Secretaries of the Departments of War and Navy, and of General Dearborn, commander of the American forces, in the attack on York, herewith submitted.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 28, 1815.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter, requesting, on behalf of the Committee of Foreign Relations, any information which this Department possesses, relative to the misconduct that has been imputed to the American troops in Upper Canada during the late war, and in reply, I have the honor to state, that the charges appear to be confined to three: 1st, the alleged burning of York; 2d, the burning of Newark; and 3d, the burning of the Indian villages, usually called the Moravian towns.

1st. The burning of York, or of any of its public edifices, or of any of its private houses, has never been presented to the view of the American Government by its own officers, as matter of information; and it never was exhibited by the British Government, or any of its officers, as matter of complaint, until it was asserted in the address of the Governor in Chief to the Provincial Parliament of Canada, on the 24th of January, 1815, "that, as a just retribution, the proud Capitol at Washington has experienced a similar fate to that inflicted by an American force on the Seat of Government in Upper Canada." This assertion having led to an inquiry, I am enabled, from official documents and general information, to state the following facts of the case, for the information of the committee:

The town of York in Upper Canada was taken by the American Army, under the command of General Dearborn, on the 27th of April, 1813, and it was evacuated on the succeeding 1st of May; although it was again visited for a day, by an American squadron, under the command of Commodore Chauncey, on the 4th of August. At the time of the capture, the British troops on their retreat set fire to their magazine, and great injury was done by the explosion to property, as well as to persons within the range of its effects. At the time of the capture, as well as at the time of Commodore Chauncey's visit, the public stores were seized, and the public storehouses were destroyed; but the destruction of public edifices for civil uses, or of private property, was not only unauthorized, but, positively forbidden, by the American commanders; and it is understood that no private house was destroyed by the American troops. It has recently, however, appeared, that a public building of little value, called the Parliament House, (not the Government House,) in which it is said that an American scalp was found as a part of the decoration of the Speaker's Chair, had been burnt; whether it was so, and if it was, whether it was an accidental consequence of the confusion, in which the explosion of the magazine involved the town, or the unauthorized act of some exasperated individual, has not been ascertained. The silence of the military and civil officers of the Provincial Government of Canada seems to indicate that the transaction was not deemed, when it occurred, a cause either for retaliation or reproach.

2d. The burning of Newark, adjacent to Fort George, occurred on the 10th of December, 1813. The act was vindicated by the American General, as necessary to his military operations; but as soon as the American Government heard of it, instructions, dated the 6th of January, 1814, were given by the Department of War, to Major General Wilkinson, "to disavow the conduct of the officer who committed it, and to transmit to Governor Prevost a copy of the order under color of which that officer had acted." This disavowal was accordingly communicated, and on the 10th of February, 1814, Governor Prevost answered, "that it had been with great satisfaction he had received the assurance that the perpetration of the burning of the town of Newark was both unauthorized by the American Government and abhorrent to every American feeling; that if any outrages had ensued the wanton and unjustifiable destruction of Newark, passing the bounds of just retaliation, they were to be attributed to the influence of irritated passions, on the part of the unfortunate sufferers by that event, which, in a state of active warfare, it had not been possible altogether to restrain, and that it was as little congenial to the disposition of his Majesty's Government, as it was to that of the Government of the United States, deliberately to adopt any plan of policy which had for its object the devastation of private property."

But the disavowal of the American Government was not the only expiation of the unauthorized offence committed by its officer; for the British Government undertook itself to redress the wrong. A few days after the burning of Newark, the British and Indian troops crossed the Niagara for this purpose; they surprised and seized Fort Niagara; they burnt the villages of Lewistown, Manchester, Tuscarora, Buffalo, and Black Rock, desolating the whole of the Niagara frontier, and dispersing the inhabitants, in the extremity of the winter. Sir George Prevost himself appears to have been satisfied with the vengeance that had been inflicted; and, in his proclamation of the 13th of January, 1814, he expressly declared, that for the burning of Newark, "the opportunity of punishment had occurred; that a full measure of retaliation had taken place, and that it was not his intention to pursue further a system of warfare so revolting to his own feelings, and so little congenial to the British character, unless the future measures of the enemy should compel him again to resort to it." With his answer to Major General Wilkinson, which has been already noticed, he transmitted a copy of the proclamation, "as expressive of the determination as to his future line of conduct," and added, "that he was happy to learn that there was no probability that any measures, on the part of the American Government, would oblige him to depart from it."

8d. The places usually called the Moravian towns, were mere collections of Indian huts and cabins, on the river Retrench or Thames, not probably worth, in the whole, one thousand dollars. The Indians who inhabited them, among whom were some notoriously hostile to the United States, had made incursions the most cruel into their territory. When, therefore, the American Army under General Harrison invaded Canada, on the — of — 1813, the huts and cabins of the hostile Indians were destroyed. But this species of warfare has been invariably pursued, by every nation engaged in war with the Indians of the American continent. However it may be regretted on the score of humanity, it appears to be the necessary means of averting the still greater calamities of savage hostilities; and it is believed that the occurrence would never have been made the subject of a charge against the American troops, if the fact had not been misrepresented or misunderstood. Many people at home, and most people abroad, have been led to suppose that the Moravian towns were the peaceable settlements of a religious sect of Christians, and not the abode of a hostile tribe of savages. I have the honor to be, &c.,

JAMES MONROE.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 18, 1815.

SIR: In compliance with the request of the committee of the Senate, communicated to me by your note of the 14th current, I have the honor to transmit to you, herewith, extracts from the letters of Commodore Chauncey to the Secretary of the Navy, on the subject of destroying the public store-houses and stores at York, in Upper Canada, and which is all the information in this Department on that subject.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant, Extract of a letter from Commodore Isaac Chauncey to the Secretary of the Navy, dated off York, U. C., April 20, 1813.

"The enemy set fire to some of his principal stores, containing large quantities of naval and military stores, as well as a large ship upon the stocks, nearly finished."

From the same to the same, dated off Niagara, August 4, 1813.

"In the evening of the 30th ultimo, we weighed and stood for York, arrived and anchored in that harbor at about 8 P. M.; on the 31st ran the schooners into the upper harbor, landed the marines and soldiers under the command of Colonel Scott, without opposition; found several hundred barrels of flour and provisions in the public store-houses, five pieces of cannon, eleven boats, and a quantity of shot, shells, and other stores; all of which was either destroyed or brought away. On the first instant, after having received on board all that the vessels could take, I directed the barracks and the public store-houses to be burned. We then re-embarked the men, and proceeded to this place, where I arrived yesterday."

Letter from Gen. Henry Dearborn to the Honorable Joseph B. Varnum, a member of the Senate.

Boston, October 17, 1814.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of the 11th instant, I assure you, in the most explicit manner, that no public or private buildings were burned or destroyed by the troops under my command, at York, in Upper Canada, excepting two block-houses, and one or two sheds belonging to the Navy Yard. I placed a strong guard in the town, with positive orders to prevent any plunder or depredation on the inhabitants; and, when leaving the place, a letter was received from Judge Scott, Chief Justice of the Superior Court, in which he expressed his thanks for the humane treatment the inhabitants had experienced from our troops, and for my particular attention to the safety of their persons and property. A frigate on the stocks, and a large store-house containing their naval stores, were set on fire by the enemy subsequent to their offer of surrendering the troops and public property. Several of the most valuable public buildings, connected with their principal military positions, were destroyed by the explosion of their magazine, which proved so fatal to our troops; and although there were strong provocations for burning or destroying the town, nothing of the kind took place more than I have already mentioned, either by the army or navy.

Yours, with respectful esteem,

H. DEARBORN.

HON. JOSEPH B. VARNUM.

The Senate adjourned to six o'clock in the evening.

Six o'clock in the Evening.

On motion, by Mr. BIBB, the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, recommending a declaration of war, by the United States, against the Dey and Regency of Algiers, were discharged from the further consideration thereof.

On motion, by Mr. DANA,

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy be removed respecting the proceedings on the Message of the President of the United States recommending a declaration of war by the United States against the Dey and Regency of Algiers, and on the bill, entitled "An act for the protection of the commerce of the United States against the Algerine cruisers."

[For these proceedings, see March 2, ante.]

Adjournment.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the intended recess, and have appointed a committee on their part, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution last mentioned, and concurred therein.

Ordered, That Messrs. CHACE and BARBOUR be the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CHACE reported, from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, who informed them that he had no further communication to make to the two Houses of Congress.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House, having finished the business before them, are about to adjourn.

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate, having finished the Legislative business before them, are about to adjourn.

Whereupon, the President adjourned the Senate without day.

THIRTEENTH CONGRESS.—THIRD SESSION.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

IN

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, September 19, 1814.

This being the day appointed by proclamation of the President of the United States, dated on the 8th day of August, 1814, for the meeting of Congress, LANGDON CHEVES, the Speaker, PATRICK MACRUDER, the Clerk, and the following members of the House of Representatives, appeared, and took their seats, to wit:

From New Hampshire—Roger Vose.

From Massachusetts—Elijah Brigham, William Ely, Levi Hubbard, Cyrus King, Nathaniel Ruggles, and Artemas Ward.

From Connecticut—Epaphroditus Champion, John Davenport, jr., Jonathan O. Mosely, and Lewis B. Sturges.

From Vermont—William C. Bradley, James Fisk, Richard Skinner, William Strong, and Charles Rich.

From New York—Daniel Avery, Alexander Boyd, Oliver C. Comstock, Peter Denoyelles, Jonathan Fisk, James Geddes, Thos. P. Grosvenor, Moses Kent, John Lovett, Jacob Markell, Moses Moffit, Thomas J. Oakley, Jonathan Post, jr., and Ebenezer Sage.

From Delaware—Thomas Cooper.

From Maryland—Stevenson Archer, Alexander C. Hanson, Joseph Kent, and Philip Stuart.

From Virginia—Thomas M. Bayly, William A. Burwell, Hugh Caperton, John W. Eppes, Thomas Gholson, Peterson Goodwyn, Aylet Hawes, John Kerr, Joseph Lewis, jr., William McCoy, Thomas Newton, James Pleasants, jr., John Roane, John Smith, and Francis White.

From North Carolina—Willis Alston, John Culpeper, Peter Forney, William Gaston, Nathaniel Macon, William H. Murfree, Joseph Pearson, Richard Stanford, and Bartlett Yancey.

From South Carolina—Langdon Cheves, (Speaker,) David R. Evans, Samuel Farrow, Theodore Gourdin, and Thomas Kershaw.

From Georgia—Albert Cuthbert, and John Forsyth.

From Kentucky—James Clark, Joseph H. Hawkins, Joseph Deaha, Richard M. Johnson, Thomas

Montgomery, Stephen Ormaby, and Solomon P. Sharpe.

From Tennessee—John H. Bowen, Thomas K. Harris, Perry W. Humphreys, John Rhea, and John Sevier.

From Ohio—John Alexander, James Caldwell, William Creighton, jr., and John McLean.

A quorum, consisting of a majority of the whole House, being present, a committee was appointed, on the part of this House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them; and Mr. MACON and Mr. OAKLEY were appointed the committee.

A new member, to wit, PHILIP P. BARBOUR, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of John Dawson, one of the members from the State of Virginia, also appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

WILLIAM LATTIMORE, the delegate from the Mississippi Territory, appeared, and took his seat.

A message from the Senate informed the House that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and that they are ready to proceed to business. They have appointed a committee, on their part, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of this House, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make to them.

TUESDAY, September 20.

Several other members, to wit: From Massachusetts, LABAN WHEATON, JOHN REED, and WILLIAM BAYLIES; from Pennsylvania, WILLIAM CRAWFORD and ISAAC GRIFFIN; from Virginia, JOHN G. JACKSON; from North Carolina, MESHACK FRANKLIN; from Georgia, BOLING HALL, GEORGE M. TROUP, and WILLIAM BARNETT; and from Kentucky, SAMUEL MCKEE, appeared, and took their seats.

JONATHAN JENNINGS, the delegate from the Territory of Indiana, also appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. MACON, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses was assembled and ready to receive any communications he might be pleased to make to them, reported that they had performed that duty, and the President answered he would make a communication to the two Houses of Congress to-day at twelve o'clock.

A Message was then received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which was read, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. [For this Message, see Senate proceedings of this date, ante page 290.]

KING; from South Carolina, DAVID R. EVANS and JOHN J. CHAPPELL; and from Georgia, THOMAS TELFAIR, appeared, and took their seats.

THURSDAY, September 22.

Several other members, to wit: from New Hampshire, JEDUTHAN WILCOX; from New Jersey, RICHARD STOCKTON; from South Carolina, ELIAS EARLE; and from Kentucky, WILLIAM P. DUVALL, appeared, and took their seats.

A new member, to wit, SAMUEL DANA, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned in the representation of the State of Massachusetts, by the resignation of William M. Richardson, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Capture of Washington City.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the causes of the capture of this city by the enemy; also, into the manner in which the public buildings and property were destroyed, and the amount in value of the property, public and private, so destroyed; and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland, recommended that the resolution might be laid on the table. It appeared to him that the blowing up of Fort Warburton, and the occupation of Alexandria by the enemy, should be included in the inquiry.

Mr. JOHNSON assenting to the proposition, the resolution was laid on the table.

Burning of the Capitol.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Patrick Magruder, Clerk to this House, detailing the circumstances attending the destruction of his office by the enemy; which was read, and referred to Messrs. PEARSON, TELFAIR, DUVALL, WINTER, WARD of New Jersey, KER-SHAW, and KERR.

The letter is as follows:—

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
September 20, 1814.

SIR: Being compelled to leave home the latter part of July, for the Springs, on account of indisposition; after leaving the clerks in charge of the office, with instructions as to their official duties, and a person in charge of the library of Congress, for the purpose of opening and airing the books, pursuant to the regulations thereof; during my absence, the invasion of this city was effected by the enemy, and the destruction of public property by them, in those departments immediately under my superintendence, ensued; and, for a more particular detail of the circumstances attending that disastrous event, I must, through you, refer to a statement of facts submitted (in a letter to me from the clerks, who were left in the office after the militia marched from the District) to the House, with a request that a committee may be raised for the purpose of investigating the subject-matter thereof, and report to the House accordingly; and, also, that the Committee of Accounts may be instructed to ascertain, as near as can be, the amount of money paid on account of the contingent expenses of the House, since the first day of January last, by the Clerk, that he may have credit for the same at the Treasury, as the public vouchers for the expenditure of the public money since that period have all been destroyed in the conflagration of the Capitol. Without the aid of such an ascertainment, by a committee of the House, justice cannot be done to the undersigned or the public.

I am, sir, with respect, yours, &c.

PATRICK MAGRUDER.

The SPEAKER of the House of Reps.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, Sept. 15, 1814.

SIR: In order to correct any erroneous statements or representations which may go, or have gone, out to the public, in relation to the destruction of your office, we deem it our duty to make the following statement of facts:

At the time you left the city, (which was in the latter part of the month of July,) for the Springs in Virginia and Pennsylvania, for the recovery of your health, all was quiet, and we believe no fears were entertained for the safety of the seat of Government. Indeed, nothing was heard of the enemy, except his marauding parties in the Chesapeake, and what was seen in the newspapers, of troops being ordered from Europe to America.

About the middle of August it was stated that the enemy was in the bay, in great force, and, on the 19th of that month, the whole body of the militia of the District of Columbia was called out, under which call every clerk of the office was taken into the field, except Mr. Frost, and marched to meet the enemy.

On the 21st, the first of the undersigned clerks was furloughed, by Brigadier General Smith, at the request of Colonel George Magruder, for the purpose of returning to the city, to take care of, and save such part of the books and papers of the Clerk's office, as he might be able to effect, in case the enemy should get possession of the place; he arrived here in the night of that day.

His orders from Colonel George Magruder were not to begin packing up until it was ascertained that the clerks at the War Office were engaged in that business; and it was not until 12 o'clock, on Monday, the 22d, that we were informed that they had begun to move the effects of that office, although we were subsequently told that it had commenced the day before.

We immediately went to packing up, and Mr. Burch went out in search of wagons or other carriages, for the transportation of the books and papers; every wagon, and almost every cart, belonging to the city, had been previously impressed into the service of the United States, for the transportation of the baggage of the army; the few he was able to find were loaded with the private effects of individuals, who were moving without the city; those he attempted to hire, but, not succeeding, he claimed a right to impress them; but having no legal authority, or military force to aid him, he, of course, did not succeed. He then sent off three messengers into the country, one of whom obtained from Mr. John Wilson, whose residence is six miles from the city, the use of a cart and four oxen; it did not arrive at the office until after dark on Monday night, when it was immediately laden with the most valuable records and papers, which were taken, on the same night, nine miles, to a safe and secret place in the country. We continued to remove as many of the most valuable books and papers, having removed the manuscript records, as we were able to do with our one cart, until the morning of the day of the battle of Bladensburg, after which we were unable to take away any thing further.

Every thing belonging to the office, together with the library of Congress, we venture to say, might have been removed in time, if carriages could have been procured; but it was altogether impossible to procure them, either for hire, or by force.

The most material papers which have been lost are, the last volumes of the manuscript records of the Committees of Ways and Means, Claims and Pensions, and Revolutionary Claims; the clerks were engaged in bringing up these records previous to the alarm, and as it was not certain that the enemy would get to the city, and being desirous to have them completed, they were not packed away with the rest, but were kept out, that they might be finished by the meeting of Congress; but with the intention of taking them to a private residence, if such removal should be found necessary. After the defeat of our troops at Bladensburg, Mr. Frost removed them to the house commonly called General Washington's, which house being unexpectedly consumed by fire, these records were thus unfortunately lost.

The secret journal of Congress was also consumed; it was kept in a private drawer in the office, and in the hurry of removal was forgotten. Its contents, however, have been, in most cases, published by order of the House.

The manuscript papers, which have not been saved, were mostly of a private nature, consisting chiefly of petitions, and unimportant papers, presented previous to the year 1799.

We regret very much the loss of your private accounts and vouchers, among which, we are sorry to add, were the receipts and accounts of the expenditure of the contingent moneys of the House of Representatives; they were in the private drawer of Mr. George Magruder, which being locked, and the key not in our possession, we delayed to break it open until the last extremity, after which it escaped our recollection.

It is well known to one of us, (Mr. Burch,) that the receipts were from the first of January last, and embraced nearly the whole amount of the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the House.

A number of the printed books were also consumed, but they were all duplicates of those which have been preserved.

We have thus given you a full account of our proceedings during the troublesome scene, and we flatter ourselves you will not see in them any thing to disapprove, as we were guided solely by a zealous endeavor to discharge our duty to you, and to the public.

S. BURCH,
J. T. FROST,

To PATRICK MAGRUDER, Esq.

FRIDAY, September 23.

Several other members, to wit: from New York, MORRIS S. MILLER and ELISHA J. WINTER; from New Jersey, LEWIS CONDIOT, THOMAS WARD, and WILLIAM COX; from Maryland, ALEXANDER McKIM and ROBERT WRIGHT; from North Carolina, ISRAEL PROCKENS; and from South Carolina, WILLIAM LOWNDES; appeared and took their seats.

Capture of the City.

The House, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by him on yesterday, which was again read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the causes of the capture of this city by the enemy, the manner in which the public buildings and property was destroyed, and also into the amount in value of the property, public and private, so destroyed; and that they have power to send for persons and papers."

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, said he was sorry he could not accord in the propriety of withdrawing the proposed amendment. The subject of the capitulation of Alexandria, and the previous destruction of Fort Warburton, was closely connected with that of the capture of the city. This District, under the exclusive control of Congress, had been approached by the enemy in different directions, up the Patuxent and the Potomac, by two divisions of the same force. It was premature now to give any opinion where the blame, if any, of what had happened should rest. He hoped it would rest nowhere; that the recent disaster would be found to be the result of the particular situation of the country, which precluded any adequate defence. But, if there was an inquiry, he hoped it would be a thorough one; one which would satisfy the nation where the blame ought to rest. In this view, he thought it would be idle to inquire why the Capitol fell, distinguishing it from any other part of the District. Fort Warburton was one of its defences; the destruction of it carries on its face great cause of suspicion—and ought therefore to be a particular subject of inquiry; and, certainly, if any part of the subject was worthy of inquiry, this was. The gentleman from Maryland being absent, he would therefore propose an amendment in the following words: "and into the causes which induced the destruction of Fort Warburton and capitulation of Alexandria."

Mr. JOHNSON had no objection to including Fort Warburton in the inquiry, but objected to also including Alexandria.

Mr. GASTON, of North Carolina, said he did not doubt that the object of all those who interested themselves in this matter, was to have a full investigation of the subject in a national view. Instead, then, of inquiring into the particular details, he would wish to have the inquiry general, and couched in the very terms in which the President had brought it before Congress, in his Message, and he should move to amend this motion accordingly. Mr. G. then stated his proposed amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR withdrawing his proposed amendment, Mr. JOHNSON accepted Mr. GASTON's amendment to his motion; making it, with a further modification suggested by Mr. GROSVENOR, read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the causes of the success of the enemy in his late enterprises against the Metropolis, and the neighboring town of Alexandria, and into the manner in which the public buildings and property were destroyed, and the amount thereof; and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

The motion as it now stands was agreed to, without a dissenting voice; and Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, Mr. LOWNDES, Mr. STROCKTON, Mr. MILLER, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, Mr. BARBOUR, and Mr. PICKENS, were appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

MONDAY, September 26.

Several other members, to wit: from New York, SAMUEL SHERWOOD, WILLIAM IRVING, and JOHN LEFFERTS, appeared and took their seats.

A new member, to wit, from Massachusetts, JOHN W. HULBERT, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Daniel Dewey, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Removal of the Seat of Government.

Mr. FISK, of New York, rose and addressed the House, as follows:

Mr. Speaker: Upon a subject which has for several weeks past attracted the attention of this body, and indeed of every person in this nation, I feel it my duty to submit a resolution to bring the question promptly and fully before this House for examination and discussion. After the people of this country had recovered from the surprise and astonishment they felt at hearing of the capture of this city, and the destruction of the public buildings, their first inquiry was, where shall Congress sit with safety and convenience? Some designated one place, some another; but few, if any, imagined that the councils of the nation would continue here. It is not merely necessary that the members of the General Government should be secure in their own opinion, they must be so in the opinion of the nation. The confidence and credit of the nation is identified with the security of the public Councils, and the safety of the public records. Menace this safety, and public confidence is impaired, public credit is shaken.

It was supposed, as well in as out of this House, that Congress would at an early day take this subject into consideration.

There are, I am well aware, upon this measure, a variety of opinions. The question is one of some delicacy, much interest and importance, worthy of attentive examination and deliberate decision. If it should be agitated, as I apprehend it is, in some degree to excite inquiry, to raise expectations, or create an interest by informal discussion, it is best to bring it directly and formally before this House, that it may be here examined, decided, and put at rest. With this view, and under these impressions, I have risen to ask the attention of the House to the resolution I am about to offer. If we are to have a temporary removal of the Seat of Government until the public edifices can be rebuilt, our public library and documents replaced, the sooner this shall be decided the better; and if we are to remain here, it is, under existing circumstances, desirable that this should be determined by a vote of Congress, and preparations made accordingly. I therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of removing the Seat of Government, during the present session of Congress, to a place of greater security and less inconvenience than the city of Washington; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The question on taking this resolution into consideration was decided as follows, by yeas and nays: For consideration 79, against it 87, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Brown, Caldwell, Champion, Chappel, Clark, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Cooper, Cox, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Dana, Davenport, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Ely, Farrow, Findlay, Fisk of New York, Gaston, Geddes, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Harris, Humphreys, Hulbert, Ingham, Irwin, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Lovett, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, Markell, McLean, Moffit, Mosely, Murfree, Oakley, Piper, Post, John Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Ruggles, Sage, Seybert, Sharpe, Sherwood, Skinner, Stanford, Sturges, Tannehill, Thompson, Udree, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New York, Wheaton, Wilcox, and Winter.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bayly of Virginia, Bowen, Burwell, Cuthbert, Eppes, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Hall, Hawes, Hawkins, Hubbard, Jackson of Virginia, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Lewis, McCoy, Removal of the Seat of Government.

[H. OF R.]

McKee, McKim, Montgomery, Newton, Pearson, Pickens, Pleasants, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Virginia, Strong Stuart, Telfair, Troup, Wright, and Yancey.

So the House agreed to consider the resolution.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, was opposed to the removal of the Seat of Government under any circumstances whatever. He was particularly opposed to it for the reasons stated in the resolution—he did not believe the city of Washington more vulnerable than any other situation east of the Alleghany Mountain, nor as much so as Baltimore, Philadelphia, or even Lancaster; to one of which, he understood, it was the wish of gentlemen to carry it. Mr. L. said, the natural situation of Washington was as well calculated to resist an enemy as any to which gentlemen could desire to remove; and the circumstance of its having been invaded, was no reason why it should be abandoned.

If proper preparations for resistance had been made by those whose duty it was to have made them, Washington had been safe against double the number of its invaders. Instead, then, of removing the Seat of Government, let us do our duty by compelling others to do theirs. Let fortifications be immediately constructed and defended by a sufficient number of men injured to the duties of the camp, and we have nothing to fear hereafter. It would, in his opinion, be degrading, under present circumstances, to remove from this place. Our enemies had exultingly declared that Congress had been driven from their seat, and should no longer continue there. Let us not, then, fulfil their predictions and gratify their wishes. On the score of accommodations, Mr. L. observed, that although the present Hall was not as spacious and magnificent as the one we had been accustomed to occupy, yet it was as convenient as any we might calculate on getting elsewhere; at all events, it would do very well until another could be built in the city of Washington. He stated, that although from the words of the resolution a temporary removal was only contemplated, yet he verily believed that, when once started, it would never again return, and he feared the consequences that would follow. The States of Virginia and Maryland had made large donations in money to aid in the improvement of the city of Washington as the permanent seat of the General Government, and they would not willingly submit to the sacrifice. Hundreds and thousands of individuals had been induced, from a perfect confidence in the permanency of the Seat of the National Government, to expend their all in its improvement, who will be reduced to beggary and want if this resolution is adopted. The original proprietors of the ground upon which the city stands, had given to the Government two-thirds of their property for public uses; the greater part of which had been sold by the Government, and the proceeds appropriated to public purposes. Would it be just to sacrifice these people? Mr. L. exhorted the House to reflect on the consequences of adopting the resolution. He hoped, by rejecting it, that an end would be put to similar attempts hereafter, and that the good people of the District would be permitted to repose in safety upon the faith of the constitution and the law, and would be suffered to continue their improvements here without the dread of being sacrificed. For the last ten or twelve years, Mr. L. observed, similar attempts had been made, the effect of which was to create alarm and paralyze exertion and improvement, to the great injury of the public. He hoped the vote which would now be given would silence forever attempts which could do no good, but much harm.

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, also opposed the resolution, in an energetic manner, on the grounds of expediency and constitutionality. He also alluded to the danger of intrigue, in the operations of the Government; which, he said, was the species of friction most dangerous to the regularity and stability of Republican Government.

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, in an impressive manner warned the House against listening to this proposition; and, among other observations, in his usual forcible manner said, that if the Seat of Government was once set on wheels, there was no saying where it would stop.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, said he would vote against the resolution, and observed, that the reasons offered for it appear to be derived from inconvenience to Congress. That inconvenience is said to arise from loss of public documents, and inconvenience of living. In respect to living, he would make no observations. In respect to public documents, he observed, the loss thereof was great; but the probability is, that that loss can be met as well in this city as elsewhere. Congress, at the commencement of this Government, had no precedents to direct them, except what the proceedings of the Old Congress afforded. That several copies of the journals of the Old Congress, and also some copies of the journals of Congress under the present Government, may be had in this city is presumed.

He said he would pass over the constitutional objection to a removal, and observe, that for Congress to remove from the District of Columbia because the public buildings were destroyed, may be assimilated to the removal of a man from his farm because a banditti had burned his house. For a man so to remove would be deemed an act of puerility, and display absence of wisdom and fortitude.

The eyes of Europe will be drawn to the result of the proposed resolution. A removal by them will be ascribed to a want of firmness; and at this particular time that Congress do manifest firmness and determination is safe and honorable; and so it will appear to all, on the present question. This House has an opportunity to manifest that firmness to the nation and to the world.

Mr. PEARSON, of North Carolina, said he had supposed that a gentleman who could have summoned up so much fortitude as to introduce the resolution now under consideration, would have given to the subject that reflection which would have enabled him to offer some better ground for it, some plausible reason why this most extraordinary and unheard of proposition should be adopted. If there was a man in this House, or in the nation, who could vote for the motion from motives of mere personal convenience, that man in his judgment deserved the execration of his country. If there were any great national object which required that this motion should be adopted; that the public faith should be violated; that the persons who compose the population of this city should be stripped of their property, acquired under the faith of the Government, should be turned out beggars on the community, the House would very properly enter into a consideration of such a motion. But what reasons are now offered for it? The gentleman who introduced does not say that he himself is afraid to remain here. But the gentleman says the people are agitated and uneasy, and desire the Government to remove to a place of safety. Were the people to think for the gentleman on matters coming before him here, or was he to think for himself? Were the members to consult their distant constituents whether they were safe in remaining, or was this House to determine for itself? The gentleman had said the proposed removal is only temporary; but his arguments look to a permanent removal. Where, if not here, is the gentleman to get those records, those steering oars to guide him in this difficult road? The public library is destroyed, but there are as good in this District as in any place to which it is now proposed to remove. The gentleman may, if he thinks proper, within the compass of ten miles, obtain all the books he ever read. The gentleman had intimated that Congress might, in a commercial city, obtain facilities in our financial transactions, and with more readiness procure money to carry on this war. All these arguments go to favor a permanent removal. If he was certain of any one thing, Mr. P. said, it was, that the constitution precluded Congress from such removal. The law establishing a permanent seat of Government was bottomed on the constitution; and, in consequence of its passage, the whole soil of the District had been transferred in fee simple to the President of the United States, upon the express condition that that act of Congress was carrying the constitution into effect. What would gentlemen do with those thousands of people who had expended their substance in building and improving the place, and, relying on the public faith pledged by solemn acts, had given their property into the hands of the Government? The man who, in cold blood, could place the citizens of this place in the condition in which they would be in the event of removal, for considerations of a private nature, deserved eternal punishment. In another point of view, Mr. P. said, it seemed to him that gentlemen who were regardful of the honor of the country, would not be ready to heap disgrace upon disgrace, and add to the disaster of the enemy's success against this place; that they would be prevented by their national, or even party pride, from permitting the enemy to obtain a greater triumph than they have already obtained.

Mr. FARROW, of South Carolina, said he had voted to consider this motion, because he was desirous to treat with due respect every proposition made by a member of this House. But he asked, now, what great advantage would be derived from committing this subject, respecting which there could be no hesitation in deciding. The subject doubtless had been well considered before it was introduced into the House. For what, said he, are we now called upon to remove from this place? He was not about to say whether this place was the best that could have been selected for the Seat of Government. On that question he said he should not know what course to give to his own vote. But the question of removal at this moment was a very different one. Are we now called on, said he, to strike the standard of the nation? To say to the enemy, you have been here once, and may come again? No, sir; let us rally around it. The enemy, indeed, had once been here, and for his part he wished they might attempt to come again. It was time enough for Congress to move when they were in sight. He should doubt whether the honorable members of this House would then flee before them. Having assisted in calling the nation to war, he was ready to take part in it himself. He would rather sit under canvas in the city than remove one mile out of it to a palace. There had been no strength measured with the enemy in defending this place, and he would not, by deserting it, give him more credit than he had derived. The men of this District, led by proper officers, would, he believed, always do their duty and defend their city. Do we see any danger? Do you wish to examine the Faculty to know whether you are safe here? Or the clergy to know if they will consent to pay the proper attention to those who could not get away in case the enemy should a second time visit the place? He hoped no committee would be raised on the subject. When the enemy were at the gate, it would be time enough to abandon their posts.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, said he hoped, before the question was taken, he should be allowed to take a calm and dispassionate view of it. He agreed entirely with the gentleman from North Carolina, that whoever voted from personal motives on this question, whether for or against it, deserved condemnation. Although, said Mr. G., I might have personal or local feelings on the occasion, they shall not operate if I can throw them from me. I will look entirely to the good of the nation in the vote I am about to give. Mr. G. said he viewed the proposed temporary removal as no violation of the public faith. If it was, the public faith was so violated in 1794, when the President alone was authorized to change the place of meeting. Gentlemen had said, if the Government once began to roll, it would never return. Is this the true and proper place for the Seat of Government? If it be, how can gentlemen say it will not return immediately after the causes for its present removal shall cease? It will. The Seat of Government will in such case gravitate as certainly to this position as the needle to the pole. All the arguments, therefore, against the removal, on the ground that it would be permanent, ought to be thrown out of consideration, as they had nothing to do with the question. Let the resolution take its course and go to a committee.

Removal of the Seat of Government.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, rose to offer a few ideas to the House, which he said had occurred to him since the subject had been presented this morning. Granting to gentlemen premises they had taken, and ceding the justice of a part of their reasoning, when tested and made applicable to the real question, neither one nor the other appeared to him to lead to the conclusions they had drawn. Cede the constitutional question that the Seat of Government might be removed by Congress; cede too that there is some cause for this removal; we have yet to inquire, said he, whether or not this is an exigency requiring removal, and then, whether we can remove advantageously. First, as to the causes of removal. What are they? Famine? An invading army? Neither. An invading army has indeed penetrated to the city, and what have they done? With traits of barbarity better suited to Vandals than to Britons, they sacked a few buildings, and retired so precipitately, abandoned it so disgracefully as to leave many of their most valuable officers and soldiers even slightly wounded in our hands. Where now is that enemy? Is he at Baltimore, Philadelphia, or New York—or where is he? Perhaps, if Congress were to decide on removing, the first step would bring them to face that incursive foe whose approach gentlemen appeared to dread. When the emergency did exist, Mr. H. said he would go with gentlemen in seeking out a place of greater security. But at this moment, he could but view this as a question of panic. Remove now, said he, and what spectacle will you exhibit to the community? The enemy has retreated in such a manner as to induce no belief of his desire to return. The enterprise which made him master of this city was desperate in its character, and marked by a degree of bravery amounting to rashness; and every one will admit that had the energies of the Government been properly brought into action, he would have retreated with much greater loss. Nay, Mr. H. said, he would venture to assert, that three thousand brave men, led and kept in action, would have prevented the enemy from entering the capital; and that one thousand men in the Capitol alone with musketry would have defended the Capitol against the invaders.

Mr. OAKLEY of New York, next spoke. He said, that if indeed the enemy had abandoned our country at every point, it could not be justly supposed that Congress would be influenced by a panic in removing from this place. If the enemy be entirely out of view, this question may be discussed without that sort of feeling which some appear to entertain of it. Mr. O. said he would endeavor never to debate with feeling or passion, which was not at all conducive to inquiry into truth. If they could not approach this question without appeals to the passions and fears of the members, it certainly was no proof of its indisputable inexpediency. He was well aware, he said, of the interest which this District felt in the decision of this question; but it was proper that that interest should be manifested in a becoming manner. It was proper that considerations of this kind should have their proper influence; but when he heard gentlemen tell the House that by a temporary removal they would ruin thousands and thousands of individuals, he must believe it mere fanciful declamation. It was true, that a removal might injure individuals; but he presumed no gentleman in the House would hesitate to make a fair and liberal compensation by way of indemnity to such sufferers. It was a cardinal point in his politics, Mr. O. said, that the national faith should be preserved inviolate, even when improperly pledged, unless where considerations of a paramount nature forbade it. Gentlemen had talked about the national faith—but were they not aware that national contracts frequently cannot be fulfilled in the spirit in which they are made; and would they say that there might not be cases in which necessity would impose on them a course different from that pursued in ordinary cases? As to the expediency of removal, this was a mere proposition for inquiry, and if on inquiry it should appear that Congress cannot be more easily protected from the enemy, and better accommodated elsewhere, the arguments of gentlemen would apply, &c., &c. No temporary removal, Mr. O. said, would be a violation of the national faith. When we speak of a permanent seat of Government in the most literal sense, we speak of it subject to casualties. As to the panic alleged, were the enemy at our doors, the remark might be correct, but not otherwise. While, however, Mr. O. said, he would not remove at present under the impulse of fear, he would not remain from false courage. There was courage of one kind, and courage of another kind—the one animating the soldier in the fight, the other fortifying the citizen in the discharge of his duties. To be sure, members of Congress might put themselves on a par with the miserable wretches who fill the ranks of the enemy, and march forth to battle. But when we are sent here, said he, it is to legislate, to provide the ways and means to pay those who are to fight. Whilst we transact the business of legislators, and put means into others hands to carry on the war, we are in the line of our duty. On some occasions it is glorious to gentlemen to take up arms and maintain the principles they have asserted by their votes; and there were some in this House who could boast of having done so; but, in general, legislation required tranquillity and separation from other duties. The incursion of the enemy, he said, instead of affording reasons against a removal of the Seat of Government, afforded conclusive arguments in favor of. It had certainly shown one thing: that this was not a proper situation for the Seat of Government, because it is owing to the forbearance of the enemy that Congress had now a single roof to cover their heads whilst deliberating on the concerns of the nation. He called upon gentlemen to say whether it would be proper to remain at a place where the public documents were so much exposed to destruction, unless protected at an expense which was most disproportionate to the object.

The question was then taken on the resolution, and decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays, 72 to 51, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Baylies of Massachusetts, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Brown, Caldwell, Champion, Clark, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Cox, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Dana, Davenport, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Ely, Findlay, Fiak of New York, Geddes, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Harris, Hulbert, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Lefferts, Lovett, Lyle, Markell, McLean, Miller, Moffit, Mosely, Murfree, Oakley, Piper, Post, John Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Ruggles, Seybert, Sharpe, Sherwood, Skinner, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Tannehill, Udree, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Wheaton, Wilcox, and Winter.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Bayly of Virginia, Bowen, Burwell, Chappell, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Earle, Eppes, Farrow, Fiak of Vermont, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Hanson, Hawes, Hawkins, Humphreys, Jackson of Virginia, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Lewis, Lowndes, Macon, McCoy, McKim, Montgomery, Newton, Pearson, Pickens, Pleasants, Rhea of Tennessee, Roane, Sage, Sevier, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Stuart, Telfair, Troup, White, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey.

Mr. FISK, of New York, Mr. McKIM, Mr. BURWELL, Mr. GROSVENOR, Mr. INGHAM, Mr. HAWKINS, and Mr. DANA, were appointed the committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Encouragement of Privateers.

Mr. KING of Massachusetts, adverting to the law passed in 1813, allowing a bounty for prisoners taken by private armed vessels, remarked that, by recent decisions of the proper authority, it appeared that the provisions of this act did not extend to the cases of recapture by private armed vessels, certainly a meritorious class of cases, and equally entitled, with others, to remuneration for their enterprises. To collect the sense of the House on the propriety of extending this provision to embrace such cases, he moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the act entitled, "An act allowing a bounty to the owners, officers, and crews, of the private armed vessels of the United States," passed on the 2d of August, 1813, to such officers and crews of merchant vessels of the United States as have recaptured, or may recapture, the same from the enemy.

The resolution was agreed to.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, ABIAH BIGELOW and TIMOTHY PICKERING; from Vermont, EZRA BUTLER; and from Pennsylvania, HUGH GLASGOW, appeared, and took their seats.

Bounty to Deserters.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, said he believed it was the practice of the British commanders, on land and water, to use every means in their power to induce our men to desert their guns. A direct retaliation of such practices would doubtless be justifiable. But, Mr. F. said, the resolution he was about to submit had a different motive. It was well known that desertions from the enemy were very frequent, and that those deserters were strangers in our country, without means of employment, or of purchasing lands on which to labor for an honest livelihood. It was as well known that we have an extensive frontier, much exposed, and a great quantity of wild lands, the settlement of which would be very desirable. In order to authorize an inquiry into the expediency of disposing of this species of persons, so that they might be useful rather than burdensome to the community, he proposed the following resolve:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of giving to each deserter from the British army, during the present war, one hundred acres of the public lands, such deserter actually settling the same; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The question to take this motion into consideration, the yeas and nays having been required by Mr. OAKLEY, was decided—For consideration 82, against it 45.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, said he had asked for the yeas and nays on the question of considering this resolution, to mark his opposition to it in every stage. With deep regret, he might truly say, had he seen this resolution before the House. He had hoped, to whatever extent of sacrifice Congress might determine to go in the prosecution of this war, although we might all agree to lay down our lives and fortunes in its support, we shall still retain something like national honor. He was sorry to see a proposition before this House which he considered to be levelled at the root of it. He did not speak from extensive knowledge, but he believed he was justified in saying it was the only proposition of the kind ever submitted to any legislature. He did not know, at least, that it had ever entered into the scope of policy of this Government to encourage the commission of crime by those most likely to perpetrate it. The ranks of the enemy were known to be filled by ragamuffins of all descriptions; and, by the adoption of such a measure as that proposed by this resolution, we should make a direct appeal to the worst passions of the worst men. Are we reduced to this? Have we not resources to maintain an open and manly contest without appealing to this most unheard of and disgraceful course? If such policy were pursued by the Government, he should forever despair of a successful issue to the contest in which we are engaged. He hoped gentlemen would reflect deeply on this subject, before they gave their consent to this inquiry. If considerations sufficiently powerful to arrest the measure do not press upon the feelings of men, it would be in vain for him to urge them.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, said, that as he was bound to believe that any gentleman who made a motion in this House considered it honorable and proper, when he pronounced the measure, now proposed, to be dishonest, dishonorable and inexpedient, he did not mean to reflect personally on those who moved or advocated it. He did think so, and he did conceive also that the suggestions offered against them by the gentleman from New York had been in no degree met by the mover. Had they been met? The gentleman talked about the crimes of Britain; and seemed to infer because she had violated principle in one way, we might in another. This resolution would indeed at once reduce us to the same depth of guilt in which the gentlemen say our enemy is wallowing. The measure embraced in the motion before the House, being in the nature of retaliation, was different from all other such measures. It was wicked in itself, because it encouraged crime. It could not therefore be justified on that ground, nor indeed on any other. For his part, Mr. G. said, he had voted against the consideration of the motion, because in principle it was wrong, and therefore he would not even inquire into it. Without regard, he said, to the insinuation of particular sensibilities, the usual cant in this House, on such occasions, he should candidly discuss this question. If he knew himself, he observed, there was not a gentleman on the floor who would go further than he would at this moment, to rescue the country from the dangers which environ it, to repel the foe that tramples on the soil. But, let the danger be what it would, unless the existence of the nation was absolutely in jeopardy, he could not, under any pretence, consent to prostrate its honor and dignity by plunging into crime. The question, then, arose whether the proposed measure was or was not of a criminal nature; and this question he wished fairly to consider. What was this proposition which was to be adopted as a national principle, as a portion of our national morality, to stamp our character, now and forever? He asked gentlemen to say if they would, by adopting this proposition, offer a bounty for the commission of crime? Let gentlemen look into the books on national law, they will find desertion to be an offence of so black a dye that not even enemies are to encourage it. It is an offence in regard to which it is a common expression, that men love the treason but hate the traitor. A nation must receive the traitor, but hates him at the same time; because the crime of deserting the allegiance which a man owes to his country, is one of the deepest dye, one which you are daily punishing with death on your frontier. It is now proposed to offer a bounty on an offence, to which your own laws have decreed the punishment of death. Why stop here? Why not offer a bounty to every man who commits treason of any kind? Why stop here? Why not at once adopt the principles of the Old Man of the Mountain, as he is called, and offer a bounty for the assassination of the King, Governors, and Generals of your enemy? Why stop short by giving a bounty on desertion? Why not at once give a bounty for the assassination of every man in your enemy's camp, and pay the perpetrators of the crime when their daggers reek with their blood? There is little or no distinction, in principle, between these offences. Mr. G. repeated that he was ready, and gentlemen would find it in his conduct, to travel every honorable length in defending his country. But nothing short of preserving the independence of the country, and not till that independence was prostrate on the ground, could induce him to adopt a measure, embracing a principle like this.

Mr. SHARPE, of Kentucky, commenced some remarks by saying, that on all subjects requiring the deliberation of Congress, he was pleased to see a sentiment of jealous regard for the national honor and character pervading the House, and felt disposed to allow the sincerity and candor of every gentleman who made professions of it. After hearing very attentively, however, all that had been said on this subject, and giving due credit to the ingenuity of gentlemen, whose arguments are certainly very specious, his mind had not been convinced but that the measure now proposed to the House perfectly comported with the national honor. It was true, indeed, that when we consult the conduct of nations, and those usages which have the force of laws, we shall find many traits that do not quadrate entirely with the principles deemed honorable in social life. But, in considering subjects of this kind, we must disentangle our minds from the consideration of municipal laws which have no bearing on this subject. Treason is a crime of the highest grade against the nation to which the traitor belongs. To withdraw allegiance from one nation and transfer it to that nation's enemy, during war, is treason against the sovereign authority to which allegiance was due. But how ought we to consider this crime? Though a crime against a man's own country, it is no crime against that to which he deserts. The desertion of a soldier from our enemy is surely no crime against the United States, and therefore, as to us, no crime at all. Mr. S. examined at some length the nature of allegiance and of the obligations it imposed. To screen a criminal of any kind was participating in his crime, and becoming accessory after the fact; but it had been the practice of all nations to receive deserters from their enemies, and to permit them to settle among them if they behaved as good citizens ought to do. The nice principles of honor the gentlemen had laid down, extended far enough, would impose on a nation the necessity of restoring to an enemy his deserters, and enabling him to punish their offence with death. If, however, as public law exists, we may give them aid and comfort, and afford them an asylum, we may as well add to other inducements as those which, the gentleman says, already operate so powerfully on the soldiers of our enemy. In so doing, the principle, which is not controverted, is extended but little further than at present, and in its moral consequences is certainly not so enlarged as to affect the national honor.

After rejecting a motion made by Mr. BRADLEY, of Vermont, to lay the motion on the table, the question on its adoption was determined: For the motion 80, against it 55, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Caldwell, Chappell, Clark, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Dana, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Eppes, Evans, Findlay, Fisk of Vermont, Fisk of New York, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Hawkins, Hubbard, Humphreys, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Irwin, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Murfree, Newton, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Roane, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Tannehill, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Ward of New Jersey, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancey.

NAYS.—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Bayly of Virginia, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Butler, Caperton, Champion, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Duvall, Earle, Ely, Farrow, Gaston, Geddes, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hanson, Hulbert, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Macon, Markell, Miller, Moffit, Mosely, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Post, John Reed, Ruggles, Sherwood, Skinner, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, and Winter.

So it was adopted by the House.

Honor to the Brave.

Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, in introducing the following motion, adverted to the unpropitious events attending the commencement of the war, the more mortifying because unexpected, which had caused to be overlooked by the National Councils some displays of valor and military skill which deserved the notice of Congress. This omission had been the more marked because of the almost unlimited plaudits during the same time bestowed on the officers of the Navy, &c. Had the nation noticed by civil honors the merits of a Pike, a Taylor, a Croghan, a Miller, and some others, perhaps they would have done but sheer justice. But his object in rising now was to present a motion limited in its character, and confined to objects which must meet the approbation of the House. The resolution he proposed, and which he had hoped some other member would before now have offered, was in the following words:

Resolved, That the thanks of the United States, in Congress assembled, be presented to Generals Brown, Scott, and Gaines, and their companions in fame.

Resolved, That General Brown be requested to communicate to the other officers and soldiers under his command the thanks of the United States in Congress, and the high sense of gratitude entertained for victories so splendid, achieved in contests so unequal.

Considerable desultory debate took place on this motion, not in opposition to the principle, but from difference of opinion as to the mode.

Mr. OAKLEY moved to commit the same to the Committee of Military Affairs, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of returning the thanks of Congress to such other officers and soldiers of the United States as may have distinguished themselves during the present war.

A motion was made by Mr. SHARPE, to amend the motion of Mr. OAKLEY, by inserting, after the word "Congress," the following: "with such other testimonials of the national approbation, as said committee shall deem advisable."

A motion was then made by Mr. LOWNDEA, to postpone, until Monday next, the further consideration of the resolutions; which was agreed to.

MONDAY, October 8.

Two other members, to wit: from New York, JOHN W. TAYLOR; and from Virginia, HUGH NELSON, appeared, and took their seats.

Honorary Rewards.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported resolutions expressive of the thanks of Congress for the gallantry and good conduct with which the arms of the United States have been sustained by Major General Brown, and Brigadiers Scott, Gaines, and Maccomb, during the present campaign.

The resolution was referred to a Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Removal of the Seat of Government.

Mr. FISK, of New York, from the committee to whom was referred the resolution directing an inquiry into the expediency of a temporary removal of the Seat of Government from the city of Washington, &c., reported:

"That the committee had had the same under consideration, and directed the Chairman to submit to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to remove the Seat of Government at this time from the city of Washington."

The House having agreed to consider the report—

Mr. FISK, of New York, said he had reported that resolution in conformity to the directions of a majority of the committee; but he now thought it his duty to move to strike out the word "inexpedient," and insert the word "expedient."

A short desultory conversation took place between several members in relation to the state of defence of the place, &c.,

When the question on Mr. FISK's motion to amend (the effect of which was to declare it expedient to remove) was taken and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Condict, Conard, Cooper, Cox, Creighton, Davenport, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Deaha, Duvall, Ely, Fisk of New York, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hulbert, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irwin, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lovett, Lyle, Markell, Miller, Moffit, Mosely, Murfree, Oakley, Pickering, Piper, Post, John Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sharpe, Sherwood, Skinner, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Tannehill, Taylor, Thompson, Udree, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Wilcox, and Winter—68.

NAYS.—Messrs. Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bayly of Virginia, Bowen, Burwell, Caperton, Chappell, Clopton, Comstock, Crawford, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Earl, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Findlay, Fisk of Vermont, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwin, Griffin, Hall, Hanson, Harris, Hawes, Hawkins, Hubbard, Humphreys, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kerr, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Leferts, Lewis, Lowndes, Macon, McCoy, McKee, Mc-

Kim, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Newton, Pearson, Pickens, Pleasants, Rhea of Tennessee, Roane, Sage, Sevier, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Stuart, Telfair, Troup, White, Wilson of Pennsylvania, and Yancey—68.

The House being equally divided—

The SPEAKER said he was now called on to give a vote as unexpected as painful. He would, on this occasion, as on any other, regardless of the feelings that might be thereby excited, and the impressions probably received, give that vote which he believed the interests, safety, and honor of the nation under all the circumstances to require. He was deeply impressed with the belief that these considerations required him to vote in the affirmative. The reason for this vote was, that this District could not be defended except at an immense expense, and an expense perhaps half of that which would be necessary to carry on the war.

So the amendment was carried.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, moved to refer the report as amended to the Committee of the whole House, that it might be more fully and freely discussed.

Mr. FISK having acceded to the proposed reference to a Committee of the Whole, the business was so disposed of, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, October 5.

Another member, to wit, from Rhode Island, ELISHA R. POTTER, appeared, and took his seat.

Removal of the Seat of Government.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the select committee on the expediency of a temporary removal of the Seat of Government. The resolution under consideration stands as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient at this time to remove the Seat of Government from the City of Washington.

Mr. STROCKTON, of New Jersey, said he had at one time determined to take no part in the discussion now before the committee, but to remain satisfied with a silent vote. The subject had always appeared to him of such a nature, as to preclude any just expectation of good resulting from much debate. We should make no proselytes on one side or the other—the subject lies level with every man's understanding. Gentlemen need only to open the constitution of their country—cast their eyes around—survey the District, and observe what was before them, to enable them to judge correctly. He had, however, been induced to alter this resolution by the course of argument which an honorable member from North Carolina (Mr. PEARSON, who he was sorry not to see in his seat) had thought proper to pursue. That gentleman had made many remarks which were susceptible of a satisfactory answer; many which Mr. S. thought ought not to go forth without an answer;—they might, if unanswered, be thought correct, and would, he feared, delude and mislead those whom that gentleman had with so much zeal and ability attempted to serve. No gentleman, Mr. S. said, could feel less personal interest in the question than he did; coming from a State having very humble pretensions to consequence or patronage—never himself expecting to be here again after this session—he could view the subject with coolness and impartiality. The honorable member he alluded to had indulged himself in very extensive and wide excursions. Mr. S. would not attempt to follow him in his whole course, but content himself with selecting some of his leading points, leaving it to other gentlemen to remark on the residue if they saw fit. To get at the gentleman's argument at once, he would consider it under two general heads—

1st. The legal, constitutional right of Congress to remove the Seat of Government.

2d. The propriety or expediency of exercising that right if they had it.

The gentleman from North Carolina had denied both; he would contend for the affirmative of each proposition.

1st. Does the Government of the United States possess the legal constitutional power of removing itself from this District? Mr. S. said, it was obvious that this point must be subdivided into two: 1st. Has the Government the power of temporary removal? 2d. Has it the power of permanent removal? Mr. S. said that he considered the first as the only question now properly before the committee. It was true that the proposition contained in the resolution was general in its terms, yet it seemed to be agreed on all sides, that only a temporary removal was contemplated at present. We were not ready now to act on so extensive a subject—one involving so many considerations of public interest, of private feeling and justice, as that of a permanent removal. This great point, then, was really not before the committee. But the gentleman from North Carolina supposing, probably, that upon the question of permanent removal he was impregnable, had pressed it into his service; its discussion was, therefore, proper, and might be useful. As to the legal constitutional right of the Government to remove itself for a season on good and sufficient reasons, who, Mr. S. asked, could seriously doubt it? What section of the constitution, what principle of reason, common sense, or common justice, could be relied on to take from the national councils so common and necessary an attribute of sovereignty? None could be produced; the gentleman could find none; no gentleman had hazarded the assertion. The honorable gentleman himself from North Carolina, with all his zeal, industry, and talent, had not brought his mind up to such an assertion in direct terms; yet it was necessary to a successful opposition to this resolution, not only to make, but to make good this extravagant position. Why, he asked, should the people have thus fettered, thus imprisoned, their Government? Why should an act, ascertaining the place where the Government should sit, be considered so sacred as not to be approached by the Government which enacted it? Why, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, should it be irrevocable? If pestilence came—if famine or war came—were we to be enchained to the spot, by the magic force of an act not to be altered? The proposition was monstrous; he had no hesitation in pronouncing that such an idea was totally destitute of foundation, either in constitutional law, common sense, or common justice. Congress, Mr. S. said, had settled this question by passing a law, not only asserting the right of temporary removal for sufficient reasons, but delegating that right to the President of the United States. He alluded to the act of 1794, by which the President is authorized, by proclamation, to convene Congress at some other place than that fixed by law, if, in his opinion, by reason of a contagious disease, or any other cause, Congress could not meet at the Seat of Government without danger to the lives and healths of the members. If this matter had been exposed to any doubt, this law would have settled it; it is a legislative authority upon the very point; and so far are the people of the United States from entertaining the scruples the honorable gentleman had imputed to them, that there was a very common expectation in that part of the Union Mr. S. was conversant with, that after the late inroad of the enemy, and the destruction of the public buildings here, the President would by proclamation have convened Congress at some other place. He might have so done with strict propriety; the fact which was before him, the catastrophe which had happened, would have justified the conclusion that we could not sit here with safety to the lives and healths of the members; the general terms of the act alluded to seemed designed to meet such a case as had happened, and although the President did not think proper to execute the authority, yet the investing him with it was decisive of the right to remove for sufficient reasons. But, Mr. S. said, he would go further, submit with confidence to the committee that the two Houses of Congress, without the assent of the President, might by a joint resolution remove themselves for this session, and this would of course produce a removal of the Government, and all its departments. Mr. S. relied on the fifth section of the constitution to prove his position. It is there provided, "that neither House shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting." This provision not only prohibits unseasonable adjournments and separations, but expressly admits and regulates the general power of removal; and, (if a grant of power was in such a case necessary, though he thought it was not,) by necessary implication, it invests in the two Houses a right by joint vote to adjourn to any other place; and yet this is the very power of temporary removal which seems now to be called in question. Mr. S. said that he felt that he had troubled the committee already too long upon this part of the subject; he should, therefore, leave the question of the right of temporary removal, under the persuasion that no member of the committee entertained a doubt about it.

Mr. S. said that, before he sat down, he would declare that he had no covert intention; that he meant to go no further than he had expressed. He had formed and would deliver no opinion as to the permanent removal; that was a great national question; it might be safely confided to the wisdom and justice of a future Congress. The people of this District, he thought, had great claims and great advantages; the inducements to return here would be strong; nothing but a conviction that, upon great principles, the good of the nation required a removal, could prevent the return of the Government. There exists a statute, having no limitation, fixing the Seat of Government here: this must be repealed, or the Government must return. There is in the District a real estate belonging to the United States of considerable value. The inhabitants have many claims upon the justice of the Government which will not be overlooked. They have also the zealous support of a great interest from the Southern States. The probability is, that a majority will never agree upon any other place. He therefore thought that they had magnified the danger they were in. If the removal was temporary the evil would be temporary, and must be set down to the account of this war. If it was final, compensation would be made in all cases in which it was due. On the whole, he should vote against the amendment proposed by the honorable member from North Carolina.

THURSDAY, October 6.

Another member, to wit, from New York, ZEBULON R. SHIPARD, appeared, and took his seat.

Removal of the Seat of Government.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution declaring it expedient at this time to remove from the city of Washington.

Mr. PRABSON addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I very much fear the House will be ill required for their indulgence in acceding to an adjournment yesterday at my instance. This apprehension is heightened by the circumstance, that it has fallen to my lot to enter the lists with an adversary so powerful, so justly distinguished, as the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. SROOKTON.) The odds are, indeed, awful. My reliance is in the justice of my cause, and the candid and liberal judgments of those who hear me. I must, however, be permitted to say, that the argument of the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, (whom I have so often heard with conviction and delight when engaged in a better cause,) has tended to confirm rather than disturb the opinions I entertain on the question submitted for our decision.

The insulated proposition before us is, whether it be expedient or inexpedient for Congress to remove the seat of the General Government from its present abode to some other place for a limited time. The specious garb which envelops this proposition hides from the superficial eye much of its real deformity. It is our right and our duty to strip it and analyze it with that accuracy due to its importance—with that care which is demanded by a sacred regard for the national faith, the national interest, and above all the preservation of the union of these States.

Perhaps few articles in our constitution have marked more fully the wisdom and foresight of those illustrious men who framed that charter of liberty, than the provision in the 8th section of the 1st article, which says, "Congress shall exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States," &c.

The policy of this power in Congress is as manifest as the freedom and independence of its sessions, its members and deliberations are essential. That this sentiment may not rest on my authority alone, I beg leave to enforce it by an authority which will not be disregarded by gentlemen on this side of the House, with whom in general I have the satisfaction to think and to act, but many of whom I regret to find on this occasion embodied against me. The authority alluded to, is that excellent exposition of the constitution entitled The Federalist. This authority will not be objected to by the other side of the House, when they are informed that the extract I am about to read is the production of the present Chief Magistrate.

In considering the section of the constitution to which I have referred, this author says: "The indispensable necessity of complete authority at the Seat of Government, carries its own evidence with it. It is a power exercised by every legislature in the Union, I might say, of the world, by virtue of its general supremacy. Without it, not only the public authority might be insulted, and its proceedings be interrupted with impunity but a dependence of the members of the General Government on the State comprehending the Seat of the Government for protection in the exercise of its duty might bring on the National Councils an imputation of awe or influence, equally dishonorable to the Government and dissatisfactory to the other members of the Confederacy."

For those reasons, and many other considerations which will suggest themselves to every reflecting man, Congress was vested with the power, and it became their duty to establish the Seat of the General Government in the manner prescribed by the constitution. This power has been exercised, this duty has been performed.

The subject demanded and received the attention due to its importance by the first Congress which assembled after the adoption of the constitution. Many of the members of the first Congress had also been members of the Convention, and may well be presumed to have best understood the powers given and duties enjoined by that sacred instrument which they had contributed to form. It would be little less than impious to accuse them of violating their own act; it would be the extreme of presumption to charge them with ignorance as to the limitation of powers which they themselves had prescribed.

By reference to the Congressional Register of 1789, it will be found that the first Congress had scarcely assembled before their attention was peculiarly directed to the important subject of locating the permanent Seat of the General Government in the mode pointed out by the constitution. Those friends of union well knew the necessity of this power, and its inevitable tendency to bind faster and faster the members of this political association, some of whom were but feebly knit together, and the cement of the whole yet soft and infirm. Every effort was therefore essential to give a heart to this body, from which its several members would derive support, strength, and confidence. This great object was to be effected by embracing the earliest opportunity to establish the permanent Seat of the General Government on principles of justice and equality; having a due regard to the extent, population, and convenience of all the States; regarding, at the same time, the progressive increase of our Western settlements, the Atlantic navigation, and a convenient intercourse with the Western country. Upon these principles, it was resolved by the first Congress to fix the permanent residence of the Government.

It will be recollected by the House that in the course of my remarks the other day, I referred to the speeches of almost every distinguished member of the first Congress in relation to this subject, from which it appeared that not one individual member questioned the constitutional right of Congress to establish permanently the Seat of the Government. On the contrary, every member knew and admitted they were then legislating on a question not so important to themselves at that moment, but which was deemed vitally important to the perpetuity of the Union, as it would be binding for ages yet to come. With this understanding, and for this object, we find the word permanent emphatically used in every resolution, in every act, in every speech, syllable or letter on this subject. It is true, in the discussion on this subject, local jealousies, local feelings and influence were not totally discarded. They were manifested as to the place which should become the centre of the Union, but entered not into the question of the perpetuity of the act about to be performed. The essence of the act was its perpetuity, its binding force on future legislatures, to put forever at rest a question, the agitation of which might in after times, awaken and give new vigor to passions and jealousies, which the adoption of the constitution had hushed, and which it was the first duty of wise legislators to keep in profound sleep; because if again aroused, they might shake the Union to its centre.

The principles on which the permanent Seat of the General Government should be established being recognized and admitted by all, the contest solely rested between the rival pretensions of the banks of the Susquehanna and those of the Potomac. The superior claims of the Potomac ultimately prevailed, and Congress did, on the 15th of July, 1790, and by an amendatory act of March 3d, 1791, designate and accept the present District of Columbia for "the permanent Seat of the Government of the United States." By the same and subsequent acts, the President was authorized to enter into engagements for the acceptance of such quantity of land on the east side of the Potomac, within the said District, as he might deem proper for the use of the United States. He was authorized to erect public buildings, and, through the agency of commissioners, to lay off and designate the plan of this city, which bears his name. For this purpose, he was vested with power to enter into contracts and stipulations with the proprietors of lands within the limits of the city for an absolute transfer of their lands in fee simple, for the objects contemplated, and in consideration of the act of Congress establishing the permanent Seat of the Government of the United States. By virtue of the powers vested in the President, and in consideration of the objects specified in the several acts of Congress alluded to, the proprietors did cede to the United States at least three-fourths of all the lands within the limits of this city, and for which no compensation was received, except for a few acres on which public buildings were erected, and some squares exclusively designed for public purposes. In furtherance of these objects, a great variety of other powers were granted to the President, the execution of which necessarily involved the interests of numerous individuals, and for the successful completion of which public faith could and did alone constitute the guarantee. Under these powers, and for the objects contemplated, large donations were received, lots were sold, loans were obtained, and pledges given, for their repayment, of the very property which had been surrendered by individuals to the United States.

The donations from the States of Maryland and Virginia, together with the sale of lots, which cost the Government nothing, amount to more than eight hundred thousand dollars. The public ground remaining unsold, is estimated at nearly one million of dollars. It may be worthy of remark, that soon after the establishment of this District as the permanent seat of the Government, foreigners were authorized to purchase and hold lands within its limits. The then President of the United States, General Washington, availed himself of this circumstance, not only to raise funds, but also to interest respectable foreigners and skilful artisans of all countries in aid of this new but extensive establishment. With this view agents were sent to Europe with official certified copies of all the laws and proceedings in relation to this subject, on the authority of which artists were induced to come from various parts of Europe, and settle here. Large sales of city lots were made in different countries of Europe, particularly Holland and England, which property to the amount of three hundred thousand dollars is still held by those purchasers or those claiming under them.

OCTOBER, 1814.]

Two other material parties to the compact for fixing the permanent Seat of the Government yet remain to be heard. These are the States of Virginia and Maryland. We need barely refer to the laws of those States to learn the motives and considerations which induced them to surrender their jurisdiction not only of soil but persons, to the extent of ten miles square in the most important section of their States. I will call the attention of the House for a moment to a few of the provisions of an act of Maryland, passed 19th December, 1791, entitled "An act concerning the Territory of Columbia and city of Washington." The preamble commences in these emphatic terms: "Whereas the President of the United States, by virtue of several acts of Congress, and acts of the Assemblies of Virginia and Maryland, by his proclamation, dated at Georgetown, on the 80th day of March, 1791, did declare and make known that the whole of the territory of ten miles square, for the permanent Seat of Government of the United States, shall be located," &c. "And, whereas Notley Young, Daniel Carroll of Duddington, and many others, proprietors of the greater part of the land hereinafter mentioned, have been laid out in a city, came into an agreement, and have conveyed their lands in trust to Thomas Beall, son of George, and John Mackall Gantt, whereby they have subjected their lands to be laid out as a city, given up part to the United States, and subjected other parts to be sold to raise money as a donation to be employed according to the act of Congress for establishing the temporary and permanent Seat of the Government of the United States, under and upon the terms and conditions contained in each of said deeds," &c.

By the second section of said law, it is enacted, "That all that part of the said Territory called Columbia, which lies within the limits of this State, shall be, and the same is hereby acknowledged to be, forever ceded and relinquished to the Congress and Government of the United States, in full and absolute right and exclusive jurisdiction, as well of soil as of persons residing or to reside thereon, pursuant to the tenor and effect of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States," &c. This law then proceeds to subject other lands within the limits of the city to the same terms and conditions as those which had been transferred as before recited, and concludes by making a donation of $72,000, to be applied to the erection of public buildings or other improvements in the city of Washington for the use of the United States. As this subject was until very lately little understood by myself, and possibly less so by many members of the House, I have deemed it necessary to a correct decision, and a proper application of facts to principles, to give a general history of the establishment of the Seat of Government at this place, that we and the nation should know and reflect on the numerous obligations by which the Seat of Government is bound to its present spot—obligations resting not on fluctuating notions of policy, but flowing from the constitution, sanctioned by repeated laws, riveted by compacts with States and individuals, and rendered sacred by the plighted faith of the nation.

The adoption of the resolve was further opposed by Messrs. JOHNSON of Kentucky, FORSYTH of Georgia, HAWKINS of Kentucky, BOWEN and RHEA of Tennessee; and advocated by Messrs. SHARPE of Kentucky, and INGERSOLL of Pennsylvania.

The question on the passage of the resolution was decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alston, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Condict, Conard, Cooper, Cox, Creighton, Davenport, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyles, Deah, Duvall, Ely, Findlay, Fisk of New York, Geddes, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Hulbert, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irwin, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lovett, Lyle, Markell, Miller, Moffit, Mosely, Oakley, Ormsby, Pickering, Piper, Post, John Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sharpe, Sherwood, Shipard, Skinner, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Tannehill, Taylor, Thompson, Udree, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Wheaton, Wilcox, and Winter—72.

NAYS.—Messrs. Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bayly of Virginia, Bowen, Burwell, Chappell, Clopton, Comstock, Crawford, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Earle, Eppee, Evans, Farrow, Fisk of Vermont, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Glasgow, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Hanson, Harris, Hawes, Hawkins, Humphreys, Hungerford, Irving, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lowndes, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Pearson, Pickens, Pleasants, Rhea of Tennessee, Roane, Sage, Sevier, Smith of Virginia, Stuart, Telfair, Troup, White, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey—71.

So the resolution was agreed to, and a committee appointed to bring in a bill in pursuance thereof.

FRIDAY, October 7.

Two other members, to wit: from New York,

WILLIAM S. SMITH; and from Kentucky, SAMUEL HOPKINS, appeared, and took their seats.

MONDAY, October 10.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, SAMUEL TAGGART; from Maryland, SAMUEL RINGGOLD; from North Carolina, WILLIAM KENNEDY; and from Louisiana, THOMAS BOLLING ROBERTSON, appeared, and took their seats.

Ways and Means.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on so much of the President's Message as relates to the finances of the United States; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole, on Thursday next.

The report is as follows:

That taxes, loans, and Treasury notes, appear to be the resources on which we must rely for carrying on the war. The product of the first, cannot be commanded in time to meet the immediate demands on the Treasury. A reliance on loans, in the present situation of this country, would be uncertain; and the terms on which they would be obtained, not such as to induce a resort to them at the present moment. Treasury notes, combined with a system of taxation, more extended than the one heretofore adopted, will, it is believed, in the present state of bank credit, be found to be a much better resource. The want of some medium, which, resting on a firm and solid basis, may unite public confidence, and have a general, instead of a local circulation, is now universally acknowledged. The stoppage of specie payments by the principal banks of the Middle States has embarrassed greatly the operations of the Treasury, and, by confining the circulation of notes to the limits of the States within which they are issued, has deprived the Government of all the facilities in the remittance of money, which was afforded while the public confidence gave to bank notes a general circulation. The notes of New York and Philadelphia will not be received in Boston; the notes of Baltimore, or of the District of Columbia, will not answer for payments in Philadelphia. If, by any new modification, Treasury notes could be made to answer the purposes of a circulating medium between the different States, they would greatly facilitate the operations of Government, and free from embarrassment the transactions of individuals. To secure their circulation, it would be necessary—1. To issue the notes in sums sufficiently small for the ordinary purposes of society; 2. To allow the individual who holds them to fund them at pleasure at any of the loan offices, and to receive their amount in stock of the United States, bearing an interest of 8 per cent.; 3. To make them payable to bearer, and transferable by delivery; 4. To make them receivable in all payments for public lands and taxes; 5. To pledge, for the payment of the interest on the amount issued, so much of the internal duties as shall be necessary. To prevent an accumulation of circulating medium, the United States to retain the power, on giving six months' notice, of redeeming them with specie, or exchanging for them stock, bearing an interest of 8 per cent. If these provisions are adopted, and taxes imposed, which shall manifest clearly the ability of the Government to meet its engagements, our present difficulties will vanish, confidence be restored, and the capital, hoarded by avarice, or locked up from timidity, will be again restored to the accustomed channels of circulation. In presenting additional objects of taxation, care has been taken to select such as will bear equally on every portion of the community. In Europe, the price of agricultural products is not materially affected by a state of war; the produce of the earth is there consumed within the country, in peace and in war. The situation of the United States is totally different. With an extensive and fertile country, and a small population, compared to the extent of our territory, we have annually a large surplus to export to foreign markets, over and above what is necessary for consumption. On the export of this surplus, which is cut off by war, depends in a great degree the ability of the farmer to meet taxes. While, however, war depresses the agricultural interest, it gives vigor to various manufactures. By destroying all foreign competition, the war has brought many of these manufactures to a state of perfection, which will secure their successful prosecution, even after peace shall be restored. In times of difficulty and danger, we must appeal to the patriotism of every class of our citizens. These establishments, under the fostering hand of the Government, have grown to maturity, and will not hesitate to bear, with the agricultural interests, their portion of the taxes necessary to maintain, unimpaired, that character for punctuality and good faith for which the American Government has heretofore been distinguished. Several of these manufactures have been selected as proper subjects of taxation; and it is proposed to unite with the taxes a pledge of the public faith, for the continuance of the double duties until the tax shall be repealed.

The committee deem it unnecessary at present, to present any view of the expenditures for the next year, reserving a report on that subject until the estimates from the Treasury shall be forwarded. Confining, therefore, this report to the additional taxes necessary for the support of the public credit, they submit the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to continue the direct tax, and to increase the same 50 per cent.
2. Resolved, That it is expedient to increase the duty on spirits distilled, by an additional duty of 12½ cents on the gallon.
3. Resolved, That it is expedient to add 100 per cent. on the present duty on sales at auction.
4. Resolved, That it is expedient to add 50 per cent. to the present duty on the conveyance of papers and letters.
5. Resolved, That it is expedient to impose a duty on the following articles, viz: manufactured tobacco and snuff, in the hands of the manufacturer; candles, of tallow and spermaceti; hats; cotton yarn, spun by the aid of machinery, worked by steam or water; leather; pig iron; castings; bar, rolled, and slit iron, and on nails made by the aid of machinery; on furniture above a certain value, except beds, bedding, and articles of domestic manufacture, in the hands of the owner; beer, ale, and porter, in the hands of the manufacturer; boots and shoes, above a certain price, in the hands of the manufacturer; on plated harness, in the hands of the owner; on vats, for the manufacture of paper; on saddles and bridles, above a certain price, in the hands of the owner; on gold and silver watches, in the hands of the owner; on pleasure horses, kept exclusively for the saddle or carriage; on playing cards; and on lotteries.

Negotiations for Peace.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES :

To the Senate and House ofRepresentatives of the United States :

I lay before Congress communications just received from the Plenipotentiaries of the United States, charged with negotiating peace with Great Britain; showing the conditions on which alone that Government is willing to put an end to the war.

The instructions to those Plenipotentiaries, disclosing the grounds on which they were authorized to negotiate and conclude a Treaty of Peace, will be the subject of another communication.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, October 10, 1814.

The Message and communications were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FORSYTH moved that five thousand copies be printed for the use of the members.

Mr. HANSON, of Maryland, moved to amend the resolution by inserting "ten thousand copies" in the place of "five thousand." He said he was persuaded the information communicated in the Message had awakened but one feeling throughout the House, and stamped the same impression on every member. It had always been his opinion that it became not this Government to stand on idle, frivolous etiquette, but to speak to the enemy, if indeed we desired to convert him to a friend, to speak to him frankly, plainly, and directly, to the end that all ground for his doubting our sincerity might be removed. He trusted that it would appear that our Commissioners had been instructed so to speak, and that they had so spoken. If, then, on fair and honorable terms proposed, England should have denied us peace; if other and new claims had been set up; if she has attempted to annex degrading and humiliating conditions; if she has presumed to trench upon our ascertained rights as hitherto acknowledged and enjoyed, from that moment Mr. H.'s determination had long since been formed to unite in supporting the most vigorous system of honorable war, with the hope of bringing the enemy to a sense of justice. Mr. H. was satisfied that nothing more was necessary to make the war national than to convince the people that an honest and fair effort had been made to obtain peace, and it had been denied upon terms mutually honorable. From that moment it ceased to be a party war, and of necessity became national. Mr. H. said he too well knew the party with which it had been his pride and happiness to act, to doubt of their determining to bear a just share of the sacrifices to be incurred in defending the honor of the nation in a war that becomes just. Forgetting, as far as possible, their objections to the Administration; stifling their complaints as far as might be against the party that supports it; sacrificing all minor considerations; endeavoring to bury in oblivion the numerous wrongs inflicted upon their party; omitting, to every proper extent, a retrospect of the past, and looking to the present and the future, for the purpose of staunching the bleeding wounds of their country, they would stand forth in this her hour of peril, in asserting and maintaining her established rights and honor.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, said that it was not necessary for him on this occasion to reiterate the sentiments of his honorable friend, (Mr. HANSON.) His friend, he was confident, had expressed the feelings and opinions of those gentlemen with whom he was accustomed to act, on the nature and character of the demands and pretensions of the British Government, as developed in the despatches just read to the House. He did not hesitate, in the fullest manner, to declare, that those demands and pretensions were utterly inadmissible under any circumstances. But, Mr. O. said, while he made this declaration, and while he felt, in common with all gentlemen, the conviction that there could be but one sentiment in the nation, as to the necessity of resisting, by all the means in our power, the unjust and arrogant claims of the enemy, he felt bound to remark, that he could never forget by whom and upon what grounds the nation had been involved in this war, upon the issue of which were now staked the essential rights and honor of the country. The character given by the enemy to the war, had put at hazard these rights and that honor, and they must now be vindicated at an incalculable expense of treasure and blood. Mr. O. said it was notorious, that, at the commencement of the war, a great portion of the people of this country thought it rash and unnecessary. If the Administration had been willing to make peace on terms which could be expected to unite the approbation of the nation, they must have been prepared to abandon some of the grounds on which it had been declared. Their conduct in the late negotiation could not be properly estimated until the instructions to our Commissioners are laid before the House. This, Mr. O. said, he perceived was to be done. It would then appear how far they had thought it important to maintain the grounds on which they had deemed it expedient to commence a war; the conclusion of which was not now within their control, and appeared to be removed to a hopeless distance.

The motion to print ten thousand copies was agreed to.

TUESDAY, October 11.

Another member, to wit, from New York, ABRAHAM HASBROUCK, appeared, and took his seat.

Honors to the Brave.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolutions expressive of the sense entertained by Congress of the gallantry and good conduct with which the reputation of the arms of the United States has been sustained by Major Generals Brown, Scott, and Gaines, and Brigadier General Macomb. These resolutions were yesterday amended in committee by the insertion of the names of Generals P. B. Porter, Ripley, and Miller. These amendments were, after considerable debate, confirmed by the House. The resolution approbatory of the conduct of Brigadier General Macomb was also amended, on the motion of Mr. SHIPARD, of New York, by adding thereto the names of Major General Mooers of the New York militia, and Major General Strong of the militia of Vermont.

The resolutions thus amended, were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—Ayes 98.

Library for Congress.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolution authorizing the Library Committee of Congress to contract for the purchase of the library of Mr. Jefferson.

The letter of Mr. Jefferson to Samuel H. Smith, Esq., offering the library to Congress on their own terms and their own time of payment, to replace in some degree the loss sustained in this respect by the recent invasion, was read. The letter states that the collection has been the work of fifty years and of great care and attention (and said to consist of ten thousand volumes)—a collection which he had designed, at his death, to have offered the refusal of to Congress—but this intention, the letter states, is hastened by the recent events, as the few years yet left to him would afford him but a barren use of this extensive and valuable library.—[For which letter see Senate proceedings, ante page 298.]

WEDNESDAY, October 12.

Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, from the Committee of Naval Affairs, reported without amendment the resolution from the Senate in honor of Captain Macdonough, his officers and crew; and they were made the order of the day for to-morrow.

The resolutions expressive of the high sense entertained by the Congress of the United States of the gallantry and good conduct with which the reputation of the arms of the United States has been sustained by Generals Brown, Scott, Gaines, Ripley, and Miller, of the Army, and General P. B. Porter of the New York militia, and General Macomb of the Army, were read a third time, as amended.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that they had passed a joint resolution relative to the capture of the British sloop of war L'Epervier by the Peacock; which resolve was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

THURSDAY, October 13.

Mr. EPPES, of Virginia, gave notice that he should to-morrow call up the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the additional taxes.

Honor to the Brave.

Mr. TROUP, of Georgia, from the Military Committee, reported the resolutions, yesterday referred to them, in the following amended form:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress be, and they are hereby presented to Major General Brown, and through him to the officers and men under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the successive battles of Chippewa, Niagara, and Erie, in Upper Canada, in which British veteran troops were beaten and repulsed by equal or inferior numbers, and that the President of the United States be requested to cause a gold medal to be struck, emblematical of these triumphs, and presented to Major General Brown.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause a gold medal to be struck, with suitable emblems and devices, and presented to Major General Scott, in testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of his distinguished services in the successive conflicts of Chippewa and Niagara, and of his uniform gallantry and good conduct in sustaining the reputation of the arms of the United States.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause silver medals to be struck, with suitable emblems and devices, and presented to Brigadier General Ripley, Brigadier General Miller, and Brigadier General Porter, in testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of their gallantry and good conduct in the several conflicts of Chippewa, Niagara, and Erie.

Resolved, That the thanks of Congress be, and they are hereby presented to Brigadier General Gaines, and through him to the officers and men under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in defeating the enemy at Erie, on the 15th of August, repelling with great slaughter the attack of a British veteran army superior in numbers, and that the President of the United States be requested to cause a gold medal to be struck, emblematical of this triumph, and presented to Brigadier General Gaines.

Resolved, That the thanks of Congress be and they are hereby presented to Brigadier General Macomb, and through him to the officers and men under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in defeating the enemy at Plattsburg, on the 11th of September, repelling with 1,500 men, aided by a body of militia and volunteers from New York and Vermont, a British veteran army greatly superior in number, and that the President of the United States be requested to cause a gold medal to be struck, emblematical of this triumph, and presented to Brigadier General Macomb.

The report was accepted without opposition, and ordered to be read a third and last time to-day. [But, before it could be engrossed for that purpose, the House had adjourned.]

The Battle on Lake Champlain.

The House, on motion of Mr. PLEASANTS, of

OCTOBER, 1814.]

Removal of the Seat of Government.

[H. OF R.]

Virginia, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolutions from the Senate, expressive of the sense of Congress of the importance and brilliancy of the decisive victory obtained by Commodore Thomas Macdonough and his brave officers and men.

The resolutions having been read—

Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, said, before the question was taken upon the resolutions, he would take the liberty of submitting to the consideration of the committee a few remarks. Whatever, said he, may be the difference of opinion among us, as to the manner or the measure of approbation which we will bestow upon our land officers and soldiers, I believe there is but one sentiment as to our seamen. Fortunately for our country, the occasions of just and honorable eulogium upon them have been so frequent, that the practice is fully settled, the precedents completely established. The subject of the resolutions before you, is the victory obtained by Commodore Macdonough and his gallant comrades on Lake Champlain, over a superior British squadron, on the memorable 11th of September last—a victory in itself equal to any one which has been achieved by our navy; in its consequences certainly surpassed by none. A view of the relative strength of the two squadrons will convince us that this victory was in itself equal to any one which has preceded it. It is sufficient to observe, that in almost every particular, perhaps in every one, the advantage was on the side of the enemy. The action was commenced by him in the fullest confidence of success. He chose his own time; he took his own distance; he was animated by the presence of a great army, spectators of the contest. He was stimulated by that spirit of emulation which never ceases to exist between the Army and Navy. He had every reason to believe that, upon the successful issue of the naval contest, depended the successful issue of the campaign. Thus situated, and thus wrought upon by motives so powerful, he would probably have been successful had he not been opposed by men actuated by feelings of a character somewhat different, but perhaps of still more powerful influence. The Americans were, in every sense of the word, fighting for their country. That country was likely to fall under one of the severest scourges to which any country can be exposed. The city of Washington had just before fallen a prey to the invaders—there was good reason to believe that Baltimore was on the eve of destruction—perhaps destroyed. The determination to lay waste and destroy all the assailable parts of our country had been announced in form. A ferocious determination, sir! Adopted, we are assured, at the special instance of the Governor of Canada. A combination of more powerful incentives to exertion has seldom addressed itself to the human mind. Under its influence our brave countrymen fought; and under its influence they conquered. The consequences of their victory are known to all united America. To recite them would be superfluous; I shall not undertake it, sir. All I ask is, and I ask it with pleasure, because I am sure I shall receive it, the undivided sentiment of this House in favor of the resolutions.

No opposition or amendment being made, the resolutions were reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading; and were accordingly read a third time, and passed by a unanimous vote.

Removal of the Seat of Government.

Mr. FISK, of New York, from the select committee to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill for the temporary removal of the Seat of Government from the city of Washington.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, having objected to the second reading of the bill—

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, moved to reject the bill, and thereon demanded the yeas and nays. The reason he assigned for it was, that instead of being engaged on a subject of this kind, the House ought to be engaged in matters of high importance, in which the destinies of the nation are involved. He would call the attention of gentlemen to the despatches from Europe, which, he thought, would clearly indicate that other objects than this ought to occupy the attention of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, said he most sincerely regretted that this course had been taken with the bill. If gentlemen were friends to this District, if they wished the question decided in such a way as would quiet the minds of the people of the District, they ought to refrain from pushing this question now, when many were absent who did not expect it to come on. If, when all the members were present, there should appear to be a majority against the bill, the question would be fairly settled; but a surprise of this sort could not decide it.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, said, so far as he was personally concerned, he denied the imputation of intending to obtain a vote by surprise; he was not operated upon by any such consideration. He was not, he said, peculiarly a friend to the people of this District; it was not on their account he was opposed to the bill. It was the intrinsic importance of this question to the nation at large, that demanded his attention. It was necessary this question should be settled, and promptly settled. He had no idea that any member could be taken by surprise, and he was indeed surprised at the remark. This question had been amply discussed, and there was nothing to be said on the subject, &c.

Mr. FISK, of New York, said he very much regretted that this motion had been submitted to the consideration of the House. The principles of this bill had been more than once before the House, who had decided in favor of the removal; and it could not be expected they were now prepared to reject the bill. The exposure of this place and the expense of sitting here were as great now as they had been before. As to the argument that time will render this place secure, Mr. F. said he would answer the gentleman, for the enemy, as a French marshal had once replied to some such remark, that he would not consult the enemy as to the time or place of meeting him. Mr. F. said we were now situated four hundred miles from the most important seat of war, with which daily and expeditious communication was all-important, as well to the facility of supplies as to the combination of movement and action, &c. The increase of expense thus incurred, he said, amounted to a greater sum than would the cost of removal of the public offices to Philadelphia or New York. To brave all these inconveniences merely in consideration of the interests of the people of this District, would be to pervert the constitutional provision which gives Congress exclusive legislation over the District, and instead of that, would be giving to the District the control over Congress. Mr. F. said he viewed the interests of the citizens of this District with the same consideration as he did those of all other citizens; but they had, he presumed, too much good sense and patriotism to ask Congress, merely out of regard to their personal views, to compromise the national interests. They were not to be ruined, either, by a permanent removal; for the bill itself provided for the return of Congress to this place after the war. Congress would be equally exposed, and require the same expenditure for their protection, at every session during the war as they were now. Gentlemen had said the enemy would not come here now, because they could find no object. It had been supposed that the enemy could have no object in coming here before, but he had come. Was it not necessary, not only that the members should feel themselves secure from personal danger, but also from fear of interruption? Should not the creditors of the Government be satisfied of the safety of Congress? And when we speak of them, said Mr. F., let us not pass them over with a bare mention. On whom must we rely for the support of our finances—for the sinews to carry on the war? Where are the moneyed men? Are they here? He meant by this no invidious distinctions. The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MACON) had the other day called the attention of the House to the character of the votes for removal, which were all from the North and East—from the moneyed men who wielded the capital of the nation. Let gentlemen reflect that these men would not advance their money with the same confidence to the Government at this place as if it were removed.

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, said he did not rise to discuss this question, because he was satisfied the House was prepared to decide on it. He rose only to ask the gentleman to be kind enough to answer him one question. The faith of the nation is to be pledged for the money which must be obtained for the support of Government.

Will not the pledge to be given in Washington be as valuable as any which could be given in Philadelphia? Will a removal increase the ability of a nation to meet the demands against it? It is not so. The Government is as competent to all such purposes here as it could be in any other city.

Mr. STROXTON, after desiring a call of the House, (which was not in order,) moved an adjournment, and called the yeas and nays thereon, in order to ascertain what members were absent.

The yeas and nays having been so taken, there were for adjournment 40, against it 103.

Mr. STROXTON then said, as eight or nine members appeared to be absent, he should move to postpone the further consideration of the bill till to-morrow.

On this motion Mr. RHEA required the previous question, which was not sanctioned by a sufficient number to take it.

Mr. RHEA said he was anxious to see this question at rest, and would, therefore, make a motion to supersede that now before the House, and give gentlemen as much procrastination as the most anxious for that course could desire. He, therefore, moved to postpone indefinitely (tantamount to a motion to reject) the bill. He had no other object in view than to get rid of the subject.

Mr. STANFORD, of North Carolina, then made a motion (superseding all the others) that the bill and all the motions should lie on the table; which motion was agreed to, yeas 94.

FRIDAY, October 14.

Two other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, JAMES PARKER; and from Virginia, JAMES JOHNSON, appeared, and took their seats.

Peace Negotiations.

Before any further business was done, a Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a number of documents; on opening which, the SPEAKER ordered strangers to be excluded the House. The doors remained closed until half past two o'clock. When they were again opened, it appeared that the Message embraced the instructions to our Ministers now in Europe, which the President announced his intention to communicate to Congress. They were, with the exception of a few passages deemed improper for publication, ordered to be printed.

SATURDAY, October 15.

Two other members, to wit: from New Hampshire, DANIEL WEBSTER; and from Connecticut, TIMOTHY PITKIN, appeared, and took their seats.

A new member, to wit, from Tennessee, NEWTON CANNON, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Felix Grundy, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Removal of the Seat of Government.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, called up for consideration the bill for the temporary removal of the Seat of Government from the city of Washington.

The question for rejection of the bill came first in order, and was stated from the Chair.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, replied to some of those reasons.

The question on the rejection of the bill was then put and negatived, by the following vote: for the rejection 76, against it 79.

The bill was then read a second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole; and the House immediately resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill, it having been made the order of the day for to-day, in preference to Monday, by a majority of 86 to 65 votes.

Mr. FISK, of New York, moved to fill the blank for the place of removal with Philadelphia.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, moved to fill it with Georgetown.

Mr. LEWIS, and Mr. HOPKINS, of Kentucky, spoke against the insertion of Philadelphia, and Mr. PICKERING in favor of it.

The motion to insert Philadelphia was agreed to by a large majority: and the other blanks in the bill were filled up.

Mr. LEWIS, of Virginia, then moved to insert the following section as an amendment to the bill:

"And be it further enacted, That the annual sum of one hundred thousand dollars be, and is hereby, appropriated, for the term of five years, to be applied, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the erection of suitable buildings within the city of Washington, for the accommodation of the President of the United States, the two Houses of Congress, and the several Departments of the Government, and that the same shall be paid annually to the order or orders of the President of the United States."

After much interesting debate this motion was agreed to, ayes 95.

The committee rose, and reported the bill with the amendments, which were also concurred in by the House.

And the question was then put, "Shall the bill be engrossed and read the third time?" and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Condict, Conard, Cooper, Cox, Creighton, Crouch, Davenport, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Ely, Fisk of New York, Geddes, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Hasbrouck, Hulbert, Ingersoll, Irwin, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lovett, Markell, Miller, Moffit, Mosely, Oakley, Ormsby, Pickering, Piper, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rich, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sharpe, Sherwood, Shipard, Skinner, Smith of New York, Stockton, Sturges, Taggard, Taylor, Thompson, Udree, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, and Winter—74.

NAYS.—Messrs. Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bayly of Virginia, Bowen, Burwell, Cannon, Chappell, Clopton, Comstock, Crawford, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Findlay, Fisk of Vermont, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Glasgow, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Hanson, Harris, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Irving, Jackson of Virginia, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kerahaw, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Lewis, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Parker, Pearson, Pickens, Pleasants, Rhea of Tennessee, Ringgold, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Strong, Stuart, Tannehill, Telfair, Troup, White, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey—88.

[Absent on this vote.—Mr. Anderson, from indisposition; Messrs. Caperton, Ingham, Murfree, on leave; Messrs. Breckenridge, Calhoun, Davis of Massachusetts, Hale, Hopkins of New York, Howell, Kilbourn, Reed, Ridgely, Sheffey, Smith of Pennsylvania, Tallmadge, Williams, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Wood, who have not attended at the present session.]

So the House determined that the bill should not be engrossed for a third reading; in other words, that it should be rejected.

MONDAY, October 17.

Two other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, JOHN WILSON, and from Pennsylvania, ISAAC SMITH, appeared, and took their seats.

Mr. Jefferson's Library.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. LEWIS in the Chair, on the resolution from the Senate authorizing the Library Committee to contract for the purchase of Mr. Jefferson's library.

Mr. OAKLEY, of New York, moved so to amend the resolution as to leave it open to the Library Committee to contract for the purchase of a library for the use of Congress.

On this motion considerable desultory debate took place; the purchase of Mr. Jefferson's library being opposed by Messrs. OAKLEY, JOHN REED, and GROSVENOR, and advocated by Messrs. WRIGHT, SEYBERT, ROBERTSON, HAWKINS, and FORSYTH.

The objections to the purchase were generally its extent, the cost of the purchase, the nature of the selection, embracing too many works in foreign languages, some of too philosophical a character, and some otherwise objectionable. Of the first description, exception was taken to Voltaire's works, &c., and of the other to Calender's Prospect Before Us.

On the other hand, those who advocated the purchase proposed to be made, contended that so valuable a library, one so admirably calculated for the substratum of a great national library, was not to be obtained in the United States; and that, although there might be some works to which gentlemen might take exception, there were others of very opposite character; that this, besides, was no reason against the purchase, because in every library of value might be found some books to which exceptions would be taken, according to the feelings or prejudices of those who examined them.

Mr. OAKLEY's motion was negatived by the following vote—For the amendment 58, against it 87.

The committee then rose and reported the resolution to the House, who took it up.

Mr. JOHN REED, of Massachusetts, then moved to amend the bill by limiting the price to be given for the whole of the library to twenty-five thousand dollars.

The yeas and nays having been demanded on Mr. REED's motion, before mentioned, after further discussion, the House adjourned without deciding the same.

TUESDAY, October 18.

Another member, to wit, from Massachusetts, WILLIAM REED, appeared and took his seat.

Treasury Report.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, laid before the House the copy of a letter from the chairman of that committee to the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the subject of maintaining unimpaired the public credit, together with the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury thereto; which were read, and referred to the Committee of the whole House, to whom was referred the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on that part of the President's Message which relates to our finances.

The Letter and Report are as follows:

SIR: The Committee of Ways and Means have had under their consideration the support of public credit by a system of taxation more extended than the one heretofore adopted. They have determined to suspend proceeding on their report at present before the House of Representatives, with a view to afford you an opportunity of suggesting another, or such additional provisions as may be necessary to revise and maintain unimpaired the public credit.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN W. EPPES.

HON. MR. DALLAS,

Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Oct. 17, 1814.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated the 14th instant, and, aware of the necessity for an early interposition of Congress on the subject to which it relates, I proceed, at the moment of entering upon the duties of office, to offer to the consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means, an answer on the several points of inquiry.

Contemplating the present state of the finances, it is obvious that a deficiency in the revenue, and a depreciation in the public credit, exist from causes which cannot in any degree be ascribed, either to the want of resources, or to the want of integrity in the nation. Different minds will conceive different opinions in relation to some of those causes; but it will be agreed on all sides, that the most operative have been the inadequacy of our system of taxation to form a foundation for public credit; and the absence even from that system of the means which are best adapted to anticipate, collect, and distribute the public revenue.

The wealth of the nation, in the value and products of its soil, in all the acquisitions of personal property, in all the varieties of industry, remains almost untouched by the hand of Government; for the national faith, and not the national wealth, has hitherto been the principal instrument of finance. It was reasonable, however, to expect, that a period must occur in the course of a protracted war, when confidence in the accumulating public engagements could only be secured by an active demonstration, both of the capacity and the disposition to perform them. In the present state of the Treasury, therefore, it is a just consolation to reflect that a prompt and resolute application of the resources of the country will effectually relieve from every pecuniary embarrassment and vindicate the fiscal honor of the Government.

But it would be vain to attempt to disguise, and it would be pernicious to palliate the difficulties which are now to be overcome. The exigencies of the Government require a supply of treasure for the prosecution of the war, beyond any amount which it would be politic, even if it were practicable, to raise by an immediate and constant imposition of taxes. There must, therefore, be a resort to credit, for a considerable portion of the supply. But the public credit is at this juncture so depressed, that no hope of adequate succor, on moderate terms, can safely rest upon it. Hence, it becomes the object first and last in every practical scheme of finance, to re-animate the confidence of the citizens; and to impress on the mind of every man, who, for the public account, renders services, furnishes supplies, or advances money, a conviction of the punctuality as well as of the security of the Government. It is not to be regarded, indeed, as the case of preserving a credit which has never been impaired, but rather as the case of rescuing from reproach a credit over which doubt and apprehension (not the less injurious perhaps because they are visionary) have cast an inauspicious shade. In the former case, the ordinary means of raising and appropriating the revenue, will always be sufficient; but in the latter case, no exertion can be competent to attain the object, which does not quiet, in every mind, every fear of future loss or disappointment in consequence of trusting to the pledges of the public faith.

The condition of the circulating medium of the country presents another copious source of mischief and embarrassment. The recent exportations of specie have considerably diminished the fund of gold and silver coin; and another considerable portion of that fund has been drawn by the timid and the wary, from the use of the community, into the private coffers of individuals. On the other hand, the multiplication of banks in the several States has so increased the quantity of paper currency, that it would be difficult to calculate its amount; and still more difficult to ascertain its value, with reference to the capital on which it has been issued. But the benefit of even this paper currency is in a great measure lost, as the suspension of payments in specie at most of the banks has suddenly broken the chain of accommodation, that previously extended the credit and the circula-
